MONSEN et al. v. MONSEN. (Sac. 2271.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 19, 1916. Rehearing Denied Jan. 18, 1917.)

1. Specific Performance 🔑86—Wills 🔑58(1)—Contract to Make Will.

A man may make a valid contract, binding himself to dispose of his property in a particular way by will, and a court of equity will enforce such agreement specifically by treating the heirs as trustees and compelling them to convey the property.

2. Specific Performance 🔑28(1) — Contract to Devise—Evidence.

The requirement of Civ. Code, § 3390, that to be specifically enforced the terms of an agreement must be sufficiently certain to make the precise act which is to be done clearly ascertainable, applies to contracts to dispose of property by will.

3. Specific Performance 🔑121(7) — Evidence—Contract to Dispose of Property by Will.

In suit for specific performance of a contract to leave to plaintiff a child's share of decedent's estate, evidence that decedent and his wife agreed to take plaintiff and treat him as their child, and that they indicated that he should succeed to their property and at one time made a will, making him the sole beneficiary, which they showed to him, was not sufficient to show the precise contract alleged.

4. Appeal and Error 🔑1011(1)—Review—Findings on Conflicting Evidence.

The rule that upon conflicting evidence all reasonable inferences are to be indulged to support the findings does not justify the sustaining of a finding not having the support of substantial evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; H. M. Albery, Judge.

Action by Hine G. Monsen against Mary Annie Monsen and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

U. W. Brown, of Colusa, and Frank Freeman, of Willow, for appellants. N. J. Manson, of San Francisco, Thomas Rutledge, of Colusa, F. St. John Fox, of San Francisco (J. P. Langhorne, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The defendants, claiming as executors and beneficiaries under the will of Friedriech Monsen, deceased, appeal from a judgment enforcing an alleged contract by which the decedent had agreed that the plaintiff should receive and inherit a child's share of the property which said decedent might leave.

[1] The action is of a type familiar in this court, and illustrated by a line of decisions beginning with Owens v. McNally, 113 Cal. 444, 45 Pac. 710, 33 L. R. A. 369. As was said in that case, there has been "from a very early date a general concurrence among the authorities upon the proposition that a man may make a valid agreement binding himself to dispose of his property in a particular way by last will and testament, and a court of equity will enforce such an agreement specifically by treating the heirs as trustees and compelling them to convey the property in accordance with the terms of the contract." Without referring to the numerous decisions in other jurisdictions, we make note of the cases in which the rule, as thus declared, has been recognized here. McCabe v. Healy, 138 Cal. 81, 70 Pac. 1008; Baumann v. Kusian, 164 Cal. 582, 129 Pac. 986, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 756; Rogers v. Schlotterback, 167 Cal. 35, 138 Pac. 728; Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719, 141 Pac. 217. In the case at bar, as in those cited, the plaintiff relied upon a parol agreement. It may not be amiss to point out the manifest danger of fraud, perjury, and injustice that may inhere in a recognition of the right to alter, by parol testimony, the course of disposition of the property of a decedent. It was, no doubt, a recognition of this danger that led the Legislature to adopt the amendments to section 1624 of the Civil Code and section 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure, bringing agreements of this character within the scope of the statute of frauds. The agreement here relied upon was, however, claimed to have been made, and executed, on plaintiff's part, long prior to the changes in the Codes, and its validity is not affected by them. Rogers v. Schlotterback, supra.

[2] While the cases which we have cited declare the propriety of an enforcement, in equity, of contracts to make a particular disposition of property upon the death of the promisor, they all agree that enforcement will not be decreed except upon the conditions applicable to all demands for specific performance. One of these is that the terms of the agreement must be definite and certain. Section 3390 of the Civil Code, in enumerating the obligations which cannot be specifically enforced, concludes:

> "(6) An agreement, the terms of which are not sufficiently certain to make the precise act which is to be done clearly ascertainable."

In Owens v. McNally, the court used this language:

> "Where a contract such as this, resting in parol and sought to be enforced after the death of the other party to it, comes before a court of equity for review, it is scrutinized, and should be scrutinized, with particular care, and only upon a satisfactory showing that it is definite and certain and just will it be enforced. The proofs of the contract should be clear, and the acts of the claimant referable alone to the contract."

McCabe v. Healy recognizes the same doctrine, although it was there held that the contract was sufficiently certain. In Baumann v. Kusian, we find in the opinion the statement that:

> "It is well settled that to warrant specific enforcement of a contract of the character here alleged the contract must be definite and certain."

In Rogers v. Schlotterback, the court says that a contract of the kind here alleged will be enforced "if such a contract may fairly be said to be clearly and satisfactorily shown, if it is clear, certain, and definite in its terms; and if specific performance would not be harsh and oppressive and unjust to innocent third parties. * * *" Finally, in Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719, 141 Pac. 217, the court, after reviewing the earlier cases, again emphasized the rule that "proof of the contract to make a certain kind of will must be definite and distinct before a chancellor will enforce specific performance."

Plaintiff was the son of Peter Grevie and Fredrika, his wife. The Grevies had two other sons, both older than plaintiff. The family lived on a farm in Colusa county. Friedriech Monsen and Magdalena, his wife, were a childless couple residing on a farm near that of the Grevies. Peter Grevie and Friedriech Monsen were brothers of the half blood. The plaintiff was born in March, 1883. His mother died in April of the same year, and a few months later the plaintiff was put in charge of the Monsens. He remained with them during his childhood, receiving nurture and education at their hands. He took, or was given, their name, being known as Hine G. Monsen, and it is perfectly apparent from the evidence that the relations which grew up between him and the Monsens were of a warmly affectionate kind. In 1904 Magdalena Monsen died. In 1907 Friedriech Monsen married Mary Annie Fuerstein, and two sons were born of that marriage. Friedriech Monsen died April 2, 1913, leaving a will and codicil by which he disposed of his entire estate (appraised at about $115,000) to persons other than the plaintiff.

The agreement on which plaintiff relies is set forth in his complaint with great detail and particularity, and the findings follow the allegations of the complaint. Briefly stated, it is averred and found that in September, 1889, Peter Grevie, plaintiff's father, and Friedriech Monsen, for the benefit of the plaintiff, entered into a contract whereby Peter Grevie promised and agreed that he would surrender his said son to Friedriech Monsen to adopt, have, and keep as said Monsen's son, and would renounce and waive all his claims as father of said plaintiff and in consideration thereof Monsen agreed with said Peter Grevie for plaintiff's benefit that said Monsen would and he did thereby accept and adopt plaintiff as his own son, and would protect and maintain and provide for him as such son, and would in every way become responsible for his moral and physical welfare, and would assume all responsibility for the debts of said plaintiff to be incurred, and he further agreed that upon the death of the said Friedriech Monsen the said plaintiff "should have, receive and inherit and should be and become entitled to and vested with a child's and son's share of all of the property, both real and personal, of which the said Friedriech Monsen might die seised or possessed, in the same manner and to the same effect as if he, the said plaintiff, Hine G. Monsen, were a child and son and heir at law of the said Friedriech Monsen, deceased, and as a child and son and heir at law of the said Friedriech Monsen, deceased." Having found the agreement as thus outlined, the court drew the conclusion of law that plaintiff was entitled to receive one-third of the estate of Friedriech Monsen, subject to costs of administration, and judgment was entered accordingly.

[3] When we come to examine the record, we fail to find in it any substantial evidence showing "clearly and satisfactorily," or at all, the making of the contract described with such precision in the complaint and the findings. The only witness who undertook to give direct testimony that a contract of any kind had been entered into was the plaintiff himself. As already stated, the plaintiff first came into Monsen's family when he was a few months old. Some five years later Peter Grevie, his father, came to the Monsen house to take the plaintiff away. Plaintiff's testimony was that upon this occasion his father said, "'I have come to take you home with me.' Mrs. Monsen interrupted, saying, 'Peter, Hine is our boy. It was understood by us that he was our boy when we took him.' After this * * * a very heated discussion occurred, at the close of which Peter Grevie said, 'You can have the boy.'" In this conversation, the recital of which, as already stated, constituted the only direct testimony of an agreement, there was not a word said about inheritance, or testamentary disposition, or, indeed, about property at all. The further evidence on respondent's part consisted of proof of the Monsens' acts and declarations, offered as the basis for an inference that the agreement pleaded had been made. We think that these items of evidence, taken collectively, fall far short of proving the making of the contract alleged and found. We shall not extend this opinion so far as to recite all of this evidence. Many of the statements tend to show, merely, the deep affection entertained by Friedriech Monsen and his wife for the plaintiff, that they treated him as a son, and that they bestowed many material and other kindnesses upon him. This evidence could support, at the utmost, an inference that the Monsens had agreed to take plaintiff and treat him as their child. Inasmuch, however, as a parent is under no legal obligation to give his property by will to a child, no cause of action would arise from such a contract. Baumann v. Kusian, supra. We shall refer, briefly, to the items of evidence which may be thought to bear more directly upon the alleged making of the contract pleaded. The earliest statement testified to is one made by Mrs. Magdalena Monsen to a witness (Miss Boggs), and having reference, apparently, to the plaintiff's original coming into the Monsen family, some years prior to the time when Peter Grevie came to take his child away. This witness testified that Mrs. Magdalena Monsen had told her that soon after plaintiff's birth his mother died, and his father asked her, Mrs. Monsen, to take care of the baby for him, and that she said:

> "I will not do it that way. If you will give me the baby for my own I will do the best I can for him."

This, of course, is entirely insufficient to show any agreement by Mrs. Monsen, still less by her husband, to give to plaintiff a "child's share" of the husband's estate.

There was evidence that both Monsen and his first wife had made wills by which they had made the plaintiff the sole beneficiary, and that they had shown these wills to him. This indicates that the Monsens, at the time of making the wills, desired that plaintiff should succeed to their property. It indicates no more. The making of a will has no tendency to show that there is a contractual obligation to make such will.

To the witness Wilkins, Monsen said:

> "I took a boy from Mr. Grevie and legally adopted him and made him my heir."

The statement that he had "legally adopted" plaintiff, if made, was not true. There is no claim that any legal adoption had ever taken place. The statement that he had made him his heir is fully explained by the showing that he had made a will leaving everything to the plaintiff. It certainly does not show that he had bound himself by agreement to make such provision. Testimony of several witnesses that the Monsens had said that they would leave the plaintiff all they had, or that "they intended" that he should get their property, is entitled to no greater weight. All of this evidence is similar in character to that under consideration in Ackerman v. Ackerman's Executors, 24 N. J. Eq. 586 (cited with approval in Owens v. McNally, supra), of which the court said:

> "The complainant's evidence chiefly consists of loose conversations had by different persons with the testator * * * all of which evidence is * * * consistent with a purpose, at one time, on the part of the father, to devise the farm to Gilbert, and Gilbert's expectation that he would * * * but which fails to show any contract for the conveyance or devise of the farm, intended to be obligatory either upon the father or son."

One other item of evidence deserves specific mention. The plaintiff testified that the Monsens kept their wills in a safe, and that with these wills were duplicate copies of a memorandum which he had seen several times, the last occasion being some seven years before the trial. He did not undertake to give the exact wording of the memorandum, but declared that:

> "It stated something like this: 'We want it understood that we have raised and adopted Hine G. Monsen, and that at the time of our death, we want all of the property that we possess at that time to go to him.' I believe it also stated at the conclusion that, 'this being in accordance with an agreement with Peter Grevie.'"

This vague and uncertain testimony does not meet the requirements of the rule that there must be clear and distinct evidence of the precise terms of an agreement to devise or to make one an heir. The memorandum, as recalled by the witness, leaves the terms of the agreement indefinite in various respects. There is nothing to indicate what was to be done in return for the agreement of the Monsens, or what other consideration, if any, there was for their agreement. Again, so far as the language quoted shows, the obligation assumed by the Monsens under their "agreement with Peter Grevie" was simply that the plaintiff should be raised and adopted by them. The words "we want * * * the property * * * to go to him" are suggestive of a present desire rather than of a contractual obligation to have the property go thus. Something of the same uncertainty attaches to the plaintiff's testimony that Monsen had once said to him that he had made another will in his favor, "and this will is in accordance with an agreement with your father leaving all the property to you." It must be remembered that testimony of oral declarations or admissions (particularly those of persons who have been silenced by death) form a class of evidence which is not highly favored in the law. "Admissions are generally regarded as weak evidence for the proof of a fact, and are never conclusive of the facts stated, or of the inferences to be drawn therefrom; and our statute requires the jury to be instructed, on all proper occasions, 'that the evidence of the oral admissions of a party ought to be viewed with caution.' Code Civ. Proc., § 2071, subd. 4." Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 297, 30 Pac. 529, 534; Englebretson v. Ind. Acc. Com., 170 Cal. 798, 151 Pac. 421.

Beyond all this, the evidence relied on, even if it could be regarded as tending to show with sufficient precision the making of any contract, fails utterly to support the precise contract alleged and found. The only agreement which may be said to be even suggested by the proof is one to leave all of the property to the plaintiff. The agreement alleged and found, and the one which the court undertakes to enforce, is one to give the plaintiff a child's share of the estate, an agreement which the court interprets as one calling for a third of the estate.

[4] Without further elaboration, we repeat that the evidence is entirely insufficient to justify the finding which we have discussed. Accordingly, the judgment cannot be supported. We are not unmindful of the settled rule that the findings of a trial court upon conflicting evidence are conclusive here, and that all reasonable inferences are to be indulged to support the findings. This rule does not, however, justify the sustaining of a finding when it has not the support of substantial evidence.

It becomes unnecessary to consider other points made by the appellants.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; LAWLOR, J.

3. Master and Servant 🔑369—Workmen's Compensation—Injuries Outside State.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, before its amendment by St. 1915, p. 1079, giving the commission jurisdiction over injuries occurring outside the state in certain cases, the commission had no jurisdiction over such injuries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. 🔑369.]

In Bank. Proceeding for workmen's compensation by Oscar Anderson, opposed by the North Alaska Salmon Company. From an award by the Industrial Accident Commission, the employer applies for writ of review against A. J. Pillsbury, Will J. French and Harris Weinstock, as members of said Commission. Award annulled.

Wise & O'Connor, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents. Chickering & Gregory, Ira A. Campbell, and McCutchen, Olney & Willard, all of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

SLOSS, J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission.

The petitioner, North Alaska Salmon Company, is a corporation engaged in the business of packing and selling salmon. Its packing operations are conducted in the territory of Alaska. Its office and principal place of business are in the city and county of San Francisco. Oscar Anderson was employed by the petitioner, under a contract made in San Francisco, for the season of 1914. He was injured while working in Alaska. The commission awarded him compensation. The only point made by the petitioner is that at the time of Anderson's injury the commission had no jurisdiction to allow compensation for injuries received beyond the limits of this state.

The case is before us on rehearing. Our former decision, upholding the jurisdiction of the commission, was based on the theory that the workmen's compensation law entered into and became a part of the contract of employment, and that, where such contract was made in this state, the statute fixed the rights of the parties with respect to any injury arising out of the employment, wherever such injury might occur.

[1] Upon further study, we are satisfied that this view is not tenable. The liability of the employer to pay compensation arises from the law itself, rather than from any agreement of the parties. The law operates upon a status, i. e., that of employer and employé, and affixes certain rights and obligations to that status. True, the relation of employer and employé has its inception in a contract, but, once the relation is created, its incidents depend, not upon the agreement of the parties, but upon the provisions of the law. Our decisions upholding the validity of this legislation have emphasized, and found support in, the proposition that the statute is one regulating the rights and obligations attaching to the status of employer and employé. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 699, 151 Pac. 398; Western Metal Co. v. Pillsbury, 156 Pac. 491. If the right to compensation rested upon contract, it would seem to follow that such right would exist only in cases of employment under agreements made after the passage of the statute. But it has never been supposed that any such limitation could be upheld. There is a manifest difference between a compulsory act, like ours, and elective acts, like the Roseberry Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 796) and various statutes in other states, under which the compensation provisions are dependent upon the election or consent of the employer and employé. It may well be said that the rights declared by an elective statute have their origin and sanction in the agreement of the parties to be bound by the statute. Under a compulsory statute, however, the correlative rights and obligations are not founded upon contract. Nor do they correspond with the legal conception of a tort, since a liability is imposed without regard to the element of wrongdoing on the part of the person charged. The obligation is to be defined as a statutory one, attached by law to a given status.

The principle here involved was carefully considered and well stated by the Supreme Court of Alabama in Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Carroll, 97 Ala. 126, 11 South. 803, 18 L. R. A. 433, 38 Am. St. Rep. 163. That case turned upon the applicability of the Employers' Liability Act of Alabama, abrogating certain common-law defenses, to an action in Alabama for injuries sustained in Mississippi. The contention that the Alabama law governed because it was a part of the contract of employment (which had been made in Alabama) was met and answered by the court upon convincing grounds. The conclusion reached is summarized in these words, which are entirely applicable to the situation now before us:

> "The duties and liabilities incident to the relation between the plaintiff and the defendant which are involved in this case are not imposed by and do not rest in or spring from the contract between the parties. The only office of the contract * * * is the establishment of a relation between them, that of master and servant; and it is upon that relation, that incident or consequence of the contract, and not upon the rights of the parties under the contract, that our statute operates. The law is not concerned with the contractual stipulations, except in so far as to determine from them that the relation upon which it is to operate exists. Finding this relation, the statute imposes certain duties and liabilities on the parties to it wholly regardless of the stipulations of the contract as to the rights of the parties under it, and, it may be, in the teeth of such stipulations."

See, also, Dormidy v. Sharon Boiler Works (C. C.) 127 Fed. 485.

[2] The question resolves itself, then, into one of the correct interpretation of our statute. We may assume, without undertaking to decide the point, that the Legislature has power to enact a statute providing that employers shall be liable to pay compensation to injured employés whose employment was created by this state, regardless of the place where the injury may have been sustained. So assuming, however, we are called upon to determine whether the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act was designed to cover any injuries other than those occurring within the boundaries of California. Ordinarily the statutes of a state have no force beyond its boundaries. Sutherland, Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 13; Story, Conflict of Laws (8th Ed.) §§ 7, 22. Except within the domain committed to the control of the federal government, the states of the Union are "severally sovereign, independent, and foreign to each other in regard to their internal and domestic affairs." Stevens v. Brown, 20 W. Va. 450, 459. Although a state may have the power to legislate concerning the rights and obligations of its citizens with regard to transactions occurring beyond its boundaries, the presumption is that it did not intend to give its statutes any extraterritorial effect. The intention to make the act operative with respect to occurrences outside the state will not be declared to exist unless such intention is clearly expressed or reasonably to be inferred "from the language of the act or from its purpose, subject-matter, or history." Kenerson v. Thames Towboat Co., 89 Conn. 367, 94 Atl. 372, L. R. A. 1916A, 436; Gould's Case, 215 Mass. 480, 102 N. E. 693, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 372; Merrill v. B. & L. R. Co., 63 N. H. 259.

[3] We find in the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, as it read at the time of the injury for which compensation was here awarded, nothing to indicate that the compensation provisions were intended to apply to injuries occurring in foreign jurisdictions. Section 12 of the act, the section which defines the conditions upon which the right to compensation rests, simply declares that liability for the compensation provided shall exist where the given conditions concur. Nothing is said about the place of injury. Nor is there in other portions of the act any language from which the intention to extend the operation of the statute beyond the territorial limits of the state may be inferred. On the contrary, the statute contains several provisions which may fairly be thought to manifest a contrary purpose. Thus section 12 declares that the liability for the compensation provided shall be "in lieu of any other liability whatsoever." As was said in Davis v. N. Y. & N. E. R. Co., 143 Mass. 301, 9 N. E. 815, 58 Am. Rep. 138:

> "It must certainly be the right of each state to determine by its laws under what circumstances an injury to the person will afford a cause of action."

Unquestionably the Legislature of Alaska has full authority to determine the conditions upon which liability shall exist for an injury sustained within the boundaries of that territory, and this right could not be limited by the circumstance that the injured person might be a nonresident of Alaska, and in the employment of another nonresident under a contract of employment made elsewhere. It will not be supposed that the Legislature of this state undertook to pass a law which would trench upon the sovereign powers of any other jurisdiction. But the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act would embody such attempt if it were construed in such manner as to create, to the exclusion of any other liability, a liability to pay for injuries received in another jurisdiction. In other words, the fact that the compensation provided for in the act is in lieu of any other liability whatsoever is a strong indication that the Legislature had in mind only liability within the exclusive control of the Legislature of this state; that is to say, liability arising from occurrences within this state. Some force is added to this conclusion by a comparison of the provisions of the act with respect to subjects other than compensation. Several of these, dealing with such matters as safety regulations, supervision of places of employment, and investigation of industrial accidents, are expressly limited in their operation to this state. Sections 51[6], 56, 72[a]. The provisions looking to the safety and protection of workmen and those providing for compensation are correlative and component parts of a single scheme. It appearing that the commission's authority with reference to one branch of its duties is confined to objects and events within the state, it may well be concluded that the compensation provisions were intended to be operative to no greater extent. But, whether or not much weight is to be given to this consideration, certain it is that there is nothing in the act which by express words or clear implication manifests an intent to have it operate extraterritorially, and that, as already stated, the settled rules of interpretation prohibit our giving it any such effect. It may be noted, in this connection, that the Legislature of 1915 amended the act by adding to it a new section (75a) declaring that the commission should have jurisdiction "over all controversies arising out of injuries suffered without the territorial limits of this state in those cases where the injured employé is a resident of this state at the time of the injury and the contract of hire was made in this state." Stats. 1915, p. 1101. This section was obviously not designed as a limitation upon the jurisdiction theretofore vested in the commission. It was intended, rather, as a grant of power. The fact that the Legislature deemed it necessary to declare specifically that the jurisdiction of the commission should extend to a certain class of cases of injuries arising beyond the state is more or less significant as indicating that the lawmaking body itself did not consider the original statute as covering extraterritorial injuries.

The question under discussion has been considered in other jurisdictions, but the authorities are not entirely in harmony. The Supreme Court of Connecticut has held that the statute of that state gave a right to compensation, even though the injuries had been sustained beyond the boundaries of the state. Kennerson v. Thames T. B. Co., 89 Conn. 367, 94 Atl. 372, L. R. A. 1916A, 436. A like ruling was made by an inferior court of New Jersey. Deeny v. Wright & C. L. Co. (Com. Pl.) 36 N. J. Law J. 121. And a later decision of the Supreme Court of New Jersey seems to reach the same conclusion. Rounsaville v. Cent. R. Co., 94 Atl. 392, 87 N. J. Law, 371. The statutes of both New Jersey and Connecticut, however, made the scheme of compensation dependent upon the election or consent of the parties to the employment, and the decisions cited are put on the ground that the rights of the parties are contractual—a position which cannot be applied to a compulsory statute like ours. It has also been held that the New York statute gives a right of compensation for injuries sustained beyond the borders of the state. Spratt v. S. & G. Co., 168 App. Div. 403, 153 N. Y. Supp. 505. But the New York statute, while compulsory, is one providing for the payment of compensation out of an insurance fund, and the conclusion of the court was based upon the circumstance that the amount of premiums is calculated upon the pay roll and number of men employed, "without regard to the fact that from time to time some of them work outside of the state." This ground of decision has no relevancy to the provisions of our law. A more recent decision is Gooding v. Ott (W. Va.) 87 S. E. 862, L. R. A. 1916D, 637, where it was held that compensation was payable under the West Virginia statute to the widow of a miner killed while working in Maryland; the mine in which he was employed being located on the boundary line between the two states. The conclusion of the court was founded upon the grounds that, the statute being elective, the rights of the parties rested upon contract, and that the particular language of the West Virginia act evidenced an intent to have the compensation provisions apply to all workmen except those "who are employed wholly without the state." On both grounds the case is readily differentiated from the one before us.

On the other hand, there is strong authority in support of the proposition that workmen's compensation statutes, in the absence of express declaration that they shall operate extraterritorially, are not to be given such effect. This has been the uniform course of ruling under the English statute (Hicks v. Maxton, 1 B. W. C. C. 150; Tomalin v. S. Pearson & Son, Ltd. [1909] 2 K. B. Div. 61; Schwartz v. Indiana Rubber, etc., Co., 1912, 2 K. B. Div. 299), and the holding has been the same in Massachusetts under the act of that state (Gould's Case, 215 Mass. 480, 102 N. E. 693, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 372).

For these reasons we conclude that, under the statute as it read at the time of Anderson's injury, the commission had no jurisdiction to award compensation.

The award is annulled.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by William Bayly against Henry E. Lee. From an adverse judgment and order, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph K. Hutchinson, of San Francisco (Walter Slack, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Clayberg & Whitmore, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This action was brought to recover damages for breach of contract. The court granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and entered judgment accordingly. Plaintiff appeals from the jugment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleges that the defendant is an attorney at law, and that on December 2, 1909, the parties entered into a written agreement, whereby the plaintiff employed and retained the defendant as his attorney to enforce plaintiff's rights under a certain contract between said plaintiff and one Dolbear, dated November 1, 1905. It is alleged that the plaintiff paid the defendant $500 as partial compensation for the services thus to be performed; that the defendant wholly failed and neglected to do the things agreed to be done by him; that under the agreement between plaintiff and Dolbear plaintiff was to receive stock of the value of $50,000; and that Dolbear has become unable to transfer said stock or to pay the value thereof to the plaintiff. Judgment is asked for $50,500.

[1] The answer denies, among other things, that the defendant failed to perform his obligations under his agreement with plaintiff. It is true that the denial is expressed in an imperfect way. We cannot, however, agree with the appellant's contention that there is a total failure to raise an issue with respect to the performance by the defendant of his agreement. Furthermore, the record shows that the plaintiff tried the case upon the theory that defendant's failure to perform was in issue. Under these circumstances, this court will not entertain the suggestion, made for the first time on appeal, that the attempted denial was ineffectual for any purpose. Green v. L. S. & P. F. Co., 46 Cal. 408; Spiers v. Duane, 54 Cal. 176; Sprigg v. Barber, 122 Cal. 573, 55 Pac. 419.

[2] At the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence a paper claimed to be a copy of the agreement of November, 1905, between himself and Dolbear. On defendant's objection, the paper was not admitted, and its exclusion is one of the errors assigned. The ruling, if erroneous, was, however, harmless. An inspection of the paper shows that, if it had been admitted, it would, with the other evidence in the case, have demonstrated the propriety of the ruling granting defendant's motion for a nonsuit. This contract was signed by Dolbear alone. By its terms he agreed to sell and deliver to Bayly, in consideration of the sum of $2,500, 5,000 shares of stock to be issued to him in a company to be incorporated for the purpose of taking over and exploiting certain mineral claims, or to assign to said Bayly an equivalent interest in the proceeds of said mining claims if the proposed incorporation should not be consummated. $1,250 was to be paid at the time of signing the contract, and the remainder when the contemplated transaction involving the claims should be completed. Bayly was not bound to pay the second $1,250, but was given merely an option to pay the same; it being agreed that Dolbear should be under no obligation in case Bayly did not make the payment at the time specified or on demand.

[3, 4] Dolbear's undertaking to transfer being conditional upon the payment of the second $1,250, Bayly was not in a position to demand performance until he made payment or tender of this amount. Civ. Code, § 1439. There is no evidence that such payment or tender was ever made. So far as the proof shows, the time never arrived when the plaintiff had any rights to enforce against Dol-bear, or when the defendant, as plaintiff's attorney, could take steps to compel performance by Dolbear. The payment necessary to the maturing of plaintiff's claim against Dolbear was a matter in the control of the plaintiff, not of his attorney. Until plaintiff does what is necessary to establish a cause of action, he will not be entitled to ask the defendant to proceed in his behalf against Dolbear, by suit or otherwise. The evidence therefore fails to show that the defendant did not do all that he was required to do under the contract. This was one of the grounds specified in the motion for a nonsuit, and it was sufficient to justify the granting of the motion.

Various rulings on the admission of evidence are assigned as errors, but none of them could have any bearing upon the matter already discussed. There is no occasion, therefore, to consider them.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Quo warranto on the relation of the Amestoy Estate Company against the Van Nuys Lighting District of Los Angeles County and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Leonard B. Slosson and Edgar Sharp, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. John D. Fredericks, O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, and Walter K. Tuller, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The court below sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, and the plaintiff refused to amend, whereupon judgment was given for the defendants.

The action is in quo warranto to determine the validity of the incorporation and organization of the Van Nuys lighting district of Los Angeles county. Said lighting district claims to be a public corporation organized under and in pursuance of the act of March 20, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 551). The other defendants are members of the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, which board is, by section 11 of said act, given the authority to exercise the powers of districts within the county organized under the act. The object of the act, as stated in its title, is to allow unincorporated towns and villages to maintain systems of street lights on the public highways and to provide for the formation, management, and control of highway lighting districts.

The complaint alleges that the defendant district claims to be a lighting district formed in pursuance of the act, and that the supervisors of the county, claiming to be ex officio supervisors of said pretended lighting district, are purchasing equipment for lighting certain highways therein, and otherwise assuming to act under the authority of said law, and that, in that assumed capacity, they have levied a special tax upon the land within the district, including certain land owned by the relator, Amestoy Estate Company; that said defendant was never organized or established as provided by law, and is not a legally organized or existing lighting district. The proceedings had to organize the district are set forth at length. The territory within the boundaries of the district consists of about 50,000 acres of land, being approximately 13 miles in length and 6 miles in width. Within this territory are two unincorporated villages, one known as Van Nuys, occupying about 640 acres, and having about 350 inhabitants; the other known as Owensmouth, covering 320 acres, and having about 100 inhabitants. These two villages are 10 miles apart. The balance of the land of the district consists of farming lands, grazing lands, and unproductive mountain land. The entire population outside of said two villages does not exceed 300 people, and consists of persons living in houses widely separated, often several miles from the nearest neighbor. The relator owns 4,500 acres of land within the district upon which only 25 persons reside, and no part of it is within a mile of either of said villages.

[1] It is contended by appellant that the act authorizes the formation of lighting districts only within the limits of an unincorporated town or village, and hence that the formation of a district including 4,500 acres of land devoted to farming, and not inhabited as a village at all, is not within the authority given by the law. We think the point is well taken. The title of the act is as follows:

> "An act to allow unincorporated towns and villages to establish, equip and maintain systems of street lights on public highways; to provide for the formation, government and operation of highway lighting districts; the calling and holding of elections in such districts; the assessment, collection, custody and disbursement of taxes therein; and the creation of ex officio boards of supervisors."

Section 1 defines the meaning of certain words and phrases used in the act. Section 2 is as follows:

> "Any unincorporated town or village of this state may establish a highway lighting district for the purpose of installing and maintain a system of street lights on public highways, for the better protection of its residents, in accordance with the provisions of this act."

Section 3 provides that:

> "Upon the application, by petition, of twenty-five or more, taxpayers and residents of said town or village, to the board of supervisors of the county in which the said town or village is situated, praying for the formation of a public highway lighting district," the supervisors must proceed in the manner prescribed to call an election, and thereupon the district may be formed.

These provisions clearly show that the scope of the act, so far as the question of territory is concerned, is limited to unincorporated towns or villages, and that it does not include large areas of territory devoted exclusively to agricultural purposes, and not coming within any definition applicable to towns or villages. The words "town" and "village" are of common use and have a well-defined meaning. The word "town" is defined by Webster as:

> "In general, any large collection of houses and buildings, public and private, constituting a distinct place with a name and not incorporated as a city."

He defines a village as:

> "Any small aggregation of houses in the country, being in general, less in number than in a town or city and more than in a hamlet."

The word "town" is also defined as meaning, in popular use:

> "A large, closely populated place, * * * as distinguished from the country, or from rural communities." Denver v. Coulehan, 20 Colo. 471, 39 Pac. 425, 27 L. R. A. 751.

Also as:

> "An aggregation of inhabitants, and a collection of occupied dwellings and other buildings." Siskiyou, etc., v. Rostel, 121 Cal. 513, 53 Pac. 1118.

Also as:

> "A place where there are a number of adjacent occupied dwellings." Klauber v. Higgins, 117 Cal. 460, 49 Pac. 466.

There is no substantial difference between an unincorporated town and a village except that perhaps the latter is usually understood to be smaller than a town. With respect to the boundaries of such places, it is true that they are usually not well defined. The line where the village or town ceases and the country begins cannot usually be located with precision, although it is seldom difficult to locate it approximately.

[2] It is suggested that the statement in the title of the act that it is "to provide for the formation, government and operation of highway lighting districts" indicates that it was designed to authorize the formation of said districts anywhere within the county, whether within a town or village or elsewhere. But the title does not constitute the act. The only provision of the act authorizing the formation of said districts, so far as territory is concerned, is found in section 2, above quoted. This provides simply that "any unincorporated town or village of this state" may establish such district. It is true that it proceeds to say that the district may be established by such town or village for the purpose of maintaining lights on "public highways." But this is immediately followed by the statement that this is to be done for the better protection "of its residents," thus again, by necessary implication, limiting the operation of the act to the confines of the town or village. This is further shown by the language of section 3, providing that the persons who petition for such district must be taxpayers and residents of said town or village. It cannot be seriously contended that language of that character can be expanded by construction so as to authorize the board of supervisors, on petition of the inhabitants of a town or village embracing 640 acres of land to order the incorporation of a lighting district embracing over 70 square miles of territory and 50,000 acres, sparsely settled and devoted to agricultural purposes, or vacant and unoccupied, situated in the adjacent country. The petitioners in the present case were all residents of the village of Van Nuys. We cannot conceive that the Legislature intended to authorize such a proceeding. Manifestly, the chief purpose of such an organization would be to provide for lighting the streets of the more closely populated region comprising the town or village. It would be unfair and unjust to compel the owners of agricultural lands receiving no material protection or benefit from such lights exceeding that of the general public to pay the greater part of the expense thereof, as would necessarily be the case if a district such as that here contemplated should be formed and maintained. The only fair and reasonable construction of the act is that districts for which it provides are intended to be limited territorially to the town or village whose residents and taxpayers petition therefor. Doubtless the board of supervisors would have much discretion upon the question whether or not any particular parcel of land could reasonably be included as part of such town or village. The courts should be loath to set aside the proceeding for error in this particular, and would not do so unless the unwarranted inclusion is clear. Here there can be no doubt. The area included without authority is so vast that it can only be regarded as a plain disregard of the statute.

We need not determine in this case whether or not the corporation was wholly void. It is enough that it was void in so far as the land of the relator is concerned. The lighting district and the defendants as ex officio its managing board were without authority to exercise any of the powers given to them by the act of 1909 and the amendments of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 447) thereof, upon or over the relator's land. To that extent, at least, the defendants claimed and usurped a corporate franchise which they did not lawfully possess.

The respondents call our attention to the act of May 29, 1915, effective August 8, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 939), declaring that every lighting district established under the provisions of the act of 1909, by resolution of the board of supervisors of the county, entered in its minutes, is a valid lighting district from the date of such order and that all proceedings and actions of such district under said law are ratified, affirmed, and declared to be legal. This district was formed in August, 1912. The judgment in this case was given April 24, 1913, and the appeal was filed in this court on July 21, 1913. Section 10 of the act of 1909 itself declares that the order establishing the district entered in the minutes of the board of supervisors is conclusive of the regularity of all prior proceedings and of the existence and validity of the district.

[3-5] A curative act or a conclusive evidence clause in a statute is effective to cure all defects resulting from a failure to comply with provisions which are merely directory of the mode of the exercise of the power. But defects and omissions which go to the jurisdiction of the board to act at all, and which make their action absolutely void, cannot be cured in this manner. Ramish v. Hartwell, 126 Cal. 443, 58 Pac. 920; Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 359, 80 Pac. 81; Kelly v. Luning, 76 Cal. 309, 18 Pac. 335; People v. Lynch, 51 Cal. 19, 21 Am. Rep. 677; Brady v. King, 53 Cal. 44; People v. Goldtree, 44 Cal. 323. In Fallbrook v. Bradley, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 164 U. S. 174, 41 L. Ed. 369, the United States Supreme Court had under consideration the validity of proceedings for the formation of an irrigation district in this state and of the assessments made by such district. In all substantial particulars regarding this question the act was similar to the lighting district act here involved. The court recognized the fact that the formation of such districts involved two distinct features, one of which was the creation of a public corporation, and the other the levying of an assessment or special tax upon property benefited by the proposed improvement. With respect to the creation of the corporation the court said:

> "There is nothing in the essential nature of such a corporation, so far as its creation only is concerned, which requires notice to or hearing of the parties included therein before it can be formed. It is created for a public purpose, and it rests in the discretion of the Legislature when to create it, and with what powers to endow it."

See, also, People v. California Fish Co., 166 Cal. 606, 610, 138 Pac. 79.

With respect to the other consequences the court said:

> "In the act under consideration, however, the establishment of its boundaries and the purposes for which the district is created, if it be finally organized by reason of the approving vote of the people, will almost necessarily be followed by and result in an assessment upon all the lands included within the boundaries of the district. The Legislature thus in substance provides for the creation not alone of a public corporation, but of a taxing district whose boundaries are fixed, not by the Legislature, but, after a hearing, by the board of supervisors."

The court then proceeds to declare that, when the power to form such district is delegated to a local board or tribunal, it acts judicially in fixing the boundaries, and the parties whose lands are proposed to be included are entitled to a hearing upon the question of benefits, before the formation of the district, and to have their lands excluded if it appears that they are not benefited. Of like effect is Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 8 Sup. Ct. 921, 31 L. Ed. 763; Parsons v. District of Columbia, 170 U. S. 52, 18 Sup. Ct. 521, 42 L. Ed. 943; Londoner v. Denver, 210 U. S. 385, 28 Sup. Ct. 708, 52 L. Ed. 1103; and Brookes v. Oakland, 160 Cal. 423, 117 Pac. 433. The act of 1909 provided for no hearing upon this question. In effect, it gave to 25 taxpayers and residents of any unincorporated town or village the power to determine what land should be included in the district to be formed, and made no provision for any inquiry as to benefits or change of the boundaries fixed by them in their petition or for any hearing upon the subject. Under the above decisions the attempt thus to form a local taxing district is without legality and void. This was expressly decided with respect to a similar statute in Moulton v. Parks, 64 Cal. 166, 30 Pac. 612, and Brandenstein v. Hoke, 101 Cal. 130, 35 Pac. 562. The conclusion necessarily follows that all proceedings imposing taxes upon the land of the relator are absolutely void because of the lack of jurisdiction to act in the matter. Under the decisions above cited the curative act of 1915 was ineffective to revive or validate the previous proceedings of the district. These points relating to the curative act have not been argued by counsel on either side.

There are other questions not argued which also may arise in the future progress of this case, and which we think it well to mention. It may be claimed that the validating act, though ineffective to legalize taxes previously levied, had the effect to create anew a corporation for municipal purposes embracing the entire district. If so, the question would arise whether such new corporation possessed the powers defined in the act of 1909, or was left without defined powers, as suggested in People v. California Fish Co., 166 Cal. 610, 138 Pac. 79. Furthermore, on May 21, 1915, practically all the territory included in this lighting district, except the 320 acres constituting the village of Owensmouth, was annexed to and became a part of the city of Los Angeles. Under its charter that city has full power and control of its streets, of all conduits and apparatus for the transmission of electricity therein, and of the granting of franchises for such purposes. City Charter, § 2, subd. 7, St. 1909, p. 1291; section 2, subd. 25, St. 1905, p. 994; section 31, St. 1889, p. 464; section 146, St. 1905, pp. 984, 999. As these matters come within the domain of municipal affairs, it may be doubted whether the Legislature has any power to provide for the creation of lighting districts, or to create them directly, within the boundaries of a city having such powers under a freeholder's charter. It may also be claimed that the validating act is, in effect, a mere evasion of the constitutional mandate against the creation of corporations for municipal purposes by special laws. Article 11, § 6. Upon all these questions we express no opinion.

[6] The attempt to validate a tax levied by a pretended corporation having no legal authority over the property taxed would, if given effect, be equivalent to the imposition of an obligation by statute without due process of law. For the reasons we have given, we think the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, and that the case should be remanded for further proceedings.

BOSCUS et al. v. BOHLIG et al.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1075—WAIVER OF ERRORS.

Where respondents who, as plaintiffs below, had judgment on the pleadings preferred to discuss the merits, their contention that appellants were not entitled to review will be treated as waived.

2. PLEADING 🔑350(3)—MOTION FOR JUDGMENT ON PLEADINGS—EFFECT.

A motion for judgment on the pleadings admits, in the same sense as does a demurrer, the truth of the allegations of the answer.

3. PLEADING 🔑345(2)—ANSWER—DENIAL ON INFORMATION AND BELIEF.

In a proceeding to foreclose a mechanic's lien the verified complaint alleged that plaintiffs as copartners entered into a written contract with defendants, the owners of the property, to furnish plumbing and gas fitting work in a building for the sum of $2,500, that the work had been fully performed according to the contract, and that no part of the contract price, which was the reasonable value of the work, had been paid. Defendants denied on information and belief the due performance of the work, the alleged reasonable value of the work, and the filing of a lien which was averred. Held that, while plaintiffs' motion for judgment on the pleadings admitted all facts well pleaded, plaintiffs were entitled to judgment on the pleadings; defendants' denial on information and belief being frivolous and insufficient to put any matter in issue, because relating to matters as to which defendants must have had knowledge.

4. MECHANICS' LIENS 🔑161(3)—RIGHT TO—VALUE OF WORK.

The provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, that a mechanic's lien shall not exceed the reasonable value of the work, does not apply to contracts made directly with the owner; and where the contract was made with the owner and the work accepted, the owner is liable for the full contract price and a lien for that amount may be procured.

5. PLEADING 🔑126—ANSWER—DENIAL.

Where, in a proceeding to foreclose a mechanic's lien, plaintiff alleged due performance of the contract, defendants' denial of due performance of all the terms and conditions of the contract was insufficient to put any matter in issue, but was instead an admission of substantial performance of the contract.

6. MECHANICS' LIENS 🔑78 — NOTICE — ACCEPTANCE.

Where one of the owners of land on which was constructed a building filed no notice of disclaimer pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, and accepted the work, her acceptance conclusively establishes her knowledge of the work which may be constructive as well as actual, and so entitles materialmen, etc., to perfect liens on her portion of the land.

7. INTEREST 🔑60—RIGHT TO—JUDGMENT.

Where contractors were entitled to interest accruing before judgment, it is proper for the judgment to add such interest to the principal so that the aggregate amount will thereafter draw interest.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by John M. Boscus and Peter J. Boscus, copartners, doing business as Boscus Bros., against John H. Bohlig and Lotta Bohlig, his wife and others, to foreclose a mechanic's lien. From a judgment for plaintiffs on the pleadings, the first-named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. T. Kearney and Phil J. Strubel, both of San Francisco, for appellants. P. A. Bergerot and A. P. Dessouslavy, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment entered on the pleadings, in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien.

The complaint was verified. The allegations thereof were in brief that John H. and Lotta Bohlig were at all times specified the owners of certain described real property; that the former was at all times the reputed owner; that plaintiffs had entered into a written contract to furnish certain plumbing and gas fitting work in a building on said land for the sum of $2,500, to be paid in stipulated installments; that the work had been fully performed by the plaintiffs according to the contract; that no part of the contract price (which was alleged to be the reasonable value of the work) had been paid; and that a claim of lien against the property in due form had been filed within the time limited by statute at a cost of $1.90 for verification and recording. The prayer was the usual one in such cases.

The answer denied, on information and belief, the existence of the copartnership of plaintiffs, the due performance of the contract, the alleged reasonable value of the work provided for, and the filing of the lien. By one of the paragraphs of the answer defendants assert that John H. Bohlig at all times mentioned in the complaint was the owner of a described portion of the property in question, and that he and his wife, Lotta Bohlig, owned the remaining part of it. There was no denial of the execution of the contract, the completion of all that was thereby required, nor the acceptance on or about January 21, 1914, by both defendants of the work and building. It is to be noted that on information and belief defendants denied that "$2,500 or any other sum" was the reasonable value of the work, and that plaintiffs had "duly kept and performed all the terms and conditions of their said agreement."

[1] Respondents at the outset assert that the proceedings in the superior court may not be reviewed in the absence of a bill of exceptions (citing Hawley v. Kocher, 123 Cal. 77, 55 Pac. 696), and that the granting or denial of a motion for judgment on the pleadings is no part of the judgment roll (citing McAbee v. Randall, 41 Cal. 136, Douglas v. Dakin, 46 Cal. 49–52, and Hemme v. Hays, 55 Cal. 337). They prefer, however, to discuss the matter upon its merits, and regarding their preference as a waiver of the suggested point we will consider the pleadings in the light of the motion for judgment thereon which, according to the decree, was made and granted.

[2, 3] Appellant's first contention is that as the motion for judgment on the pleadings admits, in the same sense as does a demurrer, the truth of the allegations of the answer, and as that pleading denies the amount claimed or any amount is or was the reasonable value of the work performed and the materials furnished, the court should have overruled the motion, and should have compelled the plaintiffs to prove such reasonable value. It is true that the motion, like a demurrer, admits the truth of the facts pleaded in the answer, but by their answer defendants, by failing to deny, admit the facts pleaded in the verified complaint, namely, that $2,500 was the agreed contract price, that the work was completed by plaintiffs, and that it was accepted by the defendants. As against these solemn admissions their denial on information and belief that the work was of any value is so paltry as to amount to nothing at all. It requires no citation of authority to support the court in summarily disposing of such pleading, but authority is not wanting. In Loveland v. Garner, 74 Cal. 298–300, 15 Pac. 844, the court characterized denial upon information and belief of certain matters which must have been within the knowledge of defendants as an indulgence "in a playful frivolity not consistent with the solemnity of sworn pleadings in a court of justice." In Gribble v. Columbus Brewing Co., 100 Cal. 67, 34 Pac. 527, a defendant in possession of a brewery had denied on information and belief that certain appliances were attached to the realty and had become fixtures. It was held that the denial was insufficient. In Mulcahy v. Buckley, 100 Cal. 484, 35 Pac. 144, the defendant made the same sort of a denial of an averment that a claim of lien had been filed, and it was held that positive denial is necessary where the pleader has knowledge or means of acquiring knowledge which might enable him to traverse or to admit the unequivocal averments in the complaint. A defendant must admit or deny facts alleged by the plaintiff or must show how it happens that he is destitute of knowledge concerning such facts. Brown v. Scott, 25 Cal. 189–196. Other authorities sanctioning the entry of a judgment on the pleadings when the answer is sham and frivolous are Hemme v. Hays, 55 Cal. 337; Felch v. Beaudry, 40 Cal. 439; Montgomery v. Merrill, 62 Cal. 385–393; San Francisco v. Staude, 92 Cal. 560, 28 Pac. 778; Benham v. Connor, 113 Cal. 168, 45 Pac. 258.

[4] But appellants insist that since section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a mechanic's or materialman's lien shall not in any case exceed the reasonable value of the work done and materials furnished, the question of reasonable value is always one to be determined by the court. The language of section 1183 upon which appellants rely does not apply to one contracting directly with the owner, but has reference to subcontractors. The contracting parties are bound by the terms of their agreement where as in this case the persons for whom the work was performed and the materials were furnished admitted the execution of the contract, the completion of the work, and its acceptance by them.

[5] The attempted denial that plaintiffs had duly kept and performed all the terms and conditions of their agreement was utterly insufficient. It amounted to an admission that substantially all of the terms and conditions of the contract had been duly met and executed. Jones & Laughlin Steel Co. v. Abner Doble Co., 162 Cal. 497–500, 123 Pac. 290. As was pointed out in the opinion in that case the omission of a single rivet or bolt would satisfy the denial.

[6] Appellants say that since the land belongs in part to Lotta Bohlig, as shown by their verified answer, and no claim is made that she authorized or knew of the performance of the work, the judgment in its application to her is erroneous. There is no merit in this contention. No personal judgment against her was asked or given, but her undivided interest in the easterly 19 feet of the lot upon which the building was placed was properly subjected to the lien. If she had knowledge of the construction of the building she was responsible. Section 1192, Code Civ. Proc. She must have had such knowledge for she accepted the completed work. Constructive knowledge is as potent as actual cognizance of the performance of the work. Harmon Lumber Co. v. Brown, 165 Cal. 193–197, 131 Pac. 368; Gentle v. Britton, 158 Cal. 328–332, 111 Pac. 9. The circumstances admittedly true under the pleadings show both actual and constructive notice to Mrs. Bohlig of the building of the house. There was no pleading of any notice of disclaimer filed pursuant to section 1192, and as the filing of such notice is matter of defense (West Coast Lumber Co. v. Newkirk, 80 Cal. 275–277, 22 Pac. 231), the fact that she accepted the finished work is conclusive upon the question of her knowledge.

[7] Appellants contend and respondents concede that an error in the allowance of interest was made by the court in entering judgment. Interest on the full sum of $2,500 was allowed from the date of the completion of the work, but half of this amount was not payable until 30 days later. By failing to recognize this fact the court allowed excessive interest in the sum of $8.50. This error may be corrected by inserting in the judgment in lieu of the words, "with legal interest thereon from January 21, 1914, to the date hereof, making in all the sum of $2,581.16," the following:

> "With legal interest, as to $1,250 thereof, from January 21, 1914, to February 26, 1914, and as to the whole thereof from February 26, 1914, to the date hereof, making in all the sum of $2,572.66."

It was proper that by the judgment interest due prior thereto should be added to the principal, and that the aggregate amount should thereafter draw interest. Corcoran v. Doll, 32 Cal. 82–88; 22 Cyc. 1568.

This is a frivolous appeal made for delay, and therefore damages should be awarded (section 957, Code Civ. Proc.), even though the judgment will be amended by this court to correct a trifling error. Rountree v. I. X. L. Lime Co., 106 Cal. 62, 39 Pac. 16; 11 Cyc. 238. One of the counsel for appellants in his oral argument, after discoursing of a husband's duty to defend his wife's interests both in the trial court and here, says he cannot conceive that a husband should be penalized for defending in this case or for joining in this appeal. We do not see how even the high obligations which a husband owes to his wife nor the most knightly protection which he may feel bound to accord her and her property can excuse this altogether indefensible appeal which has needlessly occupied the time of this court and of counsel, and has delayed the closing of this litigation.

With the modification above suggested the judgment is affirmed, with costs to respondents, and in addition thereto $100 to be paid by appellants to respondents for the frivolous appeal.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

Supplementary Opinion.

In Bank.

PER CURIAM. It is ordered that the opinion herein be modified by striking therefrom the last paragraph, commencing with the words "This is a frivolous appeal," and ending with the words "delayed the closing of this litigation."

It is further ordered that the judgment heretofore given be modified to read as follows: "With the modification above suggested the judgment is affirmed, with costs to respondents."

1. WILLS 🔑130—OLOGRAPHIC WILLS—REQUISITES AND SUFFICIENCY.

Under Civ. Code, § 1277, defining an olographic will as one that is entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator, the omission of any of the three requirements is fatal.

2. WILLS 🔑130—OLOGRAPHIC WILLS—REQUISITES AND SUFFICIENCY.

A purported olographic will, to comply with the requirement that it be dated, must designate a certain day, month, and year.

4. WILLS 🔑130—OLOGRAPHIC WILLS—REQUISITES AND SUFFICIENCY.

While an olographic will must bear a designation in the testator's hand, and the day, month, and year, it is not necessary that the date so given shall be that upon which the paper was in fact written.

In an olographic will, a date which is incomplete because lacking a statement of the day, month, or year, does not satisfy the statutory definition; so that where the will bore the date March 22, one thousand, the discrepancy was so great that it was not entirely dated by the hand of the testator, and the will was invalid.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the estate of Robert A. Vance, wherein certain heirs, after probate of an instrument as the olographic will, filed a petition to revoke the probate. From a judgment dismissing the petition, the petitioners appeal. Reversed.

Clarence Coonan and Nat Schmulowitz, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Robert J. McGahie, Joseph H. Mayer, and George D. Perry, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. On October 16, 1914, a paper was admitted to probate as the olographic will of Robert A. Vance, deceased. Within due time, certain heirs of said decedent filed their petition for the revocation of the probate, alleging that the paper was not dated except in the manner following:

> "I have subscribed my name and affixed my seal this 22nd day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand."

To this petition the executor and certain beneficiaries demurred. Their demurrers were sustained, and, the contestants declining to amend, the court gave judgment dismissing the petition for revocation of probate. The petitioners appeal.

[1] From the testimony on the original application for probate, it appears that the instrument was in fact written by Vance in the year 1910. The single question is whether the words "this 22nd day of March in the year of our Lord one thousand" constitute a sufficient dating. Section 1277 of the Civil Code defines an olographic will as one "that is entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator." The omission of any of these requirements is fatal.

> "The Legislature has seen fit to require three things to concur, for the execution of an olographic will, viz. that it be written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator. We are not at liberty to hold that the Legislature intended any one of these requirements to be of greater or less importance than the others." Estate of Martin, 58 Cal. 530.
> "It must be entirely written, it must be entirely dated, and it must be entirely signed by him." Estate of Billings, 64 Cal. 427, 1 Pac. 701.

Not only, therefore, will the instrument fail of validity as an olographic will if it bear no date at all (Estate of Martin, supra), but the same result will follow if the date be partly written by the hand of the testator and partly printed. In Estate of Billings, supra, the instrument bore the words "April 1st, 1880." The words "April 1st" were written by the deceased, the figures "1880" were printed. It was held that probate must be denied. So in Estate of Plumel, 151 Cal. 77, 90 Pac. 192, 121 Am. St. Rep. 100, where the paper was dated "January 12, 1904"; the figures "190" in the year date being printed.

[2] It is well settled that the paper, in order to comply with the requirement that it be dated, must designate a certain day, month and year. In Estate of Price, 14 Cal. App. 462, 112 Pac. 482, the paper read "Dated this ——— day of ———, 1906." The ruling was that this did not meet the demand of the statute. The case is approved in Estate of Carpenter, 156 Pac. 465, L. R. A. 1916E, 498, recently decided in this court; our holding being that a paper bearing the figures "10 1912" is not dated. The statute of Louisiana with reference to olographic wills is similar to our own, and the decisions in that state, too, are to the effect that a paper is not dated unless it contains a statement of the day, the month, and the year. Fuentes v. Gaines, 25 La. Ann. 85; Heffner v. Heffner, 48 La. Ann. 1088, 20 South. 281; Succession of Robertson, 49 La. Ann. 868, 21 South. 586, 62 Am. St. Rep. 672.

[3] The testator may use abbreviations in expressing the date. A will dated "Nov. 22/97" shows plainly enough that the date in the writer's mind was the 22d day of November, 1897, and is entitled to probate. Estate of Lakemeyer, 135 Cal. 28, 66 Pac. 961, 87 Am. St. Rep. 96. So where the date was "4-14-07" (Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 113 Pac. 130), the court saying that:

> "It would be difficult to find one at all versed in business or practical affairs who would not readily construe these numerals to mean April 14, 1907."

[4] While the will must bear a designation, in the testator's hand, of the day, the month, and the year of execution, it is not necessary that the date so given shall be that upon which the paper was in fact written. In Estate of Fay, 145 Cal. 82, 78 Pac. 340, 104 Am. St. Rep. 17, the instrument bore the date "May twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and fifty-nine." The evidence showed that the instrument could not have been written in the year 1859, but that it was probably written in the year 1889. It was held that the error did not affect the validity of the will; the ground of the decision being that the statute does not require that the instrument be "truly dated" or "correctly dated," but merely that it be dated.

[5] This brief review of the decisions points the distinction upon which the question in the present case turns. A date which is incomplete, because lacking a statement of either the day, the month, or the year of execution, does not satisfy the statutory definition of an olographic will. But the instrument, if it bear a statement of the day, the month, and the year, is not invalidated because one or more of these elements may be incorrectly given. The respondents contend that Vance's will, like that of Fay, contains everything necessary to a date, and that the words "one thousand" do designate a year, although incorrectly. We think, however, that the acceptance of this claim would require a strained and unreasonable view of the situation. The true date of the paper, if fully expressed in the form adopted by the writer, would have been the "22d day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and ten." Undoubtedly the writing of the words "one thousand" alone was due to an inadvertence of some kind. But these words form no more than a part of the complete date in the mind of the writer. Taking into consideration the nature, even more than the extent, of the discrepancy between the year given and the year of actual execution, the only fair inference is that Vance failed to complete the date which he had begun to write. It is as if, stating the year in figures instead of words, he had written "November 22, 1 ," or "November 22, 19 ." This would clearly have been an insufficient date. Succession of Swanson, 131 La. 53, 58 South. 1030; Id., 132 La. 606, 61 South. 685. In the Fay Case the words "eighteen hundred and fifty-nine" represented a complete date. The date was not, to be sure, that of the actual writing of the instrument, but it did contain everything necessary to specify a date as that upon which the testator declared the paper to have been written. Here, on the other hand, the words "one thousand" described, not a year which the testator intended to describe as that of the execution of his will, but only a part of the designation of a year, the rest having been, for some unknown reason, omitted. Stating it otherwise, in the Fay Case all that was needed to make the given date correspond to the true date was to change the erroneous word "fifty" to "eighty." Here the date given could not be made correct by any such substitution. To make it agree with the true date, we should have to add words to it; that is, we should have to add "nine hundred and ten" to the words "one thousand." We think it cannot fairly be said that the paper was "entirely dated by the hand of the testator." The demurrer to the petition should therefore have been overruled.

The judgment is reversed.

MESMER v. UHARRIET et al. (L. A. 3705.)

1. EASEMENTS 🔑18(2)—CREATION—WAY OF NECESSITY—LAND SURROUNDED BY GRANTOR'S LAND.

When a grantor conveys land shut off from access to the highway by his remaining lands or partly by his land, and partly by that of a stranger, a way of necessity arises over the adjoining land of the grantor and is vested in the grantee as an appurtenance to the estate granted.

2. EASEMENTS 🔑18(1)—CREATION—WAY OF NECESSITY—DECREE OF PARTITION.

Where, under decree of partition, one of the parcels set off in severalty is entirely inclosed by others and shut off from access to the highway, a right of way of necessity arises over the adjoining parcel and is vested in the allottee of the inclosed parcel as an appurtenance to his estate, under the theory that each allottee is the grantee of the interest of the various cotenants in parcel set off to him.

3. EASEMENTS 🔑61(9½)—WAY OF NECESSITY—SELECTION—FINDINGS.

Findings that access to the land of the plaintiff had been obtained indifferently over any of three routes, one over the land of defendants, and two over the land of other owners, and which are entirely vague with regard to the time during which the way over the land of the defendants is used, do not support a conclusion that a right of way across the land of defendants was selected and used in any such definite way as to impress an easement on the land.

4. EASEMENTS 🔑61(9½)—WAY OF NECESSITY—NECESSITY.

Findings that a roadway would be practicable and accessible for travel from plaintiff's land to the public highway over a route much shorter than that fixed over defendants' land in the decree, but that a creek bordering plaintiff's land and obstructing the shorter route would require some improvement, and would be unavailable in time of storm or flood without finding of the expense that it would be required to bridge the creek or finding of the length of time during which travel would be impeded by flood or storm in the absence of such bridge, the evidence being that the heaviest rains would render the creek unpassable for about a day and a half, do not show any such difficulty in taking the nearer road as to justify the imposition of the way of necessity upon the land of the defendant.

5. EASEMENTS 🔑22—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—NOTICE.

Civ. Code, § 19, provides that notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry is constructive notice of whatever he might have learned by prosecuting such inquiry. Section 3530 provides that which does not appear to exist is to be regarded as if it did not exist. The court found that defendants purchased land paying full value, that when they examined the land before buying it they found it fenced on three sides, and separated on the fourth from plaintiff's land by an irrigation ditch which was not bridged, and that there was no roadway over the land from plaintiff's parcel sufficiently well marked to give notice of a right of way, that their abstract of title showed no easement over the land, and that they had no actual notice that the plaintiff claimed such easement, and that at the time of such purchase there was on record a map which showed that plaintiff's lot was landlocked by the land purchased by defendants and other lands all of which had been previously partitioned from one tract. Held, that the recorded map of the original tract as partitioned was not constructive notice to defendants that plaintiff was entitled to a way of necessity over defendants' land, and that defendants were purchasers for value without notice, actual or constructive, of an easement, and took the land free from any such easement if it had existed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by Joseph Mesmer against Maria Uharriet and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, for appellants. D. K. Trask, Trask, Norton & Brown, and Edgar K. Brown, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land containing something over 7 acres situate in Los Angeles county. The defendants are the owners of a tract containing 50 acres, adjoining plaintiff's holding. Both parcels were originally a portion of the Rancho La Ballona, which in May, 1868, was partitioned by decree of the district court of the first judicial district of the state of California. By that decree the tract now owned by plaintiff was partitioned to the heirs of Augustine Machado. Title subsequently passed to Andres Briswalter, upon whose death the property passed to Louis Mesmer under decree of distribution filed in May, 1887. The plaintiff, Joseph Mesmer, has succeeded to the interest of Louis Mesmer.

The tract now owned by the defendants was, by the decree of partition, set off to Macedonio Aguilar. Through various mesne conveyances it passed in 1887 to Martin Uharriet and Pedro Uharriet. The defendants other than Martin succeeded to the interest of Pedro upon his death in 1909. The land of defendants lies to the north of plaintiff's land. By the decree of 1868 various other portions of the Rancho La Ballona, adjoining plaintiff's parcel on the east, south, and west, were partitioned to other cotenants.

The present action was brought to establish the right of plaintiff to an easement or way across the defendants' 50-acre tract from plaintiff's land to a road leading to the city of Los Angeles. The complaint was based upon the theories, first, that plaintiff was entitled to a way of necessity across defendants' land, and, second, that plaintiff had acquired a right of way across such land by prescription. The court made findings from which it concluded that plaintiff was entitled to a way of necessity as claimed. The findings do not support the claim of a way by prescription. The judgment was that plaintiff is entitled to a way of necessity of the width of 15 feet along a described course, running 1,500 feet or more in length over defendants' land, "so long as it may be necessary to gain access to and egress from the public highway." The defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

A public road, access to which is thus given by the judgment, runs to the west of the land of defendants. There is another road to the south of plaintiff's land and separated from it by parcels partitioned by the decree of 1868 to co-owners who are not parties to the present action. The first-mentioned road is known as First street, the other is described in the record as roadway "X." Between the land of plaintiff and that of defendants is an irrigation ditch. Between the land of plaintiff and that of the owners on the south is a creek known as Ballona creek. The distance from plaintiff's parcel to roadway "X" is about 350 feet.

[1, 2] When a grantor conveys land shut off from access to a road by the grantor's remaining land, or partly by his land and partly by that of a stranger, a way of necessity arises over the adjoining land of the grantor. Taylor v. Warnaky, 55 Cal. 350; Carey v. Rae, 58 Cal. 159; Kripp v. Curtis, 71 Cal. 62, 11 Pac. 879; Barnard v. Lloyd, 85 Cal. 132, 24 Pac. 658. Such right is vested in the grantee as an appurtenance to the estate granted. Kripp v. Curtis, supra. A way of necessity follows in like manner from a decree of partition, under which one of the parcels set off in severalty is entirely inclosed by others. The effect of such partition is to convey the interest of the various cotenants in the particular parcels to the allottees of those parcels. Each is, therefore, a grantor and a grantee, and the one to whom an inclosed piece is set off has the same rights against the others that he would have if they had joined in a voluntary conveyance to him. Blum v. Weston, 102 Cal. 362, 36 Pac. 778, 41 Am. St. Rep. 188.

It would seem to follow, therefore, that upon such partition the holder of the inclosed parcel has an equal and like right against each former cotenant whose land prevents his access to a highway. In the case of a way of necessity arising from a conveyance by a single grantor, it is said in Kripp v. Curtis, supra, that "the grantor may, in the first instance, designate the way to be pursued, and in the event of his failure so to do, the grantee may choose it for himself." It may be doubted whether this rule applies to a case of partition, where the right is against one of several grantors, but not against any particular one more than any other. Other things being equal, it is difficult to see why the owner of one of the surrounding parcels should assume the burden of the easement to the advantage of the others, or why the holder of the inclosed parcel should be entitled to select a particular neighbor and place the burden upon his land. Where there is but a single grantor, the right of way runs over his land, and his land alone. The designation of the route, whether by grantor or grantee, goes merely to the particular location of the easement upon that land. In case of a partition, however, a right of designation would enable the holder of the inclosed piece to select one of several tracts equally bound in the first instance, and thus make it bear the entire disadvantage of an onerous restriction. Where the partition decree fails to provide roads, it may be that the location of ways of necessity should be fixed by a subsequent proceeding in which the owners of all of the parcels which might be affected are brought in, and compensation may be provided to be paid to the owners of the parcel burdened with the easement by those who are relieved.

[3] It is not, however, necessary in this case to definitely resolve the doubts above suggested. Let it be assumed that the grantee, i. e., the predecessor of plaintiff, had the right, in the absence of any designation by the other parties to the partition, to select the line of egress from his land. It is claimed that such right was exercised in this case by the selection and use of a way along the line defined by the judgment in the court below. We think this position is not supported by either the findings or the evidence. The complaint alleges that at the time of the partition a roadway along this line was opened and laid out for the benefit of the grantees of the tract now owned by plaintiff. This allegation is denied by the answer. The court finds that up to the year 1886 there was a traveled way by which persons coming to the 50-acre parcel now belonging to defendants crossed that parcel to other ranches (not including the land of plaintiff) beyond, and that from this traveled way there was a turnout across the irrigating ditch on to the property owned by the plaintiff. This road, apparently, was not the one described in the complaint, for the finding goes on to declare that in 1886 a portion of the traveled way was closed and from that time forward "the traveled way was reverted to the land described" in the complaint. There is no finding, however, of the length of time, prior to 1886, during which any such way was used. A further finding states that for a few years access was had to plaintiff's land from the highway "X," across a tract of land belonging to other parties to the partition decree. There is still another finding that for some years plaintiff obtained access to his property across a third parcel southwesterly of his land. These findings, we think, do not support the conclusion that a right of way across the land of defendants was selected and used in any such definite way as to impress an easement on that land. The findings are entirely vague with regard to the time of beginning and the duration of the period during which such way had been used. In the past, access to the land seems to have been obtained indifferently over any of three routes, one over the land of the defendants and two over land of other owners. The judgment has the effect of imposing upon the land of the defendants the burden of a roadway 1,500 feet in length, and relieving from the easement other lands having the same relation to that of plaintiff. In view of the fact that all of these parcels had been used for the purpose of reaching plaintiff's land, we think neither the plaintiff nor the court had the right to arbitrarily select the land of defendants and make it alone bear this burden.

[4] It is argued, in support of the judgment, that the topographical conditions were such that a passage over the land of appellants was the only feasible line of travel from plaintiff's land, and that therefore the way of necessity was over this land. There is some conflict in the authorities as to what constitutes a "necessity" sufficient to raise an implied grant of a right of way. Some of the cases hold that the right arises only in case of strict necessity; that it does not exist where the party has another way out, even though such other way can be used only at great inconvenience or expense. Washburn on Easements (4th Ed.) 259. Other cases adopt the more liberal rule that the necessity giving rise to the easement must be only a "reasonable necessity," and that the party claiming the right is required to show, merely, that no other way could be made without labor and expense "excessive and disproportionate to the value of the property." Pettingill v. Porter, 8 Allen (Mass.) 1, 85 Am. Dec. 671; Oliver v. Pitman, 98 Mass. 50. In this court it has been held that a party was not entitled to a way of necessity where he had a right of travel over a road, although such road was rendered impassable by a ditch and slough which could be filled up only by the expenditure of $1,000. Carey v. Rae, supra. See, also, Kripp v. Curtis, supra, where it is said that the right does not exist "except in cases of strict necessity." But if we take the rule to be as declared in Pettingill v. Porter, supra, the findings here do not show any such unreasonable expense or difficulty in reaching the road "X" over the lands south of plaintiff's parcel as to establish a necessity for going over the land of the defendants rather than that of other neighbors. The findings are that a roadway would be practicable and accessible for travel from plaintiff's parcel to roadway "X" over a route much shorter than that fixed in the judgment, but that there is a creek bordering plaintiff's land on the south, which at times is wholly inaccessible and is grown up to willows, and that a way to the south would require some improvement and would be unavailable in time of flood or storm. There is no finding of the expense that would be required to bridge the creek to overcome the hindrance of flood or storm, nor of the relation which this expense would bear to the value of the plaintiff's property. Nor is there any finding of the length of time during which travel would be impeded by flood or storm in the absence of such bridge. There is evidence to the effect that the heaviest rains made the creek impassable for about a day and a half. The facts found do not show any such difficulty in taking the nearer road as to justify the imposition of the burden upon the land of the appellants.

one of the parcels adjoining it. It is true that notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry is constructive notice of whatever he might have learned by prosecuting such inquiry. Civ. Code, § 19. But it cannot be said that such a man would have been called on to prosecute any further inquiry than that made by the purchasers in this case. They knew (or must be held to have known) that the 7-acre parcel of plaintiff was so situated that it might, from the year 1868, have had an easement over any one of several parcels of land adjoining it. Purchasing one of those parcels almost 20 years later, they made an examination of the ground which indicated that the right, if it existed, was not over the tract which they proposed to buy. We do not think that they were bound to examine the records affecting the various other parcels adjoining plaintiff's land, or those parcels themselves, in order to ascertain whether the plaintiff had an outlet over any of these. They were entitled to rest upon the want of any record showing affirmatively that a right of way existed over the 50 acres, coupled with the physical conditions indicating that there was no such right. "That which does not appear to exist is to be regarded as if it did not exist." Civ. Code, § 3530. On the facts found the court should have concluded that the Uharriets were purchasers for value without notice, actual or constructive, of an easement, and that they therefore took their land free from any such easement if it had ever existed. As between the owners of the 7-acre tract who allowed so many years to elapse without asserting their rights in such manner as to make their claim of easement a matter of record, and the innocent purchasers of land not appearing to be burdened, the interests of the latter are more deserving of consideration.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

1. PROHIBITION 🔑13—RELIEF—MOOT QUESTION—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER.

Where a receiver appointed to harvest a crop had completed the harvest, distributed the proceeds to the owners, except the share in controversy, which he had turned over to a trustee in bankruptcy of one of the claimants as required by the federal court, and had been discharged by the court appointing him, the validity of his original appointment is a moot question, and prohibition will not issue to determine that question.

2. STIPULATIONS 🔑14(1)—EFFECT.

While the parties cannot by stipulation confer jurisdiction on a receiver, a stipulation that the receiver might harvest and sell a crop and distribute the proceeds, except the share in dispute which was to be deposited in a bank, makes the receiver an agent for the parties to the stipulation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Stipulations, Cent. Dig. §§ 24, 28; Dec. Dig. 🔑14(1).]

In Bank. Original application by S. Kato and others against Charles O. Busick, as Judge of the Superior Court for the County of Sacramento, and others, for a writ of prohibition. Petition dismissed.

Louis P. Dunkley, of San Francisco, for petitioners. Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for respondents. Fred J. Harris, of Sacramento, for receiver.

MELVIN, J. [1] Respondents moved to dismiss a petition for a writ of prohibition upon the grounds that the receiver against whom the writ was asked had been discharged as such receiver; that the harvesting of the crop which petitioners asked to have prevented had been accomplished and the proceeds distributed to the proper parties; that petitioners had consented to the continuation of the receivership; that the matter involved in the receivership proceeding had been fully settled and terminated; and that the whole controversy had become a moot question.

It appears without contradiction that on December 10, 1915, M. Itoo commenced in the superior court of the county of Sacramento an action against M. Yamane, C. Nagasue, and R. Koike. An attachment was issued, and the sheriff levied upon a certain growing crop of onions in San Joaquin county. Subsequently Kato, for himself and as agent for one Wakamoto and Toshi Koike (the last named being the wife of R. Koike), filed a third party claim. The sheriff thereupon demanded and Itoo, the plaintiff, at once deposited $1,100 for the sheriff's protection against said third party claim. The plaintiff subsequently made a motion for the appointment of a receiver to harvest, sell, and account for the crop of onions. The motion was granted. One M. P. Barnes was appointed and qualified as receiver, and the sheriff put him in possession of the crop. At the time the receiver was appointed the sheriff had refused to take the responsibility of harvesting the crop, and the third party claimants had refused to gather the onions while the attachment was in existence.

The third party claimants, S. Kato, Y. Yakamoto, and Toshi Koike (wife of R. Koike), petitioned this court for a writ of prohibition and an order to show cause why such writ should not issue was made. The matter was argued and is still pending. On August 9, 1916, before the return day fixed by the order to show cause the attorneys for the receiver, the plaintiff and the third party claimants respectively entered into a stipulation reciting the facts that Kato claimed 40 per cent. and Mrs. Koike and Wakamoto each 30 per cent. of the crop held by the receiver, and agreeing that the receiver should harvest, market, and sell the crop as in said order provided, and should pay the money received, after subtracting the costs of harvesting, etc., as follows: Forty per cent. to Kato, 30 per cent. to Wakamoto, and 30 per cent., the amount claimed by Mrs. Koike, to some bank on deposit to abide the order of the superior court in the matter of the receivership. The stipulation contained the following paragraph:

> "It is distinctly understood that this stipulation shall in no event or under any circumstances be construed or taken as a consent to the appointment of said receiver by the parties hereto, or that they waive any legal right to appeal from or move to set aside said order appointing said receiver, and that the parties hereto reserve the right to take any steps that they may be advised to contest or oppose said order appointing said receiver, and this stipulation is entered into with the express purpose of facilitating the harvesting of said crop of onions."

Under this stipulation the receiver proceeded to gather and sell the crop.

R. Koike filed a petition in bankruptcy, and on August 19, 1916, Hon. M. T. Dooling, judge of the District Court of the United States, made an order staying proceedings in the case of Itoo v. R. Koike et al., and on the 28th of the same month this order was modified in such manner as to continue Mr. Barnes as receiver in the harvesting and marketing of the crop. The order also required him to turn over the assets to Mr. William T. Hawkins, referee in bankruptcy, and to file his account of such receivership with the said referee.

On September 25, 1916, Judge Busick made and entered an order, as judge of the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Sacramento, approving the receiver's report. This order recited that, as authorized by stipulation of all the parties claiming to own the property, the receiver had released and surrendered all of it except the interest owned by R. Koike, that the receiver had $1,160.32 on hand belonging to said Koike, and that both court and receiver had been served with an order of the District Court of the United States which has been described above. The court ratified the conduct of the receiver in releasing all of the property except the Koike interest, ordered him to turn over the remaining assets in his hands to the referee in bankruptcy, and decreed that upon so surrendering said assets he should be discharged as receiver, and his bond should be exonerated. On the 27th of September, 1916, another order was made and signed by Judge Busick reciting the receiver's due obedience to the former order and formally releasing him from any further liability.

[2] From the foregoing facts it is evident that no good reason exists for deciding whether or not the original appointment of the receiver was justified. It is contended that no stipulation could invest the receiver with jurisdiction to act if the court was originally without such jurisdiction. This is true, but nevertheless the stipulation was broad enough to make the receiver the agent for the third party claimants. The paragraph which we have quoted reserving the right to question the receiver's authority does not in the slightest degree detract from his right to gather and sell the crop under the stipulation. He did everything except deposit the share claimed by Mrs. Koike in bank, and that he could not do, because it was impounded by the federal court. If this money belongs to Mrs. Koike, she may recover it from that court. The issuance of a writ of prohibition now by this court would accomplish nothing. It would merely require the receiver to desist from gathering and selling the crop and from dealing with the assets. But he has gathered the crop, has accounted for the assets, and he and the court have lost all control of the subject-matter of the receivership.

The contention is made that under the authority of Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327–389, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192, it makes no difference that the property has passed out of the possession of both court and receiver, that the writ should issue, and that this court may not take cognizance of the payment of the money claimed by Mrs. Koike into the District Court of the United States. The citation does not support the contention. The court there merely held that, although the writ does not run against ministerial officers, and although the property was in the custody of the receiver, the possession of the receiver was that of the court; he being a mere instrument of that tribunal. It was accordingly decided that the writ of prohibition runs to the court and operates directly upon the court, but indirectly upon the receiver. In the case at bar there is no property in the custody of the court and no receiver against whom the writ could operate.

The questions raised by the petition are therefore moot questions, and the petition for the writ should be, and accordingly is, dismissed.

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS 🔑205(1) — CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—INDICTMENT.

Indictment charging that defendant took an order for sale and delivery to prosecutor of alcoholic liquor in no-license territory was not sufficient to charge an offense under Local Option Law (St. 1911, p. 599) § 15, making it unlawful within such territory to solicit orders, take orders, or make agreements for the sale or delivery of intoxicating liquors; since the words "for the sale or delivery," etc., qualify all three of the acts.

2. Intoxicating Liquors 🔑205(1) — Criminal Prosecution—Indictment.

Indictment charging that defendant took an order for sale and delivery to prosecutor of alcoholic liquor in no-license territory, the words "taking an order from" being treated as surplusage, and the act nowhere prohibiting the delivery of liquor, charges the single offense of a sale under St. 1911, p. 599, § 13, which makes it unlawful to furnish, distribute, or give away alcoholic liquors in no-license territory except in special cases specified in section 16.

George R. Freeman and Frank Freeman, both of Willow (George R. Freeman, of Willow, of counsel), for appellant. Ben F. Geis, Dist. Atty., of Willow, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SLOSS, J. The defendant having been convicted of a violation of the local option law (Stats. 1911, p. 599), appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The indictment charged that the defendant on or about the 20th day of November, 1914, in the county of Glenn, did "take an order from, sell, and deliver to one M. Hamilton, alcoholic liquor," within a supervisorial district which was no-license territory.

[1] The defendant demurred to the indictment on the ground that it charged more than one offense, and that the several offenses were not stated in separate counts. Pen. Code, § 954. Section 13 of the act makes it unlawful to "sell, furnish, distribute, or give away," within the boundaries of any no-license territory, any alcoholic liquors, except in certain cases specified in section 16. Section 15 makes it unlawful, within such territory, "to solicit orders, take orders or make agreements for the sale or delivery of alcoholic liquors." The claim is that the indictment charges a sale under section 13, and also the taking of an order under section 15. It is not necessary to decide whether the offenses described in these sections may properly be joined in a single count. We are satisfied that the indictment did not contain the elements necessary to constitute a charge of "taking an order" under section 15. Three acts are there declared unlawful—i. e., soliciting orders, taking orders or making agreements "for the sale or delivery of alcoholic liquors." The words "for the sale or delivery," etc., qualify all three of the acts.

[2] The indictment merely charges that the defendant took an order from Hamilton, and sold and delivered liquors to him. There is no attempt to allege that he took an order "for the sale or delivery of liquor." Since the act does not, in section 13 or elsewhere, prohibit the "delivery" of liquors, the pleading charges nothing more than a sale under section 13, and the case should have been submitted to the jury on the issue of sale alone. The words "taking an order from" may well be treated as surplusage. In this view, the indictment charges but a single offense.

Was the defendant properly convicted of the offense of selling intoxicating liquor within no-license territory? There is little or no dispute regarding the facts. Winkler conducted a general merchandise store at Hamilton City in Glenn county. This was no-license territory under the law. The city of Chico, in Butte county, a few miles distant, was "wet" territory. M. Hamilton, named in the indictment as the person to whom the sale was made, was a detective employed to discover violations of the local option law. Hamilton asked the defendant Winkler to procure for him at Chico a bottle of whisky, and deliver it to him at Hamilton City. The defendant stated that he did not make a business of it, but did it for some of his customers. He requested Hamilton to sign a blank form or order which, when filled out and signed, read as follows:

> "I hereby purchase from you at your store in Chico one bottle beverage. I hereby appoint J. S. Winkler my special agent for the transportation of these goods from your store, 426 Third street, Chico, to my home, and you are hereby authorized and instructed to deliver them to him for me at ——.
> "[Signed] D. O. Mills."

(The name "D. O. Mills" was assumed by Hamilton.)

At the same time, Hamilton handed Winkler $1, the price of the whisky. Winkler went to Chico to attend to business of his own, obtained the bottle of whisky from Daley, the person named in the order, paying him the dollar, returned to Hamilton City, and handed the bottle of whisky to Hamilton. There was evidence that the order signed by Hamilton was on a prepared form, on which the name and address of Daley were printed. The name of Winkler, and the words "one bottle beverage" were written in. It was also testified that Winkler had a number of these blanks in his possession.

[3, 4] The court refused to give three instructions requested by the defendant. These instructions presented, in different forms, the proposition that if the defendant, in purchasing the liquor outside of the no-license territory described in the indictment, acted on behalf of and as the agent of the prosecuting witness, having no interest in the liquor, and deriving no profit from the transaction, he was not guilty of "selling" such liquor to the prosecuting witness. No instructions of similar purport were given by the court. The defendant was entitled to have the jury charged on these lines, even if the instructions as framed were subject to the rather technical and minute criticisms suggested by respondent. State v. Turner, 83 Kan. 183, 109 Pac. 983. It may be that the evidence warranted an inference, on the part of the jury, that the course of procedure adopted by Winkler was a mere pretext for covering sales of liquor made by him either for himself or for Daley, and that in fact he was not an agent of the purchaser. But under the evidence, the jury might have found that the transaction was bona fide and precisely what Winkler represented it to be. The statute prohibits, in section 13, the sale of alcoholic liquors. It does not prohibit their purchase. More specifically, it does not prohibit one from purchasing intoxicating liquors outside of no-license territory, and bringing them within such territory for his own consumption. If a man may do this personally, he may do it through an agent. Hamilton had the right to buy liquor in Chico and bring it to Hamilton City for his own use. If he did this through Winkler, acting as his agent, neither he nor the agent was guilty of a violation of the law. This conclusion is supported by the uniform current of authority. We cite a few cases. State v. Lynch, 81 Ohio St. 336, 90 N. E. 935, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 334; Strickland v. State (Tex. Cr.) 47 S. W. 720; Reed v. State, 3 Okl. Cr. 16, 103 Pac. 1070, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 268; Partin v. Commonwealth, 140 Ky. 146, 130 S. W. 968; Lee v. Commonwealth, 143 Ky. 355, 136 S. W. 624; Simpson v. Commonwealth, 151 Ky. 442, 152 S. W. 255; State v. Collins, 53 Kan. 100, 36 Pac. 56, 24 L. R. A. 212; State v. Turner, 83 Kan. 183, 109 Pac. 983; Davis v. State, 53 Tex. Cr. R. 373, 109 S. W. 938; Evans v. State, 55 Tex. Cr. R. 450, 117 S. W. 167.

[5] It was the defendant's right to have the jury pass upon this question of agency, under instructions that, if he was acting solely as the agent of the purchaser of the whisky, he could not be convicted of making a sale of it to such purchaser. The refusal to give such instructions was highly prejudicial.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. M. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Warren Smithson, by his guardian ad litem, T. A. Smithson, against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order refusing a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

U. T. Clotfelter and A. H. Van Cott, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Cushing & Cushing, of San Francisco, and Hatton & Scott, of Modesto (Erwin E. Richter, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought by Warren Smithson, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, to recover damages from defendant for injuries sustained by plaintiff while in its employ. Plaintiff at the time of the action was 17 years of age, well, active, and in possession of all his faculties. He was employed by defendant at its roundhouse at Riverbank, Cal., in the capacity of night-hostler helper; that is to say, his employment was in the nighttime, and he was the assistant or helper of a hostler whose duty it was to take engines which had finished their work, run them into the roundhouse, where they were looked over and put in condition for their next trips. Outside of the roundhouse was a turntable for the reception of engines which were there turned to face any desired direction. At an elevation over this turntable was a "cab" or station where was a lever by which the motive power of the turntable was controlled. The rails leading from the roundhouse extended on to this turntable. It was a part of the duty of the helper to adjust the turntable so that these rails ran true with the rails upon which was to come the approaching engine. This truing up of the rails was known as "spotting" the turntable. When the turntable was thus "spotted," it became the helper's duty to signal the night hostler in the engine that all was in readiness for him to run his engine on the table. The usual signal was given by moving from right to left the lighted lantern which the helper carried. It is contended by appellant that another customary signal was given by the helper placing his lantern in a particular location upon the girder of the turntable and that the latter signal was given in this instance. It is charged by respondent that the hostler in control of the engine backed his engine on to the turntable without receiving any signal from plaintiff. Plaintiff's feet were caught and crushed by the approaching engine. The injuries necessitated partial amputation of both feet and crippled him for life. The jury awarded him damages in the sum of $26,000. From the judgment which followed, and from the order of the court refusing its motion to grant a new trial, defendant appeals.

The action is admittedly brought under the provisions of the federal Employers' Liability Act. The principal question presented upon this appeal arises out of the provisions of section 3 of this act and the applicability to its provisions of a certain statute of this state. Section 3 of the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 8659) provides that in any action brought against any common carrier under it no employé "shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employés contributed to the injury or death of such employé." Public No. 100, H. R. 20310. Act approved April 22, 1908.

At the time of this accident there was upon the books of this state a statute declaring as follows:

> "No minor under the age of eighteen years shall be employed or permitted to work between the hours of ten o'clock in the evening and five o'clock in the morning." Stats. 1911, p. 910, § 2.

This respondent was injured at about midnight. The court instructed the jury as follows:

> "You are further instructed that under a certain statute of California in effect during the month of September, 1912, it was provided that 'No minor under the age of eighteen years shall be employed or permitted to work between the hours of ten o'clock in the evening and five o'clock in the morning.'

"You are further instructed that said statute of the state of California is a 'statute enacted for the safety of employés' as said words are used in the federal Employers' Liability Act, providing that no employé who may be injured under the circumstances there stated shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence where the violation of such statute contributed to his injuries.

"You are further instructed that under the laws of this state it was unlawful at the time of plaintiff's employment for defendant to employ or permit minors under the age of 18 years to work between the hours of 10 o'clock in the evening and 5 o'clock in the morning, and if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff at the time of his injuries was a minor under the age of 18 years, and was at said time being employed or permitted by defendant to work between the hours of 10 o'clock in the evening and 5 o'clock in the morning, if you believe from the evidence that such employment or permission to work during said night hours contributed to his injuries, you will find plaintiff not guilty of contributory negligence."

[1, 2] In justice to the trial judge, it should be stated that at the time of the trial of this action there were but few decisions construing the scope and effect of the phrase "any statute" as that language is employed in the federal Liability Act. The trial court took the view that the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 34 Sup. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475, defining "any statute" to mean any federal statute, was obiter and adopted the construction of the statute laid down in Doherty's Liability of Railroads to Interstate Employés, p. 119, to the effect that "any statute" includes the statutes of a state. Support of this view was also found in the decision of the Supreme Court of the state of Washington in Opsahl v. Northern Pacific R. R. Co., 78 Wash. 197, 138 Pac. 681. But the later decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which are, of course, controlling upon the question, completely eliminate this matter from the domain of controversy. These decisions are numerous, are uniform, and adopt and reaffirm the declarations of the Seaboard Air Line Case. There is need to cite and quote but from few of them.

In De Atley v. Chesapeake, etc., Ry. Co. (D. C.) 201 Fed. 591, it is declared that the federal Employers' Liability Act "was intended to cover every act of negligence for which a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce might be liable to its employés in such commerce"; and further that this act, "making common carriers engaged in interstate commerce liable for injuries to employés, supersedes all other common-law and statutory liabilities on the part of such carriers."

In Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, 33 Sup. Ct. 192, 57 L. Ed. 417, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 176, it is declared that since the passage of the federal Employers' Liability Act "this act is paramount and exclusive," and "we may not piece out this act of Congress by resorting to the local statutes of the state of procedure or that of the injury."

In St. Louis, etc., Co. v. Hesterly, 228 U. S. 702, 33 Sup. Ct. 703, 57 L. Ed. 1031, it is declared that:

> "The federal Employers' Liability Act supersedes state laws in the matters with which it deals, including liability of carriers while engaged in commerce between the states."

This was the holding in answer to the declaration of the Supreme Court of the state of Arkansas that the state law was only supplementary to the federal Employers' Liability Act.

In Wabash Railway v. Hayes, 234 U. S. 86, 34 Sup. Ct. 729, 58 L. Ed. 1226, it is said:

> "Had the injury occurred in interstate commerce, as was alleged, the federal act undoubtedly would have been controlling, and a recovery could not have been had under the common or statute law. * * * In other words, the federal act would have been exclusive in its operation, not merely cumulative. Mondou v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R. Co., 223 U. S. 1, 53, 55 [32 Sup. Ct. 169, 56 L. Ed. 327, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 44]; St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Seale, 229 U. S. 156, 158 [33 Sup. Ct. 651, 57 L. Ed. 1129, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 156]; North Carolina R. Co. v. Zachary, 232 U. S. 248, 256 [34 Sup. Ct. 305, 58 L. Ed. 591, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 159]; Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492 [34 Sup. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475]."

In Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Slavin, 236 U. S. 454, 35 Sup. Ct. 306, 59 L. Ed. 671, the Ohio statute abolished the rule of the common law as to the assumption of risks occasioned by defects in tracks, while the federal statute left that common-law rule in force. Over objection the law of the Ohio statute was delivered to the jury and was held to be error upon the authority of Seaboard Air Line, etc., Co. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 34 Sup. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475.

In Chicago, etc., Ry. v. Wright, 239 U. S. 548, 36 Sup. Ct. 185, 60 L. Ed. 431, the action was brought under the federal Employers' Liability Act, and instructions touching negligence were given in conformity with the law of the state of Nebraska. It was declared that, as the federal Liability Act "is exclusive and supersedes state laws upon the subject, it was error to submit the case to the jury as if the state act were controlling."

It is unnecessary to cite the corresponding decisions of the state courts, since uniformly, as in duty bound to do, they follow the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is sufficient here to say that the Supreme Court of the state of Washington thus felt compelled to, and did, reverse its decision in the Opsahl Case in the later case of Lauer v. Northern Pacific Ry. Co., 83 Wash. 465, 145 Pac. 606.

[3] Respondent's second position is that, even if the statutes of a state be not included in the language of the federal Employers' Liability Act, nevertheless this particular statute is of such character that it may be employed with and as a supplement to the provisions of the federal act as being a state police regulation and as being in no wise in conflict with the provisions of the federal act. A reading of the decisions already cited will establish the untenableness of this position; but, if more need be added, it is found in the conclusive language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Prigg v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. 539, 617 [10 L. Ed. 1060]:

> "If Congress have a constitutional power to regulate a particular subject, and they do actually regulate it in a given manner and in a certain form, it cannot be that the state Legislatures have a right to interfere, and as it were, by way of complement to the legislation of Congress, to prescribe additional regulations and what they may deem auxiliary provisions for the same purpose. In such a case, the legislation of Congress, in what it does prescribe, manifestly indicates that it does not intend that there shall be any further legislation to act upon the subject-matter. Its silence as to what it does not do is as expressive of what its intention is, as the direct provisions made by it. * * * The will of Congress upon the whole subject is as clearly established by what it has not declared, as by what it has expressed."

[4] In this complaint plaintiff set forth his duties and the conditions and circumstances under which he was called upon to perform them: He "spotted" the turntable from the cab by means of the lever. Then, in order to ascertain whether the "spotting" had been correctly done, it was necessary for him to leave the cab and go to a position alongside of the tracks. Finding the tracks properly adjusted, he then signaled the hostler to run his engine onto the table. This table had been but recently put in operation, was not well balanced, and the balance was carelessly and negligently maintained by the piling of sacks of sand upon one end of the table. In the night the table was in total darkness, saving when there was flashed upon it the small bull's-eye lantern carried by plaintiff. These piled sacks in the nighttime gave to the table an additional hazard, in that one was liable to stumble over them in the dark. The failure adequately to light this turntable, in conjunction with the sacks of sand piled upon it, is charged as negligence. In order to signal the hostler, it was necessary for the plaintiff to walk across the turntable. Plaintiff was in the act of picking up his lantern preparatory to signaling the hostler when the hostler carelessly and negligently and without receiving any signal backed his engine onto the turntable. Plaintiff, in endeavoring to escape the engine tender first approaching him, in the darkness stumbled over the sacks and was thrown across one of the turntable tracks and was thus run over and injured. One of the defenses was contributory negligence, a defense open to appellant under the federal Liability Act, a defense of which it was deprived by virtue of the instructions which the court gave. The injury thus sustained by appellant is manifest.

[5] Something further needs to be said in contemplation of the new trial which must be ordered. One of the defenses which defendant sought to establish was that the hostler in backing his engine did so in compliance with the signal given him by plaintiff himself. Upon this the complaint charged in the following language:

> "While the plaintiff was so engaged in picking up said lantern and preparing to signal, said hostler carelessly and negligently and without receiving any signal from the plaintiff drove said engine upon said turntable."

And the answer made was:

> "Defendant denies that while the plaintiff was engaged in picking up his said or any lantern, or preparing to give the signal to the said or any hostler, the said or any hostler carelessly or negligently drove said engine upon said turntable."

Respondent argues that here is a complete failure upon the part of appellant to deny that no signal was given. Unquestionably, in the matter of this denial the answer is susceptible of improvement; but by both parties upon the trial it was taken as an accepted fact that issue was joined upon this proposition, and much evidence pro and con was admitted without objection upon the question. It is a familiar principle that, the case having been tried upon this theory without objection, neither party will be allowed to present it in this court for the first time. Tulley v. Tranor, 53 Cal. 274; Horton v. Dominguez, 68 Cal. 642, 10 Pac. 186; Illinois Bank v. Pacific Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 297, 47 Pac. 60; Gervaise v. Brookins, 156 Cal. 110, 103 Pac. 332.

[6] Appellant further argues that no evidence of legal sufficiency was adduced to show any negligence on its part. It is not disputed that the plaintiff himself furnished evidence upon all these matters of asserted negligence, but the answer is made that the evidence is incredible. There are exceptional cases, such as that of Blankman v. Vallejo, 15 Cal. 639, County of Sonoma v. Stofen, 125 Cal. 35, 57 Pac. 681, A. T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Baker (Ind. T.) 104 S. W. 1182, and People v. Milner, 54 Pac. 833, 122 Cal. 171, where, in effect, it is declared that the judgment of a court is not to be based on or controlled by the testimony of a witness testifying to a fact inherently impossible. But this case does not come within that category. The weight of the evidence upon the question of the defendant's negligence was for the jury under proper instructions of the court.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑488(2)—EFFECT OF APPEAL—PROHIBITIVE INJUNCTIONS.

An appeal does not stay the force of a prohibitive injunction, but the lower court has full power to punish a violation thereof pending the appeal; since such an injunction requires no execution for its enforcement, but acts directly without process on the defendant.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑488(2)—EFFECT OF APPEAL—MANDATORY INJUNCTIONS.

An appeal suspends and renders inoperative mandatory injunctions.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑460(1)—EFFECT OF APPEAL.

An appeal can operate as a supersedeas or stay only by arresting the enforcement by the court below of the judgment appealed from.

4. QUIETING TITLE 🔑1—PURPOSE OF ACTION.

Action to quiet title is a development of the bill of peace of the court of chancery, the main purpose of which was to prevent repeated attempts to litigate a title, and to protect the real owner of the right against the annoyance and expense incidental to a multiplicity of suits.

5. QUIETING TITLE 🔑49—RELIEF.

In action to quiet title, the relief awarded may vary according to the circumstances of the case.

6. QUIETING TITLE 🔑52—FORM OF JUDGMENT.

A decree, declaring that plaintiff is the owner of the property and enjoining defendant from further setting up a claim thereto, is a proper form of judgment in action to quiet title.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑488(2)—VIOLATION—EFFECT OF APPEAL.

Where, in action to quiet title, the judgment declares defendants the owners, and enjoins plaintiffs from making claim to the property, the injunctive provision is not suspended or rendered inoperative by appeal from the judgment, for the injunction is purely prohibitive and not mandatory, and is not incidental to the relief sought, but is an inherent part of the relief itself, and under Code Civ. Proc. § 356, tolling the statute of limitations during continuance of an injunction, plaintiffs lose no right by being restrained from commencing action.

Angellotti, C. J., and Lorigan, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Action by Arturo Wolf and another against Charles Funkenstein Gall and others. Judgment for defendants. Application for writ of supersedeas prayed to be directed against defendants. Order to show cause discharged.

See, also, 163 Pac. 346, 350.

Theodore A. Bell and Denson, Cooley & Denson, all of San Francisco, for petitioners. J. R. Pringle, Leon Samuels, and Edgar D. Peixotto, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Pending an appeal from the judgment in the above-entitled cause, the superior court undertook to punish Arturo Wolf, one of the plaintiffs, and his attorneys, Messrs. George Lezinsky and Theodore A. Bell, for contempt of court. The alleged contempt consisted of the institution of a new action, in violation of the terms of an injunction embodied in the judgment from which the appeal had been taken. The present proceeding is an order, issued on the application of Arturo Wolf, to show cause why a writ of supersedeas should not issue to prevent the enforcement of said judgment.

The action of Wolf v. Gall was brought to quiet title to certain property in the city and county of San Francisco. All of the parties claim under Tobe Funkenstein, deceased. The plaintiffs, Arturo Wolf and Maria Julia Wolf, assert ownership of an interest in the property as heirs of said Tobe Funkenstein. The defendants, also heirs of the decedent, claim ownership of the property by virtue of a deed alleged to have been executed to them by said Tobe Funkenstein in her lifetime.

The court found that the plaintiffs and defendants were the heirs of Tobe Funkenstein, but that said decedent was not the owner of the property at the time of her death; she having conveyed the same to the defendants as tenants in common. The title to the property was found to be in the defendants. The judgment, following the findings, declares that the defendants are the owners in fee simple of the property in dispute, and that the plaintiffs have no right, title, or interest therein. It is further adjudged and decreed that the plaintiffs and all persons claiming under them be perpetually restrained and enjoined from making any claim to the property involved in the action. The judgment was entered on August 7, 1914. On October 9, 1914, plaintiffs took an appeal therefrom to this court. The appeal is still pending.

On January 17, 1916, Arturo Wolf, by his said attorneys, Theodore A. Bell and George Lezinsky, commenced in the superior court a new action against the same defendants and their successors. In his complaint he alleged that he was an heir of Tobe Funkenstein, and that she was at the time of her death the owner of the same property involved in the present action. By said complaint he assailed the validity of the deed of December 21, 1907, which is the basis of the title claimed by the defendants. The commencement of this second action constitutes the contempt found to have been committed by the petitioner and his attorneys.

That the institution of the second action is in direct disobedience of the terms of the injunction embraced in the judgment is neither questioned nor open to question. It is equally clear that Wolf's attorneys, who, as it appears, had knowledge of the terms of the judgment, are liable, equally with their client, for the commission of any act forbidden by said judgment.

The sole question is whether the provision enjoining the plaintiffs is suspended or rendered inoperative by virtue of the pendency of an appeal from the judgment.

[1-3] It is conceded on all sides that the injunction under discussion is purely prohibitive. By a line of decisions beginning with the early history of the state, the rule has been settled that an appeal does not stay the force of a prohibitive injunction, and that the lower court has full power to punish a violation of such injunction pending the appeal. Merced M. Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 130; Heinlen v. Cross, 63 Cal. 44; United R. R. v. Superior Court of C. & C. of San Francisco, 155 Pac. 463. It is otherwise where the injunction is mandatory. The reason for this distinction is found in the inherent nature of an order which merely restrains or prohibits affirmative action. An appeal can operate as a supersedeas or stay only by arresting the enforcement by the court below of the judgment appealed from. Dulin v. Pac. W. & C. Co., 98 Cal. 304, 33 Pac. 123. A prohibitive injunction requires no execution for its enforcement. It acts "directly without process upon the defendant." Heinlen v. Cross, supra. In the case of a mandatory injunction, on the other hand, the contempt proceeding is a kind of process to carry into execution the affirmative command embodied in the judgment.

With respect to the effect of an appeal there are, then, two classes of injunctions: (a) Prohibitive injunctions, which remain operative and must be obeyed notwithstanding an appeal; and (b) mandatory injunctions, which are suspended and rendered inoperative by the appeal. The petitioner contends, however, for the recognition of a third class, viz. injunctions which, although prohibitive, are "incidental," and these, it is claimed, are taken out of the settled rule governing the effect of an appeal from a prohibitive injunction and are given the characteristics of a mandatory injunction. The injunction in the case at bar is asserted to be merely incidental to so much of the decree as declares that the defendants are the owners of the property. We think the supposed distinction between "incidental" and other prohibitive injunctions is without the support of either authority or principle. The argument is rested in the main upon one or two sentences taken from the opinion in Foster v. Superior Court, 115 Cal. 279, 47 Pac. 58. It is true that it was there said that the injunction was merely incidental to the judgment determining Smith's right to act as a director, but the very next passage in the opinion declares that the injunction, although couched in terms of prohibition, was in effect mandatory. If the injunction was mandatory, its effect was, of course, stayed by an appeal, and the description of it as "incidental" was at once unnecessary to the decision and insufficient for its support. The case has been cited in this court to support the proposition that a mandatory injunction is suspended by an appeal (Clute v. Sup. Ct., 155 Cal. 15, 99 Pac. 362, 132 Am. St. Rep. 54; United Railroads v. Superior Court, 155 Pac. 467), and has generally been regarded as resting on the ground that the injunction there in question was mandatory. In Mark v. Superior Court, 129 Cal. 1, 61 Pac. 436, a case cited by petitioner, the word "incidental" is also used in discussing the question whether a part of an injunctive order was stayed by an appeal; but in that case the judgment was an entirety, and the portion claimed to be prohibitive was not separable from the remainder, which was plainly mandatory. A careful reading of the entire opinion shows that the court regarded both branches of the injunction as being in reality mandatory. Neither of these cases therefore should be regarded as authority for the view that the operative effect of a strictly prohibitive injunction can, in any case, be stayed by appeal; and, if the true ground for upholding the power of the trial court to enforce a prohibitive injunction pending an appeal be that such injunction requires no process for its enforcement, it can, in principle, make no difference whether the injunction constitutes the main relief sought or is merely incidental thereto. Probably most injunctions, especially those granted pendente lite, are incidental to the protection, declaration, or establishment of some disputed property right. The rule that a prohibitive injunction is, and that a mandatory injunction is not, enforceable pending an appeal, is simple and logical, though not perhaps always easy to apply. The recognition of an additional distinction between different kinds of prohibitive injunctions would bring new difficulties and complications into a situation which has come to be well understood in our practice. It is not apparent that any substantial benefit would be accomplished. In the present case, for example, the practical effect of accepting petitioners' claim would merely be to multiply litigation over an issue which might, and should, be finally determined in the action already pending on appeal.

[4] Furthermore, the injunction here granted was not in fact incidental to the main relief sought. It was a substantial and inherent part of the relief. The plaintiffs and defendants were seeking to have title quieted against each other. The action to quiet title, under our practice, is a development of the bill of peace of the court of chancery. The main purpose of this proceeding was to prevent repeated attempts to litigate a title, and to protect the real owner of the right against the annoyance and expense incidental to a multiplicity of suits. It was upon these considerations that the court of chancery "has granted perpetual injunctions to restrain further litigation, and thus has in some degree put that restraint upon litigation which was the policy of the ancient law in real actions." 1 Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 248. "The obvious design of such a bill," says Story (2 Eq. Jur. [13th Ed.] § 853), "is to procure repose from perpetual litigation, and therefore it is justly called a bill of peace. * * * The obvious ground of the jurisdiction of courts of equity in cases of this sort is to suppress useless litigation and to prevent multiplicity of suits."

Certain restrictions upon the maintenance of such suits have been removed by statutory provisions like those embodied in section 254 of the Practice Act, in force before the enactment of the Codes, and the similar but somewhat broader provisions of section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The nature and purpose of the statutory action are, however, essentially the same as those of the old bill of peace. Curtis v. Sutter, 15 Cal. 259; Angus v. Craven, 132 Cal. 691, 64 Pac. 1091. In Curtis v. Sutter, supra, the court, speaking through Field, C. J., says that:

> "There is no difficulty in so conducting a suit, under the statute, as to fully protect the legal rights of the parties, and at the same time to secure the beneficial result afforded by a court of equity in bills of peace—which is repose from further litigation."

[5-7] The plain and direct manner of giving this repose is by enjoining the defeated parties from asserting a hostile claim. Such injunction is in no sense incidental to the relief sought. It is an inherent part of the relief itself. The judgment in an action for the quieting of title need not, to be sure, take the form of an injunction. The relief awarded may vary according to the circumstances of the case. 17 Ency. Plead. & Prac. 363. But a decree like the one in the case before us, declaring that the plaintiff is the owner of the property and enjoining the defendant from further setting up a claim thereto, is a proper form of judgment. Brooks v. Calderwood, 34 Cal. 563. The injunction was a legitimate part of the relief granted, and the court below is authorized to enforce obedience to it pending the appeal.

To the suggestion that the plaintiff may lose valuable rights by being restrained from commencing actions which, if the judgment should be reversed, they will appear to have been entitled to bring, it may be answered that their position will not be impaired by the lapse of time. The statute of limitations does not run during the period when the commencement of an action is stayed by injunction. Code Civ. Proc. § 356.

The order to show cause is discharged.

We concur: SHAW, J.; HENSHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.; LAWLOR, J.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. (dissenting). I dissent. The facts are fairly stated in the prevailing opinion.

The real question presented is whether the provision of the judgment enjoining the plaintiffs from making any claim to the property involved in the action is in force and operative pending the appeal taken from the whole judgment, which judgment, by reason of such appeal, is not as yet final. The claim of defendants that it is so operative and in force, notwithstanding the appeal, is based upon the settled doctrine of this court that an appeal does not stay the force of a prohibitory injunction. The question whether this is the situation when the prohibitory order is simply a part, as here, of an ordinary judgment quieting title in an action brought under section 738, Code of Civil Procedure, to determine adverse claims to real estate, has never been squarely decided by this court. It was expressly eliminated from consideration in Lake v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 182, 188, 131 Pac. 371. There is no suggestion that there was any foundation in the pleadings for injunctive relief other than the allegations of title. The character of an injunctive portion of a judgment in such a case has been referred to in several cases. The propriety at all of such an injunctive provision in a decree in an action to quiet title has been questioned, but it is settled that it is entirely proper for the reasons hereinafter referred to. In Brooks v. Calderwood, 34 Cal. 566, it was said:

> "The very object of the suit was to determine whether the defendants had any just claim or title to the premises as against plaintiff, and settle the question forever. The court has determined that they have none, and we see no reason why it may not make its judgment effectual by restraining the defendants from further setting up a false claim. It has been judicially determined that defendants have no just claim, estate, or interest in a portion of the land, and, as to that portion, there is no reason why the plaintiff should be permitted to be further harassed by them." (The italics are ours.)

Again in Kittle v. Bellegarde, 86 Cal. 556, 25 Pac. 55, in reply to the objection that in such an action an injunctive provision against executing deeds in pursuance of a certificate of sale was inappropriate and unwarranted, it was said:

> "The injunction was merely ancillary to the principal relief, and was proper, if necessary to make that relief effectual." (Again the italics are ours.)

And in Lake v. Superior Court, supra, 165 Cal. at page 191, 131 Pac. 371, it was substantially said that the injunctive provision to enforce the rights adjudicated in the judgment was both permissible and proper.

The idea clearly appears to be that in such actions the real and substantial object is to determine the title, and the injunctive provision is designed solely to enforce the rights determined by the judgment as to title, and can have no other effect. Its whole basis is the judgment in regard to title, it must stand or fall with that judgment, and it would seem necessarily that its effect must be suspended by anything that suspends the effect of the judgment as to title. To enforce it by contempt proceedings pending an appeal from that judgment is in effect to enforce the provisions of the judgment as to title while the same remains absolutely ineffectual by reason of the appeal. In view of the pending appeal, we have no final adjudication as to title as yet. The matter is still sub judice. I am unable to see that the case of Foster v. Superior Court, 115 Cal. 279, 47 Pac. 58, is not absolutely in point in principle. There was a contest of an election for directors of a corporation between two persons. It was determined by the superior court that Smith was elected, and the judgment so declaring also enjoined the other directors from interfering with Smith in the exercise of his office as such director. An appeal having been taken from the judgment, Foster, one of the other directors, excluded Smith from participation in a meeting of the directors, and was adjudged guilty of contempt for so doing. On certiorari proceedings, this court said:

> "The action of the superior court in the present case was a proceeding 'upon the judgment' from which the appeal had been taken, and was instituted for the purpose of enforcing a compliance therewith. * * * The injunction, in the judgment, against the interference with Smith's right to act as a director, was but ancillary to the judgment determining that he had such right, and was merely incidental thereto. * * * As that portion of the judgment declaring that Smith was elected was suspended by the appeal, the injunctive portion of the judgment, being merely incidental thereto, was also suspended, and the power of the court to enforce any portion of its judgment by inflicting punishment for its violation was stayed. An enforcement of this portion of the judgment would operate to carry the decree into effect."

It is true that it was also said that the injunction was, in effect, mandatory; but there can be no question as to the views of the court to the effect that it was suspended by the appeal from the judgment regardless of whether it was mandatory or prohibitory.

My conclusion in no degree infringes the rule that an appeal does not stay the force of a prohibitory injunction. What I have said shows the distinction between the cases in which it has been so held, and such cases as this. The only prohibitory relief here given is that deemed essential to make the decree as to title when it shall have become final broad enough to accomplish its object and fully protect those in whose favor it was given. It rests on no other foundation than the decree as to title, and is an inseparable part and incident of that decree.

To my mind it is entirely clear that enforcement of the provision of the judgment enjoining the plaintiffs from making any claim to the property involved in the action is stayed by the appeal from the judgment, and that plaintiffs are entitled to a writ of supersedeas as prayed. Were it not for the fact that so many of my learned associates have come to a different conclusion, I would say that this is so clear as not to admit of question.

GLOUGIE v. GLOUGIE et al.

1. JUDGMENT 🔑338—EQUITABLE RELIEF — ERRONEOUS JUDGMENT—REMEDY.

A judicial error, if any, in setting aside an interlocutory decree for an accounting because defendants had been denied their right to answer the amended complaint, is not correctible under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing the court to relieve from a judgment on the grounds of mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect, but is to be remedied by motion for new trial, or by appeal from a judgment, and, as to erroneous conclusions of law, etc., by motion under section 663 for the vacation of the judgment.

2. JUDGMENT 🔑386(6)—INTERLOCUTORY ORDER—MOTION TO SET ASIDE—LACHES.

In an action for an accounting and for breach of trust, etc., where defendants, after the entry of an interlocutory decree for plaintiff, participated in the sessions of the commissioner, sought a determination favorable to themselves, and did not attempt to set aside an interlocutory decree for plaintiff under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, on the ground of mistake, surprise, excusable neglect, etc., until nine months after its entry, they were guilty of laches, as an application on that ground must in all cases be made within six months, and in every case made within a reasonable time; and where it did not move to vacate a final judgment until an unexplained delay from February 9th until April 24th, it was also guilty of laches.

3. PLEADING 🔑248(17)—AMENDMENT—CONFORMITY TO PROOF—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

In an action for an accounting and for a breach of trust upon a complaint originally charging that the breach of trust grew out of the fact that, after having taken possession of the property as security for advancements, there was a subsequent executory agreement by defendants to purchase the property, an amendment to conform to the proof and to allege that a breach of trust had been committed growing out of the fact that plaintiff had made over his property to the defendants as security for advancements made by them did not set up a new and distinct cause of action; as the fundamental equitable consideration was whether there was a breach of trust by virtue of which defendants were inequitably retaining possession of property rightfully belonging to plaintiff.

4. PLEADING 🔑253—AMENDED COMPLAINT—ANSWER.

Where an amended complaint or amendments to a complaint are filed, no answer thereto is necessary, as the issues tendered by the complaint are taken as denied without pleading, having been already tried by the court.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by A. V. Glougie against C. A. Glougie and others. From an order setting aside an interlocutory decree for an accounting made in the action, and from the final decree after the accounting in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Order reversed.

C. K. Bonestell, of Fresno, for appellant. M. B. & E. M. Harris, Short & Sutherland, and Carl E. Lindsay, all of Fresno, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order of the court setting aside an interlocutory decree for an accounting which it had made in the action and the final decree entered after that accounting, which final decree was a judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

The relevancy of the following facts will be the better understood by carrying in mind the nature of this appeal: Plaintiff brought his action against his two brothers and their wives, alleging that he was the owner of and conducting a general merchandise business in the town of Sanger. Becoming financially involved, his brothers came to his rescue and compromised and paid his financial obligations with the money of the wife of one of them. In the matter of these adjustments they took over the charge and conduct of the business, and were in such control when they orally agreed with plaintiff to buy his business for a specific sum upon named terms and times of payment. This agreement was oral, but was accompanied by a further promise to have it duly executed in writing. This the defendants have refused to do, and they refuse also to restore the business to plaintiff. He therefore prayed for a judgment decreeing that they held the business in trust and for an accounting. The answers of defendants were limited to denials of the vital matters of the complaint. Trial was had. At the conclusion of the taking of the evidence, the judge, expressing the view that the evidence established to his satisfaction that the defendants had taken over the property in trust, but under a trust rather in the nature of security for their advancements than under the asserted executory sale, authorized the filing of an amended complaint to conform to the proofs. This amended complaint, as the court's order shows, was first submitted to it, and its filing was permitted under the court's declaration:

> That "this is a proper case in which to allow an amendment to the complaint upon the ground asked for by plaintiff, and that the proposed amended complaint will have the effect of causing the allegations thereof to correspond to the proof on the trial."

The amended complaint adopted the view which the court had taken of the proof established by the evidence, and alleged that the business was turned over to the defendants as security for the repayment of such amounts of money as they might be called upon to expend upon behalf of the plaintiff. The defendants interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, together with a motion to strike it from the files upon the ground that it charged upon a new cause of action. Upon July 22, 1913, the court overruled this demurrer without leave to answer, and denied the motion to strike out the amended complaint. Six days thereafter the court filed its findings and interlocutory decree, declaring the plaintiff entitled to an accounting and appointing a referee for the purpose. The referee held sessions, at which all parties were present, took evidence, and filed his report upon January 7, 1914. Following this report, on February 9, 1914, the court filed its written decision in favor of the plaintiff and gave him final judgment for the sum of $18,786. One month thereafter the defendants served and filed their notice of intention to move for a new trial, and on April 13, 1914, they also perfected an appeal from the final judgment. In the same month, on April 24, 1914, defendants for the first time gave notice of their intention to apply to the court for an order vacating and setting aside the interlocutory decree and the final judgment under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The grounds of "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect" are the following: (1) The court was without jurisdiction to render the interlocutory decree and the final judgment because the court in overruling the general demurrer to the amended complaint "did not fix any time within which said defendants would be required to answer said amended complaint"; (2) no notice of the overruling of the demurrer was ever at any time "served" upon the defendants or their attorneys; (3) therefore the defendants were not and never have been in default for failure to answer the amended complaint; and (4) the action not being at issue, by reason of the fact that no answer to the amended complaint was on file, the findings, the interlocutory decree, and the judgment are void. This application came on to be heard on May 2, 1914, and was granted by order of court setting aside both the interlocutory decree and the final judgment on August 5, 1914. In the January following this court, on motion of plaintiff, dismissed the defendants' appeal from the final judgment for want of prosecution, and at about the same time the trial court dismissed defendants' motion for a new trial; no bill of exceptions or statement having been prepared and settled within the time allowed by law. In January also the plaintiff applied to the trial court for an order vacating its order of August 5, 1914, setting aside the interlocutory decree and final judgment, upon the ground that at the time the order of August 5th was made an appeal was pending from the final judgment, and the trial court was therefore without jurisdiction to make that order. This motion was granted, and thereafter, on March 3, 1915, the trial court permitted the defendants to renew their application and motion previously made, as above stated, for relief under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, asking a vacation of the interlocutory decree and final judgment. It did so upon the ground that, as its previous order vacating these decrees had been made while an appeal was pending in this court, it was absolutely without jurisdiction to make the order, which order was therefore a nullity, and the whole matter consequently stood as if no order had ever been made upon the application; that the effect of the appeal was to suspend, and not destroy, the jurisdiction of the court, which jurisdiction revived upon the coming down of the remittitur from this court dismissing the appeal. Thereupon the court again made its order vacating and setting aside the interlocutory decree and final judgment, and it is from this last order that this appeal is taken.

[1] Manifestly what the court did in granting this motion for relief was based upon its own concept that defendants were entitled, as of strict legal right, to answer the amended complaint, and that the court committed legal error in refusing to accord them that right. But, aside from the proposition advanced by this appellant, and well founded in principle and on authority, that a judicial error such as this is not correctible under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, but is to be remedied by motion for new trial or by appeal from the judgment, and as to a certain limited kind of error by motion under section 663, Code of Civil Procedure (Egan v. Egan, 90 Cal. 15, 27 Pac. 22; O'Brien v. O'Brien, 124 Cal. 422, 57 Pac. 225; Canadian Co. v. Clarita Co., 140 Cal. 672, 74 Pac. 301), and aside also from consideration of the further proposition that, in view of the uncontradicted facts above stated, it is extremely difficult to perceive how the discretion of the court could be invoked upon any theory of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, two fundamental propositions may be considered, both of which sustain appellant's contention that this order must be reversed.

[2] The first of these is the tardiness of the application for relief. It was in July, 1913, that the court entered its interlocutory decree in favor of plaintiff. Without regard to the right of defendants to receive notice of this, it is manifest that they explicitly waived whatever right they had by appearing at all of the hearings of the commissioner, at which hearings evidence was taken. The commissioner filed his report upon January 7, 1914. The final judgment was given on February 9, 1914. It was not until April 24, 1914, that the defendants gave notice of their intention to apply to the court for an order vacating and setting aside both the interlocutory decree and the final judgment. It was nine months after the entry of the interlocutory decree before they made their first effort to set it aside. Not that only, but during the time that elapsed, they participated in the sessions of the commissioner, sought a determination favorable to themselves upon the accounting, and only after they failed and after final judgment had been given against them did they take this procedure. And yet it was vital to the relief which they sought that the interlocutory decree should be set aside, since the interlocutory decree fixed the final rights of the parties, saving as to the amount of the monetary judgment to be given. Application for relief under section 473 must be timely made. It must in all cases be made within six months, and in every case must be made within a reasonable time. Smith v. Pelton Water Wheel Co., 151 Cal. 394, 90 Pac. 934. As concerns the motion to vacate the interlocutory decree, it was actually not made until after nine months; while touching the application to vacate the final judgment, aside from the consideration to which we have already adverted, there was the utterly unexplained delay from February 9th to April 24th, a delay which, under the proved circumstances of this case, establishes beyond peradventure the laches of the defendants.

[3] The second proposition is that the court did not err in refusing leave to the defendants to answer the amended complaint. It will not be questioned but that, where permission to amend to conform to the proofs is given, this does not authorize the setting up of new, distinct causes of action not originally pleaded. Such is the decision in Bowman v. Wohlke, 166 Cal. 121, 135 Pac. 37, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1011, relied upon by respondents here. But the distinction between that case and others of like kind and the one at bar becomes obvious upon the slightest consideration. In the Wohlke Case an entirely new and distinct cause of action based upon a tortious act not complained of was embodied in the amendments to the complaint which the court had permitted. In the case at bar there was no inclusion for the first time of any new cause of action. The cause of action in both the original and in the amended complaint was the same. Plaintiff sought relief for the same breach of trust. The difference between the two causes of action consisted merely in this: That with the evidence of all the parties before it the court concluded that a breach of trust had been committed, but that the breach of trust grew out of the fact that the plaintiff had made over his property to the defendants as security for advancements made by them, whereas the original complaint charged that the breach of trust grew out of the fact that after having taken possession of his property as security for advancements there was a subsequent executory agreement entered into by virtue of which the defendants were to purchase the property. In both cases the fundamental equitable consideration was the same, namely: Was there a breach of trust by virtue of which the defendants were inequitably retaining possession of property rightfully belonging to plaintiff? If so, they were bound to account for their trusteeship. So manifest is this that we think nothing more need be added upon the point, saving to say that the amended complaint permitted to be filed in this instance comes most clearly and appositely within the contemplation of the law as discussed in McDougald v. Argonaut Land Co., 117 Cal. 87, 48 Pac. 1021, where this court says:

> "Amendments made to the complaint after trial, and for the purpose of making it conform to the proof, must rest upon such proof, and cannot go beyond it. They are not made for the purpose of framing issues for the trial, but to supply some technical defect, or, perhaps, upon the supposition that certain issues have been tried which are different from those framed by the pleadings. The supposition is that they have been tried as though such issue had been made."

[4] The same case affords authority, if authority be needed, for the familiar proposition that, when such an amended complaint or amendments to a complaint are filed, no answer thereto is necessary. The issues tendered by the complaint are taken as denied without pleading; they having already been tried by the court.

The order appealed from is therefore reversed.

1. Appeal and Error 🔑870(6)—Orders Appealable—Denial of New Trial.

Though there is no longer any appeal from an order denying a new trial, the court may, under Code Civ. Proc. § 956, providing that on appeal from judgment the court may review an order on motion for new trial, consider the points made in the purported appeal from denial of new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Chas. O. Busick, Judge.

Replevin by the Wiley B. Allen Company against Thama M. Wood. Judgment for defendant, and order denying new trial, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, and appeal from order denying new trial dismissed.

Fred J. Goble, of San Francisco, for appellant. White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action in replevin and arises out of a conditional sale of a piano to the defendant by the plaintiff. The contract for the sale was reduced to writing, and was entered into by the parties at the city of Sacramento on the 5th day of June, 1913, and the agreement was so dated. The agreement is, in substance, as follows: That the defendant was to pay the plaintiff the sum of $1,000, at the latter's office, in the city of San Francisco, for said piano as follows: A "Star Piano Oak," etc., valued at $300; $200 on the 5th day of June, 1913, and $20 or more every month thereafter, beginning on July 1, 1913, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum on balance remaining unpaid, interest payable at expiration of the contract. The agreement expressly stipulates that the title to the said piano shall remain in the plaintiff "and under its direction until paid for in full"; that should there be any default by the defendant in the payment of any one of the monthly installments as above specified, "then the whole amount of this contract becomes at the option of the Wiley B. Allen Company immediately due and payable, it being elective with the Wiley B. Allen Co. to enforce payment or retake the said instrument." The contract contains many other provisions which are not particularly material to the questions submitted by this appeal. The complaint alleges that on the 10th day of April, 1914, the defendant made a payment of $40 on said piano under the terms of said agreement, but that since the payment of the said sum of $40 on said date, the defendant has wholly failed and refused to make any other or further payments in accordance with the terms of the said contract; that after the payment of the said sum of $40, further monthly payments in the sum of $20 each became due, and that the plaintiff made demand upon the defendant for the payment thereof, and that the defendant failed and refused, and still fails and refuses, to pay the same; that the defendant refused, prior to the commencement of this action, to proceed further with said agreement. It is alleged that the total amount paid by the defendant on said piano under the terms of the said agreement is $690 and no interest, and that, at the time of the commencement of this action, there was due the plaintiff under the said agreement the sum of $310 and interest, amounting, to September 1, 1914, to the sum of $38.81. The prayer is for a return of the piano, or in case return thereof cannot be had, for the sum of $1,000, the alleged value thereof. The answer admits the agreement, and that title to the piano remained in the plaintiff, but that such title was, at all times since the execution of said written agreement, subject to the rights thereunder of the defendant; denies all the other vital averments of the complaint, and alleges that the total amount paid by defendant on said piano under said agreement is the sum of $990. After filing the answer, the defendant filed the following supplemental answer:

> "Now, the defendant above named, and by her supplemental answer to the amended complaint signed by Mr. Goble on file herein avers as follows: That subsequent to the commencement of this action, plaintiff waived any and all forfeitures claimed under the amended complaint in this action, and under the contract set forth as Exhibit 1 to the amended complaint herein, in this, to wit: That after the commencement of this action, plaintiff has, from time to time, and monthly, rendered and furnished to defendant statements by the terms of which the plaintiff claims that defendant is still indebted to plaintiff for the purchase price of said piano."

[1] The cause was tried before a jury, and verdict found in favor of the defendant. Upon the verdict so returned judgment was entered, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and also presents a purported appeal from the order denying it a new trial. There is no longer an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial, and the purported appeal therefrom in this case is therefore void. But the points made before the trial court in support of the motion for a new trial may be reviewed on the appeal from the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 956; Torney v. Miller, 160 Pac. 858.

The controversy between the parties here arises over an alleged payment of the sum of $300 by the husband of the defendant on the piano in question.

The general facts are: At the time the piano was sold to the defendant, one Lyle P. Conner was the manager of the Sacramento branch of the plaintiff's business. Conner, it appears, was indebted to one E. A. Janssen, and the last named was indebted to W. G. Wood, the defendant's husband, in the sum of $300. Janssen had caused Conner's automobile and other property to be attached and his salary to be garnished in an action to recover his indebtedness against Conner. On the 28th day of January, 1914, the three parties above named, in pursuance of negotiations previously had and then pending, entered into a written contract, whereby it was agreed that the several accounts between said parties were to be adjusted as follows: Wood was to cancel as satisfied the indebtedness of Janssen to him in the sum of $300 in consideration of a credit in a like sum by Janssen on the indebtedness due to the latter from Conner, and the latter, in consideration of said transaction, was to credit the piano account of the defendant with the sum of $300. This arrangement was carried out, so far as Janssen and Wood were concerned. As to Conner, while he executed and delivered to Wood a receipt for the sum of $300 as a payment on account in the piano transaction between the plaintiff and Mrs. Wood, it transpired that he did not enter a credit in the piano account in the books of the plaintiff of the $300 so claimed to have been paid thereon, or make any other record in the appropriate books of the concern of said transaction.

The plaintiff claims that Conner was wholly without authority to enter into the agreement above referred to for and on behalf of it, and that therefore the agreement, so far as it purports to bind it, is entirely without force. The defendant, on the other hand, submits that there are two propositions upon either of which or both the judgment should be sustained: (1) That the evidence at least shows that there was ostensible authority in Conner to accept a payment on account of the debt due the plaintiff from the defendant for the piano under the arrangement provided by the tripartite agreement, so far as that transaction related to Conner and the defendant's husband; (2) that, after the filing of the complaint in this action, the plaintiff made several demands upon the defendant for the payment of installments under the contract for the sale of the piano which were overdue, and that by making such demands, the plaintiff waived its right to a forfeiture of the contract and the moneys already paid thereunder; that, therefore, the plaintiff lost its right to retake possession of the piano; and that its sole remedy is in the recovery of whatever might be the balance due on the contract for the sale of the instrument.

W. G. Wood, the husband of the defendant, testified that he conducted the negotiations on behalf of his wife for the purchase of the piano as well as those resulting in the execution of the agreement between himself, Janssen, and Conner; and the general tenor of his own testimony would seem to warrant no other conclusion than that the arrangement entered into between him and Conner, as stipulated in the tripartite agreement, whereby he was to obtain for the defendant a credit of $300 on her piano account with the plaintiff, was wholly founded upon and solely induced by the mere representation of Conner that he (Conner) was entitled to receive from the plaintiff certain commissions, which he could and would transfer to the credit side of the defendant's piano account in consideration of the said tripartite agreement. Wood testified, in part:

"I acted for my wife, the defendant, in the purchase of this piano. * * * The original price was $1,000. * * *"

Direct examination:

"Q. What information have you as to Mr. Conner's agency for the company during the time the receipts were given? A. I simply knew he was their local manager in Sacramento. * * * Q. At the time this $300 receipt was given to you, Mr. Conner represented to you, did he not, that he had that credit with the company, in excess of that amount? A. Yes. Q. Did he also represent to you that he would transfer that credit to your account? A. He did. Q. Did he afterwards tell you that he had done so? A. No. I do not know that we ever discussed it afterwards. Q. He gave you this receipt at that time? A. He gave me the receipt for $300."

On cross-examination:

"Q. You stated that Mr. Conner told you that he had $300 due commission from the Wiley B. Allen Company at the time? A. Yes. Q. At the time he gave you that receipt for $300, which is in evidence? A. He told me he had more than that coming; he was working on a salary and on a commission; his commissions on the books were considerably more than that. Q. Did you know, as a matter of fact, whether he had any commission due him or not? A. I was not in a position to know anything about that. Q. Did you take any steps to find out? A. No. Q. Did you make any inquiries from any other source at all to find out whether he had any commissions coming to him? A. No. While I am not sure he had; I accepted his word."

The witness then proceeded to say that: While he was prepared to pay Conner $300 cash—that is to say, to receive into his physical possession from Janssen the $300 and then turn it over to Conner—there was no actual money exchanged or paid to Conner. "I agreed on this transaction," he continued, "principally on account of being that it would enable Conner to straighten out his affairs with Janssen. His automobile was under attachment; he stated that this was the only way in which he could straighten out his affairs; I should judge the payment was just as good that way as any other. * * * I do not know whether the Wiley B. Allen Company got it or not. I did not concern myself whether they got that $300."

The witness (W. G. Wood) testified that the negotiations leading to the agreement between himself, Janssen, and Conner were pending or in progress in the month of December, 1913. Under date of December 16, 1913, said Wood addressed the following letter to the plaintiff, at the latter's office in the city of San Francisco:

"Gentlemen: In reply to your favor of the 9th inst., addressed to my wife, I wish to say that the payments for this month and last were not made on account of the fact that I have been waiting for an account of Mr. Conner's, your Sacramento agent, to be adjusted. I have sufficient interest in this account to offset the balance due, and I have been holding payments per agreement with Mr. Conner pending the settlement of this account. I asked him some time ago to explain the situation to you, but I judge he has failed to do so."

Evidently in reply to the above letter, the plaintiff addressed the following to W. G. Wood:

"Dear Sir: Your letter of the 16th received. Mr. Conner is employed by us on a straight salary and his personal obligations have nothing to do with the company's account. If Mr. Conner is indebted to you, we would suggest that you proceed in the customary manner to make your collection. We hardly feel that we can consent to allow our account to run unpaid for this reason. The matters are not related to one another in any way. The installments now due on the account to $40.00, and we would greatly appreciate your check to bring this up to date.
"Yours very truly,
"The Wiley B. Allen Company."

The above testimony clearly shows, as before stated, that the $300 transaction between Conner and Wood was entirely a personal affair between them; that Wood relied wholly upon the representations made by Conner that there was, at the time of said transaction, due the latter from the plaintiff commissions which were sufficient in amount to enable Conner to credit the defendant's piano account with the sum of $300, and that Conner would so credit said account. In brief, the testimony unquestionably shows that the "three-cornered" agreement involved nothing more than the adjustment or settlement of personal accounts between the three parties thereto, and that Conner's position in the transaction amounted only to an agreement by him to assume, in consideration of Wood's settlement of the attachment suit instituted by Janssen against him (Conner), personal liability for a portion of the balance due from the defendant to the plaintiff. There is absolutely no evidence, either of a direct or circumstantial character, showing, or tending to show, that the plaintiff knew of the arrangement entered into between Conner and W. G. Wood prior to or at the time of the making of the agreement, or that it sanctioned or approved or ratified said arrangement thereafter. To the contrary, the letters passing between W. G. Wood and the plaintiff, noted above, not only show that the plaintiff repudiated the arrangement which was the basis of the tripartite agreement, so far as it concerned Conner and W. G. Wood, but that the latter himself must have viewed said agreement as involving a matter entirely between and personal to himself and Conner.

The defendant claims, however, that there is evidence clearly supporting the proposition that Conner had ostensible authority to bind the company to the arrangement into which he entered with W. G. Wood. The evidence so referred to is of the following facts: That Conner was "designated as the Company's manager"; that the company furnished Conner with business cards upon which were printed the name of the company and the words, "L. P. Conner, Manager"; that Conner was, in the sale of pianos, authorized to accept secondhand pianos as in part payment for the pianos sold, and that in the transaction with the defendant he did accept a secondhand piano as in part payment for the piano sold. It is hence argued that, having those "broad and general powers" necessarily implied from the fact that he was plaintiff's manager, and having the power to accept property (secondhand pianos) in the place of coin in payment for pianos by him sold, Conner was apparently vested with authority by his principal to bind the company to any arrangement which he might make in relation to contracts for the sale of pianos; or, speaking concretely, he was ostensibly authorized to make for the company the arrangement to which he and Wood agreed. After calling attention to the facts thus referred to, counsel for the defendant proceed to say that:

> "It is true, as appellant asserts, that an agent cannot trade his principal's credit for his own advantage, but where the agent represents that he has paid the principal or has credited the principal with the amount on the agent's claim against the principal, the debtor has a right to rely and act thereon. This is especially true where the agent is a collecting agent and has been held out as such. The receipt in this case came from one who was accustomed to collect and give receipts, and his statement that he had paid his principal is binding on the principal."

[2] The application of the rule of ostensible agency or authority depends primarily upon the acts or conduct or words of the principal, and not upon the acts or conduct or words of the agent. The rule is that a principal will be bound by those acts of his agent which he has given other persons reason to suppose are done by his authority, but, as suggested, such authority arises by implication, and can only spring from the words, acts, or conduct of the principal.

The rule, which involves the doctrine of estoppel, and which, when invoked in proper cases, stands as a shield against the working of unjust injury to third parties, is stated as above, and as so stated applied in the cases cited by the attorneys for the defendant as in purported support of their theory of the facts of this case, viz.: Leavens v. Pinkham & McKevitt, 164 Cal. 242, 248, 128 Pac. 399; Robinson v. A. F. Co., 17 Cal. App. 212, 219, 119 Pac. 388; Stevens v. Selma Fruit Co., 18 Cal. App. 242, 250, 123 Pac. 212; Spoon v. Sheldon, 27 Cal. App. 765, 770, 151 Pac. 150; Bank v. Cerf, 147 Cal. 393, 81 Pac. 1081.

[3] There is, as we view the record, absolutely no evidence showing that the plaintiff, by any act or conduct or words spoken, held out to the public or to the defendant that Conner was authorized for the company to settle any of the accounts of the plaintiff in the manner indicated by the tripartite agreement. The fact that Conner was authorized as manager of the company to receive money for it from its patrons and execute and deliver receipts therefor in its name cannot reasonably be said to warrant or justify the inference or the conclusion that he (Conner) was authorized to adjust or settle his own personal indebtedness to a debtor of the company by substituting himself as the debtor of the company in the place and stead of the party owing the debt. The authority to execute a receipt for money paid to him for the company does not imply authority to make settlements with debtors of the company on a basis different from that prescribed by the company's contracts with its debtors, or to deliver receipts for money in the company's name when none is actually paid.

[4] Nor does the fact that Conner was authorized to accept secondhand pianos as in part payment for a new piano sold through him by the company imply authority in him to receive in payment of the debts due to the company property other than coin. The company's business is that of selling pianos, and it is of so common a practice for piano dealers to take and make some allowance for an old instrument when making a sale of a new one that it can justly be declared to be a matter of common knowledge that such is the established custom, and that the taking of an old piano as part payment for a new instrument of that character is one of the recognized common practices of the business of selling pianos. Hence, we repeat, the circumstance that, in selling a piano to the defendant, the plaintiff accepted from her a secondhand piano in the trade or as in part payment for the new piano, is not to be regarded as evidence from which the defendant or her husband or the public generally was justified in forming the belief, or even the remotest impression that Conner was vested with the authority as the plaintiff's agent to cancel or satisfy the defendant's indebtedness to the company by assuming himself, for a consideration entirely personal to himself, personal liability for such indebtedness.

[5] As to the second point made by the defendant, we can find no occasion for holding that the plaintiff forfeited its right to retake possession of the piano in question because it made demands upon the defendant after the commencement of this action for the payment of installments under the contract and in which she was in arrears. The contract between the plaintiff and the defendant was for the sale of the piano, a mere conditional sale, and the title to the instrument remained in the plaintiff. As the Supreme Court said, in considering a contract precisely similar to the one here, in Hegler v. Eddy, 53 Cal. 597:

> "The rules of forfeiture do not seem to have any application to the question of the right to the possession of the property. Forfeiture involves both the idea of losing property by a delinquent party, and the transfer of it to another without the consent of the delinquent. Here the ownership was not transferred; for it remained in the plaintiff and his assignors; nor was the right of possession transferred; for the defendant had only such right to the possession as the contract gave, which was merely the right to the use and possession until default should be made in the payment of installments. The plaintiff's right to the possession comes from his ownership of the property; and this right, while he remains the owner, is merely suspended, by virtue of the contract, until the defendant shall make default in paying the installments, and thereupon his right of possession ceases; but it cannot be said to be transferred to the plaintiff."

See Pac. Carbonator Co. v. Haydes & Son, 26 Cal. App. 607, 147 Pac. 988.

The act of instituting this action by the plaintiff to regain possession of the piano constituted the exercise of its right of election under the contract to retake the instrument, and it would appear to be most unreasonable, even if the rules of forfeiture were applicable to such contracts as the one involved here, to hold it to be true, as a legal proposition, that the effect of submitting statements to the defendant, showing the installments due and overdue, would be to destroy the right of election already exercised. Of course, if the defendant had, after the commencement of this action, paid all installments due on demands therefor made by the plaintiff after the complaint herein was filed, then an entirely different situation would be presented. But there is no evidence that she did this, or offered to do it.

For the reasons stated herein, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

The appeal from the order denying a new trial is, as above declared, void, but to avoid any possible confusion which might arise from a failure to make any disposition thereof, the order is that said appeal be, and the same is hereby, dismissed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

RAUER'S LAW & COLLECTION CO. v. HARRELL. (Civ. 1576.)

1. Bills and Notes 🔑518(1)—Actions—Evidence—Conditional Liability — "Underwrite."

In action on notes, evidence held to warrant the jury in concluding that liability on the notes was conditioned upon tender or delivery of bonds which defendant had undertaken to "underwrite," that is, if defendant failed to sell the bonds referred to, he would take such bonds as he did not sell, and that such bonds were not tendered or delivered because stockholders holding two-thirds of the subscribed or issued capital stock had not filed with the secretary their written assent to their issuance, as required by Civ. Code, § 359, subd. 5.

2. Bills and Notes 🔑518(1)—Actions—Evidence.

In such action, evidence held not to show that defendant was responsible for stockholders' nonconsent to bond issuance.

3. Bills and Notes 🔑445—Actions—Anticipatory Breach—Intention Not Communicated.

That at one time defendant concluded not to go ahead with the transaction, but that his state of mind was not communicated to the payee, was not such repudiation of his obligation as to release the payee from performance on its part, under Civ. Code, §§ 1439, 1440, relating to conditional obligations and providing that if a party to such obligation gives notice to another, before the latter is in default, that he will not perform, and does not retract such notice before the time at which performance on his part is due, such other party may enforce the obligation without previously performing.

4. Appeal and Error 🔑1058(1)—Harmless Error—Exclusion of Evidence.

The exclusion of the minutes of the payee corporation pertaining to the issuance of the bonds was not prejudicial, where later the resolution authorizing the bonds, covering the same matter, was introduced.

5. Witnesses 🔑275(3) — Cross-Examination—Latitude.

Plaintiff's contention being that 3,400 shares of the payee company's stock were issued to plaintiff, which gave him power to secure consent of two-thirds of the stockholders to the issuance of bonds, and defendant's contention being that such stock was issued merely to be delivered as a bonus for the bonds, it was error to sustain objections to questions on cross-examination whether defendant ever offered to return the shares to the company, and whether he had ever written a letter to the company advising his disposition of the stock, etc., since full latitude should have been given to test the probability or improbability, of defendant's account of this transaction.

6. Appeal and Error 🔑1048(7)—Harmless Error—Restriction of Cross-Examination.

Such restriction of cross-examination, however, held not prejudicial.

7. Bills and Notes 🔑493(3)—Performance of Condition by Payee—Burden of Proof.

The burden was on plaintiff to show affirmatively that defendant by his conduct prevented the payee company from getting out its bond issue.

8. CONTRACTS 🔑313(2) — ANTICIPATORY BREACH.

In order to justify the adverse party in treating renunciation as a breach, the refusal to perform must be of the whole contract, or of a covenant going to the whole consideration, and must be distinct, unequivocal, and absolute.

9. CONTRACTS 🔑313(1) — ANTICIPATORY BREACH—ELECTION.

Renunciation of a contract by a party does not, ipso facto, constitute a breach, but the adverse party has the election whether or not to treat it as a breach.

10. TRIAL 🔑252(12)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

In an action on notes conditioned on delivery of bonds, an instruction that, if issuance of the bonds was never authorized, plaintiff could not recover was not erroneous as failing to submit defendant's alleged conduct in preventing the company from issuing the bonds, where there was no substantial evidence of such alleged conduct.

11. EVIDENCE 🔑86 — PRESUMPTIONS — EFFECT.

Presumptions, although disputable, have such force as may, in some instances, outweigh positive evidence against them, and sometimes require clear and convincing evidence to overcome them.

12. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1064(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In action upon notes, an instruction that the presumption that a consideration passed for the execution of the instruments, being a disputable presumption, was the weakest and least satisfactory evidence, while erroneous, was not prejudicial, where the fact was admitted out of which the presumption arose, namely, that defendant did execute the notes.

13. TRIAL 🔑252(12)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

In action upon notes given to a corporation, it was not error to instruct that the fact defendant was paid a salary for his services as secretary of the company constituted no consideration for the notes, where there was no evidence indicating that his salary in any way induced defendant to make the notes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by the Rauer's Law & Collection Company against A. J. Harrell. From judgment for defendant and order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Tomsky and A. H. Jarman, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Farnsworth & McClure and James M. Burke, all of Visalia, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff brought the action to recover judgment on two promissory notes. In the first cause of action it is alleged that defendant made and executed his promissory note for the sum of $34,000 at the city and county of San Francisco, dated September 22, 1913, payable on January 2, 1914, to the order of the maker at the Savings Bank & Trust Company of San Francisco; that at said time and place defendant indorsed said note and delivered the same to the Pacific Coast Salt Company; that thereafter and prior to the commencement of this action and after the maturity of said note, the said Pacific Coast Salt Company "assigned said claim and demand to plaintiff, who ever since has been and now is the owner and holder thereof," and no part of said sum mentioned in said note has been paid. As a second cause of action it is alleged that defendant on September 22, 1913, made and executed his certain promissory note for the sum of $5,000 payable one day after date to the order of the maker at the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company of San Francisco. Similar averments follow as to indorsement and delivery to the Pacific Coast Salt Company, assignment by said company to plaintiff, and nonpayment, as in the first cause of action. This note bore no date, and, as appeared, was executed June 16, 1913. A general and special demurrer was overruled, and defendant filed a second amended answer; admitted the execution on September 22, 1913, of the note set forth in the first cause of action, but denied that he delivered said note to said Salt Company; alleged that no consideration was ever paid to or received by defendant for said promissory note, and that the same was signed by defendant without any consideration therefor; denied, on information and belief, the alleged assignment of said note by the Salt Company to plaintiff, and denied that plaintiff is the owner and holder thereof; denied that defendant owes plaintiff, or any other person, anything on account of said note set forth in the first cause of action, and alleged in that behalf the said note was made without any consideration; answering the second cause of action, admitted the execution of the $5,000 note, but denied its indorsement or assignment to the Salt Company, and denied that the note was made on September 22, 1913, and denied its assignment by the Salt Company to plaintiff, and that plaintiff is the owner and holder thereof; denied any indebtedness thereon; and alleged that said note was made without any consideration; for a further and separate answer and defense to each of said notes, alleged that said notes mentioned in said first and second causes of action were made pursuant to the following agreement between W. C. Wilcox, president and manager of said Pacific Coast Salt Company and defendant:

"This agreement, made and entered into this 16th day of June, 1913, between W. C. Wilcox, the party of the first part, and Jasper Harrell, the party of the second part, W. C. Wilcox being of the city and county of San Francisco, and Jasper Harrell being of the city of Visalia, Tulare county, state of California, witnesseth: That the party of the first part agrees to give his proxy for all of the common stock now held by him, in the Pacific Coast Salt Company. It is understood and agreed, that the salary of the secretary and treasurer is to be $100.00 per month, payable in United States gold coin, and the railroad fares to and from San Francisco for the purpose of attending directors' meetings; the party of the second part agrees to purchase five thousand dollars worth of seven per cent. income debenture bonds subject to the subscription of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000.00) of these bonds to be called by the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company, to be held there in trust for the Pacific Coast Salt Company and to be dispersed according to the directors of the Pacific Coast Salt Company for the purchase of salt property and the erection of a refinery.

"Witness our hands and seals this 16th day of June, nineteen hundred and thirteen.

"W. C. Wilcox.
"A. J. Harrell.

"The party of the first part further agrees to accept as collateral to secure payment of the debenture bonds, any of the standard bonds now held by the party of the second part, no expense to be incurred by the party of the second part. At the maturity of the debenture bonds, the party of the first part will return the bonds put up as collateral by the party of the second part.

"W. C. Wilcox,
"A. J. Harrell."

That said Wilcox was at all times mentioned in the answer president of said Salt Company, and said agreement was executed on its behalf by said Wilcox; that on or about September 19, 1913, the following agreement was signed by defendant:

"Subscription Agreement.

"The undersigned hereby severally subscribe, each for himself, in the amounts set opposite our respective names, for the seven per cent cumulative income debenture bonds of the Pacific Coast Salt Company, secured by a trust indenture of the properties now owned or that may hereafter be acquired by said company during the life of said debenture.

"It is understood that the principal shall become payable in twenty (20) years after date and interest payable semiannually on the first of January and July, and if earned, otherwise to the extent that the net earning of the company will permit the remainder of such interest to accumulate and become payable with the principal of said debentures.

"F. C. Cardwell	$1,000.
"A. J. Harrell	$5,000.
"Otto Spenker	$1,000.
"John Boyce	$1,000.
"F. C. Hanscheldt	$1,000.
"Mtth. Weisser	$5,000."

That said promissory note of $5,000 was signed by defendant pursuant to said last above agreement, and was to cover the amount of the subscription of said defendant under said agreement aforesaid, and not otherwise, "and was intended for a subscription for five cumulative income debenture bonds of the Pacific Coast Salt Company for $1,000 each, secured by a trust indenture as in said agreement stated, and in that behalf said defendant alleges that the bonds so subscribed for by defendant were never, nor were any thereof ever, delivered to or received by defendant, or ever offered to defendant, and defendant alleges on information and belief that no bonds, of any kind or description, of said Pacific Coast Salt Company, were ever made or issued under or pursuant to the terms of said agreement aforesaid, or otherwise, or at all"; that on or about September 19, 1913, "an agreement herein referred to as 'Exhibit B,'" was signed by said A. J. Harrell and by said Pacific Coast Salt Company, a copy of which said agreement is as follows:

"This agreement, made and entered into by and between A. J. Harrell, of Visalia, state of California, and the Pacific Coast Salt Company, organized under the laws of the state of California and having its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, witnesseth: That, whereas, the said Pacific Coast Salt Company, is desirous of issuing, and is about to issue, one hundred (100) bonds of one thousand dollars ($1,000.00) each, and to sell and dispose of fifty (50) of said bonds for $1,000.00 each, for the purpose of raising money to erect a plant and purchase salt lands, and to erect a plant thereon for the purpose of refining salt; and whereas, there have been subscribed of the said fifty bonds of one thousand dollars each, sixteen (16) bonds for which the company has the notes of subscribers in the aggregate sum of sixteen thousand dollars ($16,000.00); and whereas, the said A. J. Harrell is willing to underwrite the balance of said fifty thousand dollars ($50,000.00) issue, to wit: Thirty-four bonds of one thousand dollars each: Now, therefore, it is agreed between the parties hereto as follows: That the said company upon the issuance of said bonds will deliver to the said A. J. Harrell thirty-four (34) thereof in consideration of a promissory note by said A. J. Harrell in the sum of thirty-four thousand dollars ($34,000.00); that said promissory note together with the said notes covering the sixteen thousand dollars ($16,000) already subscribed, shall be deposited with the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company of San Francisco, for the purpose of the trust herein to be created by said company. That the said A. J. Harrell agrees to sell said bonds for the company, receiving in consideration of said sale the accrued interest due thereon at the time of said sale. That the company promises and agrees to pay all preliminary expenses of the issuance of said bonds, and all the preliminary and other expenses, including commissions of agents incurred in the sale thereof, and to assist in every possible way to make a market for the said bonds. That as fast as said bonds are sold, the said moneys obtained from the sale thereof shall be deposited by said Harrell in some bank or banks, designated by him, until the full number of bonds which he hereby assumed to sell shall have been sold, and thereupon said moneys shall be delivered to the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company of San Francisco, to be applied by said bank in accordance with the trust agreement hereafter to be made by said Pacific Coast Salt Company for the issuance of said bonds. It is further agreed that no moneys realized from the sale of said bonds after the same has been deposited with the banks designated by said Harrell, shall be withdrawn therefrom, except upon the joint order of the said A. J. Harrell and the directors of the Pacific Coast Salt Company.

"In witness whereof, the parties hereto have executed this contract the 19th day of September, 1913. A. J. Harrell. Pacific Coast Salt Co., by W. C. Wilcox, President & General Mgr. A. E. Matteson, Asst. Secty. [Seal.]"

That said promissory note of $34,000 was signed by defendant "pursuant to said agreement referred to herein as 'Exhibit B' and hereinbefore set forth" and said note "was intended to be delivered only as in said agreement, 'Exhibit B,' stated and not otherwise, and only upon delivery to said A. J. Harrell of 34 bonds of $1,000 each of said Pacific Coast Salt Company as provided in said agreement, and in that behalf said defendant alleges that said 34 bonds were never, nor were any thereof ever, delivered to or received by defendant, or ever offered to defendant, and defendant alleges on information and belief that no such bonds and no bonds of any kind or description of said Pacific Coast Salt Company, were ever made or issued by said Pacific Coast Salt Company, and said defendant further alleges that there was no consideration for said agreement referred to as 'Exhibit B.'" Defendant prays that each of said notes be declared void and be canceled, and that plaintiff take nothing by his action. The cause was tried by jury, and defendant had the verdict, whereupon judgment was entered that plaintiff take nothing by this action, and that defendant recover his costs. Plaintiff appealed from the judgment under the alternative method.

The Pacific Coast Salt Company (hereinafter called the Salt Company) was incorporated for the purpose of carrying on the business of manufacturing salt, etc., and had its principal place of business at San Francisco. It took over the assets and business of the Dento Salt Company, formerly doing business in the city of Stockton. The present controversy arose out of defendant's connection with the Pacific Coast Salt Company. The president and manager of the Salt Company, W. C. Wilcox, met defendant in Stockton on or about June 15, 1913. Defendant had read, or there was read to him, a letter written by Mr. Welch, president of the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company of San Francisco, of date April 14, 1913, in which Welch stated what he understood were the plans of the Salt Company for "financing certain projects." These plans were stated to be: (1) To raise $50,000 to be placed with the bank and to be disbursed "for the acquisition of real estate and the erection thereon of buildings for the purpose of a salt refinery"; (2) "to raise the money through the issue of what is known as 'income debentures,' of which this company [the bank] will be the trustee," and to be secured by the Salt Company's property. The letter then explains what is meant by "income debentures" and the form they should take, and like matters, inclosing "a form of subscription blank." The form of "subscription agreement" subsequently prepared and used is attached to defendant's answer and, at the time of the meeting between Mr. Wilcox and defendant, had been signed by W. C. Wilcox, $2,000 and F. C. Cardwell, $1,000. Wilcox and defendant went to San Francisco, and on June 16, 1913, entered into the agreement set out in the answer, by which Wilcox agreed to give defendant his proxy for all the common stock then held by him, and by which defendant agreed to purchase $5,000 worth of the bonds subject to the subscription of $50,000 of these bonds to be called by the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company. At the same time and as part of the same transaction, as the evidence was, defendant signed the "subscription agreement" for $5,000 of the bonds, and executed the $5,000 note sued upon. (The complaint alleged the date of this note as September 22, 1913.) Additional subscriptions for bonds were subsequently obtained by Wilcox, aggregating the sum of $16,000 as shown by the agreement.

In the early part of September, 1913, Wilcox went to Visalia, defendant's home, to consider further with him the matter of completing the subscription agreement. Defendant, as the result of this conference, took from his safe deposit box in a Visalia bank, stocks, and bonds amounting to $40,000, and sent them by express to the San Francisco trust company above referred to, and defendant and Wilcox went to San Francisco. Upon going to the trust company, defendant and Wilcox were told that the trust company would not accept anything but money in carrying out the proposed plan of financing the company. Defendant withdrew his securities from the trust company, and they do not appear further in the case. Wilcox and defendant then went to the office of Attorney Fairall, who drew up for them what is called the "underwriting agreement" of September 19, 1913, set forth in the answer. At the same time, Wilcox and defendant entered into the following agreement, referred to for convenience as the "control agreement":

"This agreement, made and entered into by and between A. J. Harrell, of Visalia, Tulare county, state of California, and W. C. Wilcox of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, witnesseth: Whereas, the said W. C. Wilcox owns a majority of the shares of the capital stock of the Pacific Coast Salt Company; and whereas, the said A. J. Harrell has entered into an agreement with the Pacific Coast Salt Company this day for underwriting thirty-four (34) bonds of one thousand dollars ($1,000.00) each, to be issued by the said Pacific Coast Salt Company: Now, therefore, it is agreed that the said W. C. Wilcox shall vote the stock of said Pacific Coast Salt Company for the purpose of electing directors thereof as shall be directed by the said A. J. Harrell and there shall be elected, besides the said W. C. Wilcox, four other directors selected and chosen by the said A. J. Harrell and said A. J. Harrell shall have control of said stock owned by the said W. C. Wilcox in the said Pacific Coast Salt Company for and during the full period of time that the said bonds of the said Pacific Coast Salt Company shall be an outstanding obligation against the said A. J. Harrell.

"In witness whereof, the parties hereto have executed this contract this 19th day of September, 1913.
A. J. Harrell [Seal.]
"W. C. Wilcox [Seal.]"

The note for $34,000, dated September 22, 1913, the evidence tended to show, was signed at the same time as the "underwriting agreement," and the "control agreement." About the same time there was issued to defendant 3,400 shares of the Salt Company's stock of the par value of $10 each.

On September 23, 1913, a meeting of the Salt Company directors was held, at which a resolution was passed ratifying the "underwriting agreement." Certain directors resigned, and directors acceptable to defendant were chosen in their stead, namely: Defendant and Charles Gibson of Visalia. Geo. A. Macdougald was elected to fill a vacancy. These three were chosen, at defendant's suggestion, and on October 14, 1913, defendant's wife was made a director. Defendant was elected secretary and treasurer at the September meeting, and was voted a salary of $100 per month, to commence immediately. Director Gibson was not present, and as the action of a full board was required to authorize the bond issue, no action was then taken. On the following day, September 24, 1913, Attorney Fairall prepared a letter of instruction to the trust company at the request of Wilcox and defendant, in which were inclosed the subscription notes of the various subscriptions for the first $16,000, including defendant's note for $5,000, and also the other note for $34,000. It was stated in the letter that these notes were placed with the trust company "at the present time for safe-keeping and the company will hereafter, as soon as the bond issue has been authorized, give you more particular instructions. * * * Proceedings are now being taken by the Pacific Coast Salt Company to authorize a bond issue of $160,000, $50,000 of which will be taken by the makers of the several notes which are inclosed herewith, in the amounts specified in said notes respectively." The trust company was requested to acknowledge receipt of this letter "by letter addressed to the Pacific Coast Salt Company." On September 26, 1913, a letter was sent by the Salt Company to each of the subscribers of bonds. It stated that subscriptions to the amount of $50,000 had been taken, and the notes of the subscribers placed in the hands of the trust company. Remittance was requested of the amount of the respective subscriptions, and it was stated that as soon as all the money is paid in, $50,000, bonds will be issued to the subscribers, and meanwhile the trustee "will issue temporary certificates for the amount of money received from each subscriber," exchangeable for bonds when issued. Defendant had knowledge of the issuance of this letter. There seems not to have been any important business transacted by the Salt Company after this letter went out until October 14, 1913, when it became possible to have a full attendance of the board of directors. Meanwhile, however, defendant was in San Francisco and in and out of the company's office attending to such duties as were required of him as secretary and treasurer. On October 14, 1913, a resolution was introduced by defendant and passed by an unanimous vote, authorizing a bond issue of $160,000, and setting forth its object and the character and form of the bond, etc. A letter, signed by defendant as secretary, was sent out to the stockholders of the Salt Company informing them of the passage of the above resolution; that the first issue of $50,000 has been subscribed and notes for the same placed with the trust company, and "requesting the stockholders to sign the inclosed authorization and have the same acknowledged before a notary public and mailed to the company immediately," and inclosing a copy of the resolution. The amount of the bonded indebtedness was fixed at $160,000—an increase from the original amount contemplated—after a full discussion of the probable needs of the company.

Defendant continued in the discharge of his duties as secretary, and also visited Stockton for the purpose of selling bonds. On November 5, 1913, he drew $150 and left the office of the company, going to Visalia, as he testified, "to try to get subscriptions to the bonds," and did not again return to the company's office.

Up to this point, so far as the Salt Company was called upon to act, it had apparently done all it could towards the issue of the bonds. The directors had authorized the issue, and the stockholders had been notified and their ratification requested.

Under the law, however, no bonds could be issued until stockholders holding two-thirds of the subscribed or issued capital stock had filed with the secretary their written assent to the bond issue. Subdivision 5, § 359, Civ. Code.

No meetings of the directors were had in the months of November and December, 1913, or January and February, 1914. The minutes show Directors Wilcox and Collins present and the remaining directors absent, and, no quorum being present, the meeting adjourned. This action was brought on February 5, 1914, and at the regular meeting in March, 1914, the resignations of Directors Gibson, Macdougald, Mrs. Harrell and defendant were accepted and others elected in their places.

At the bringing of the action the consent of two-thirds of the stockholders to the bond issue had not been obtained, and no bonds had been issued, nor has such consent been since obtained nor have any bonds been issued since so far as the evidence shows.

Arriving at Visalia, defendant consulted his attorney, and, being advised that he "was getting the worst of it" he made no effort to sell bonds and made up his mind to go no further with the enterprise. On cross-examination he testified:

"Q. Did you ever intend to do anything after talking with your attorney in November, towards the selling of bonds or obtaining subscriptions? A. I did not. Q. So that your mind, after talking with your attorney in November, 1913, was made up that you would never carry out your agreement made on the 19th day of September, 1913? A. He told me that I was getting the worst of it. Q. Your mind was then made up that you would never go ahead with it? A. He told me that I was getting the worst of it, and, of course, I would not go ahead with it. Q. When you say 'of course, I would not go ahead with it,' you mean that your mind was made up then that you would never go ahead and complete the agreement? A. Why, certainly; yes, sir."

About November 25, 1913, defendant went to San Francisco and met Dr. Wilcox at the Olympic Club. Defendant testified on his cross-examination:

"I phoned Dr. Wilcox to meet me at the Olympic Club. I handed him my resignation as a director and also as secretary and treasurer. Q. When you handed it to Dr. Wilcox, did you give him any reason why you wanted to resign? A. I believe that I did. Q. What did you say? A. I have forgotten the exact reason now that I gave him, but something about—I have forgotten the exact reason; I cannot remember it now. Q. Did you give him the true reasons? A. No, sir. Q. I wish that you would refresh your memory and tell the court and jury the reason that you gave Dr. Wilcox for wanting to resign as a director and as secretary and treasurer. A. I have got no way to refresh my memory right now. I have forgotten.

"Mr. Jarman: Q. Did you testify in respect to the following questions found on page 77 of your deposition, as follows: 'Q. Did you give Mr. Wilcox a reason why you handed in your resignation at that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was the reason? A. I did not give him the correct reason because I did not like to say anything to him about it. Q. What was the reason that you told him? A. Let's see. I told him—well, I was in trouble with my wife, having trouble with my wife and one thing another, and I wanted to get out of the Salt Company. Q. You told Mr. Wilcox that you were having trouble with your wife, and that you wanted to get out of it so that she could not get hold of your property? A. Yes, sir.' Q. Didn't you give those answers to those questions on the taking of your deposition in this courtroom on the 31st day of October? A. May I see the deposition? Q. Certainly (hands deposition to witness). A. Yes, sir; I believe that I testified to that. Q. That is correct, is it? A. Yes, I guess that it is."

Of this meeting, Dr. Wilcox testified:

"Mr. Jarman: After the 5th or 6th of November, 1913, when did you next see the defendant? A. The 25th of November in San Francisco, in the Olympic Club. Q. Who was present? A. Mr. Harrell and myself. Q. What did Mr. Harrell say to you at that time? A. He said that—oh, after having a little conversation and coming right down to the business end of it, he said that he was having some trouble with his wife and that he would have to resign from the company and he gave me to understand— Q. State what was said. A. He said that it would be temporary. And I asked him in relation to the bond business that we were on with the company, and he says, 'Well, that will have to stand.' He says, 'For the time being, as I am having trouble with my wife, and I do not care to be mixed up with anything right now, as I must get the securities out of my hands.' He says, 'I am going back to Visalia and going to work on a ranch at $45 a month,' I think he said. I says, 'Well, what are you going to do about the bonds of the company? Are you going to get them out, or anything?' He says, 'They will have to stand.' He says, 'I won't have anything to do with them now.' Q. Is that the sum and substance of the conversation at the Olympic Club? A. That is about all there was. And we got on the train and went to Stockton the same day, I think it was."

Witness Wilcox thus describes their visit and final meeting which was about December 2, 1913:

"Mr. Jarman: Did you see Mr. Harrell again after the 25th of November? A. Along the early part of December. Q. Answer my question yes or no. A. Yes, sir. Q. When was it? A. The 2d of December. Q. When did you see him? A. At Visalia. Q. And where in Visalia? A. At his ranch. Q. Was there anybody else present? A. Oh, there was other people on the ranch there, but he and I were talking together. Q. What was said at that time, if anything, in reference to the bond issue of the company? A. Well, I told him that we had some land, the Matteson property in Alameda county, that we wished to purchase, and that we would have to raise $10,000. I showed him the certificates of the deposit that I had collected from the bond men, and I told him that we had to have some more money, and for him to help us out and fulfill his contract. He says, 'I can raise the money over around Exeter or Lindsay.' He says, 'I will let you know in five days exactly what I will do. I will telephone to you.' And I described the properties to him over there, and told him about it; and told him the importance of doing something in regard to this bond issue, and he gave the same reasons then. He says: 'I can't do anything.' He says, 'I haven't got anything.' He says, 'Everything is out of my name.' He says, 'I am simply working on a salary.' Q. Was that all that Mr. Harrell said about giving the $10,000? A. He told me that he was going to get it and let me have it in five days. Q. Did you ever hear from him after December 2d? A. No, sir; not from Mr. Harrell. Q. Did he ever send you $10,000 or any part of the money? A. No, sir."

Wilcox testified that he wrote a letter to Harrell shortly after December 2, 1913, but received no reply. This letter was not introduced, nor its contents shown. He also testified that about March 20, 1913, he learned, but how does not appear, that defendant would not carry out his agreement. It may be remarked that neither in the pleadings nor in the evidence is there any suggestion of fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment on the part of the Salt Company or respondent. Appellant's contention is that the Salt Company did not fail in any respect to comply with this agreement; that the contract was breached by respondent; that respondent failed to establish that said notes were signed without consideration; that the delivery of bonds was not a condition precedent to liability because (a) not contemplated or intended by the parties; (b) even if necessary, performance was prevented by defendant; (c) any duty to render performance was discharged by defendant's repudiation of liability.

Defendant's contention is: First, "that the Salt Company had not carried out its agreement, and that the consideration of the notes had failed by reason of the failure of the Salt Company to issue or tender any bonds"; second, that the "respondent had done nothing to hinder or prevent the Salt Company from carrying out its agreement, which was to issue and tender the bonds."

Recurring to the September transaction, defendant testified that he never received any consideration for the $34,000 note. On his cross-examination for the purpose of showing otherwise, he was interrogated as to the 3,400 shares of the Salt Company's stock that was issued to him. He was asked what he paid for it, and answered:

> "I never paid anything for it; it was not my stock.
> "Mr. Jarman: It was not what? A. It was not my stock. Q. It was not your stock? A. No, sir. Q. Where is that stock now? A. To the best of my belief, it is in the Pacific Coast Salt Company's safe. * * * Q. Did you ever have that stock certificate in your possession? A. Yes, sir. Q. Well, now, what did you do with it? A. To the best of my knowledge, I put it in the safe of the company's office. * * * Q. When was the last time that you saw that stock in the safe of the Pacific Coast Salt Company? A. The day I put it there. Q. That is the last time that you ever saw it? A. Yes, sir. Q. You have had it since? A. No, sir; not to my knowledge. * * * Q. Did you transfer that stock at that time to anybody? A. No, sir. Q. Did you indorse it and deliver the certificate to anybody at that time? A. No, sir. Q. Did you ever return that stock to Mr. Wilcox or to the Pacific Coast Salt Company? A. I left it in their safe all the time."

On redirect examination, he testified:

> "Q. What was said in relation to the issuing of this 3,400 shares of stock of the Pacific Coast Salt Company to you? A. Why, Mr. Wilcox and I held a little conversation about that, and he said that when these bonds were sold, so much stock was to be given to each person that bought a bond, as a bonus, and that this block of stock was to be distributed to the different buyers of bonds, as a bonus."

Objection being made to his answering whether this stock was given him as consideration for the note, he was permitted to state "anything else that was said." He testified:

> "Well, he (Wilcox) simply stated that it was understood and talked over that this stock was to be offered to anybody that would buy a bond, as a bonus to go with the bonds, and because they never used the stock of the company, and was to be issued to the—this was a bonus that was to be given to everybody, was to be taken from this 3,400 shares of stock that I had; it just covered the bonds, just enough stock as a bonus for the bonds."

Mr. Wilcox testified:

> "I told him that the stock was his, and he could have it for the consideration of entering into this underwriting agreement, and that this was his profit in it. Nothing was paid to or received by the Pacific Coast Salt Company for the issuance of this stock."

Upon this issue of fact the testimony was sharply in conflict. The jury had the right to accept defendant's statement as true, and we see no reason why under the settled rule we should not also accept it.

There was evidence that the instruments of assent to the bond issue of holders of 11,537½ shares were executed, but it was not shown, nor was it claimed, that this was two-thirds of the subscribed or capital stock of the Salt Company. And as already stated, no bonds were ever issued or tendered to defendant so far as appears in the record.

[1] It seems to us that when these various agreements and the evidence otherwise introduced are fairly considered, the jury were justified in concluding therefrom that tender or delivery of the bonds called for by defendant's agreements, if not a condition precedent, was a condition concurrent to his liability on these notes, and unless, as contended by plaintiff, performance was prevented by defendant, there was a failure of consideration, and his liability was at an end. Concededly the bonds were never issued, and, of course, could not be and were not tendered or delivered. Section 1439 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Before any party to an obligation can require another party to perform any act under it, he must fulfill all conditions precedent thereto imposed upon himself; and must be able * * * to fulfill all conditions concurrent so imposed upon him or the like fulfillment by the other party, except as provided by the next section."

This latter section (1440) provides:

> "If a party to an obligation gives notice to another, before the latter is in default, that he will not perform the same upon his part, and does not retract such notice before the time at which performance upon his part is due, such other party is entitled to enforce the obligation without previously performing or offering to perform any conditions upon his part in favor of the former party."

The bond issue depended for its legality upon the consent of two-thirds of the stockholders, and while it is admitted that such consent was not obtained, appellant urges: First, that defendant prevented the securing of this consent; and, second, that plaintiff was discharged from any duty to tender bonds by defendant's repudiation of his liability.

The $5,000 note was given as part of the transaction under which the first agreement of June 16, 1913, and the "subscription agreement" were executed. At that time no bonds had been authorized by the Salt Company, and the subscription by subscribers was "subject to the subscription of fifty thousand dollars of these bonds to be called by the Savings Union & Trust Company." The addendum to the Wilcox-Harrell agreement had reference to this proposed issue and this "call" by the Savings Union Bank. We have seen that defendant withdrew the securities contemplated by the addendum, and that feature of the transaction was ended. This note bore the following indorsement:

> "This note is subject to a subscription of $50,000.00, 7% debenture bonds, when same will be due and payable. Subject to agreement entered into this 16th day of June, 1913."

It bore no date, and while it was made payable on its face one day after date, it was in fact payable only subject to the agreement referred to, and was given and was payable upon the condition that $50,000 of the company's bonds were subscribed. Only $16,000 were subscribed, and under the indorsement on this note, it never became payable, and there was a failure of consideration.

In September defendant entered into certain other agreements which referred to this $5,000 note, although it remained subject to the agreement of June 16, 1913. The first of these agreements of September 19, 1913, the so-called "underwriting agreement," was between defendant and the Salt Company. By this agreement, the proposed bond issue was increased to $100,000, or 100 bonds of $1,000 each, of which it was proposed to sell 50 bonds of $1,000 each, and it was therein recited that "there had been subscribed 16 bonds" for which the company has the notes of subscribers, in the aggregate the sum of $16,000, including defendant's note for $5,000. It was also recited that defendant was willing "to underwrite the balance of said $50,000 issue, to wit, 34 bonds of $1,000 each," and it was agreed that upon the issuance of said bonds the Salt Company "will deliver to the said A. J. Harrell thirty-four (34) thereof in consideration of a promissory note by said A. J. Harrell in the sum of thirty-four thousand dollars ($34,000); that said promissory note, together with the said notes covering the sixteen thousand dollars ($16,000) already subscribed, shall be deposited with the Savings Union & Trust Company for the purpose of the trust herein to be created by said company." Then follows a provision that defendant "agrees to sell said bonds for the company, receiving in consideration of said sale the accrued interest due thereon at the time of said sale." The company was to pay all expenses of the issuance of the bonds, commissions, etc., and to assist in marketing the bonds. The moneys obtained from the sale were to be deposited by defendant in some bank, and, upon the sale of the full number of bonds "which he hereby assumed to sell," was to be delivered to the Savings Bank and applied "in accordance with the trust agreement hereafter to be made" by said Salt Company, "for the issuance of said bonds."

The second agreement between defendant and Wilcox, called the "control agreement," recited that "the said W. C. Wilcox owns a majority of the shares of the capital stock of the Pacific Coast Salt Company," and referred to the fact that defendant had entered into the last above agreement, and stated that:

> "It is agreed that the said W. C. Wilcox shall vote the stock of said Pacific Coast Salt Company for the purpose of electing directors thereof as directed by the said A. J. Harrell, and there shall be elected besides the said W. C. Wilcox, four other directors selected and chosen by the said A. J. Harrell and the said A. J. Harrell shall have control of the said Pacific Coast Salt Company for and during the full period of time that said bonds of said Pacific Coast Salt Company shall be outstanding obligations against the said A. J. Harrell."

Defendant executed his note for $34,000, which, with the other notes, was deposited with the savings bank. The "underwriting agreement" makes no mention of defendant's getting any stock. He was to sell certain bonds when issued, and to receive accrued interest as his compensation. His $34,000 note, like his $5,000 note, was executed in consideration of his receiving certain bonds when issued. He was not to receive any of the money derived from the sale of bonds except this accrued interest, for it was to be deposited with the savings bank in accordance with a trust to be created by the Salt Company.

Clearly, defendant was not to pay the note unless the bonds were delivered to him, and he certainly was not to pay the note and also pay over the proceeds of the bonds when sold. Had he received the bonds and sold them and deposited the proceeds as provided for, he would no longer have been liable on his note. But in no case was he liable unless the bonds were delivered to him or the Salt Company was able to deliver them.

It seems quite clear to us that this "underwriting agreement" was a contract to sell bonds rather than one to buy bonds, and the most that can be made of it is that it was what is commonly understood by the term "underwriting," namely, that in the event defendant failed to sell the bonds referred to, he, the underwriter, will take such bonds as he does not sell. But defendant's liability for nonperformance was dependent upon the Salt Company's producing and tendering the bonds. Kirkpatrick v. Eastern Milling & Export Co. (C. C.) 135 Fed. 147; s. c., 137 Fed. 387, 69 C. C. A. 579. Defendant's note served no other purpose, and was intended to serve no other purpose, than to stand as security for the bonds that were to be placed with him for sale, and quite probably as an assurance that he would faithfully pay over the money received by him for the bonds, no part of which had he a right to retain as his own. It would seem to follow that defendant never having received any bonds to sell, he is not in default, and all consideration for his note has failed.

The so-called "control agreement" imposed on Wilcox the obligation to vote for directors satisfactory to defendant, and defendant was to have control of Wilcox's stock during the period of time that the bonds of the Salt Company might be outstanding as an obligation against defendant. We have given the evidence as to the 3,400 shares of stock issued to defendant from which it appeared that it was in reality not his, but was to be given to purchasers of bonds as a bonus, and that he left this stock in the company's safe, and has not since seen it, and never made any use of it. It formed no part of the consideration of the $34,000 note. It was not until October 14, 1913, that the bond issue was authorized by the directors, which was then fixed at $100,000.

Defendant, as we have seen, signed, as secretary, a notification to stockholders of the passage of this resolution and calling for their consent. He remained at the company's office until November 5, 1913, performing his duties as secretary, and made an unsuccessful trip to Stockton to obtain subscriptions for bonds. We can discover no consideration for defendant's notes, aside from such consideration as is implied by their execution, except the promise to deliver to defendant the bonds of the Salt Company, and as no bonds were ever issued and no authority for their issue shown, there was a failure of consideration. This was the situation in November, when defendant returned to his home in Visalia, and it was the situation when the action was commenced in February, 1914, and still is so far as shown.

The question remains: Was defendant responsible for this situation, and, if not, still had he so acted towards the Salt Company as to relieve it from performance on its part?

[2] The bond issue failed because the consent of two-thirds of the shareholders of the Salt Company was not obtained thereto. Responsibility for this nonconsent of stockholders was not brought home to defendant. He had no agreement to secure this consent. It does not appear that the agreement of June 16, 1913, by which Wilcox was to give defendant his proxy for Wilcox's common stock was carried out. The so-called "control agreement" of September 19, 1913, was carried out so far as the election of directors was concerned, but the control otherwise was to be during the period that the "bonds shall be an outstanding obligation against" defendant, and that period never arrived. He did not have possession of Wilcox's stock, or such control over it as prevented Wilcox from consenting to the bond issue. There was no evidence that he did anything to prevent the shareholders from giving their consent, nor was there any evidence that he influenced, or attempted to influence, any director to refrain from attending meetings. He did not believe that he was the owner of 3,400 shares, or had any right to deal with them as owner. Appended to the transcript are the affidavits of such stockholders as gave their consent, 11,537½ shares, and among these is the unverified written statement of Wilcox, showing his consent, and that he owned 5,211½ of these shares and voted them. If he owned other shares, it was not shown (except by recital in the "control agreement"), and it thus appears, notwithstanding the "control agreement," that Harrell did not, in fact, control Wilcox's shares to the point of having a right to vote them, nor did defendant do anything to prevent Wilcox, as a stockholder, from giving his consent to the bond issue. The suggestion of appellant that defendant should have given his consent as the owner of 3,400 shares is answered by his testimony that he did not own them. It was not shown that had he sent in his consent it would have made up the required two-thirds of all the shares. Wilcox testified that the Salt Company received nothing for this stock, either in money, labor, or property, and it may be doubted whether its issue was valid (Civ. Code, § 359), inasmuch as the only consideration for which it was issued was as a bonus for bonds which were never authorized or issued.

[3] Defendant testified that he made up his mind, after returning to Visalia and consulting his attorney, to have nothing more to do with the Salt Company, and that he would not go ahead with his agreement of September 19, 1913. Just what he meant by this admission is not clear. There were several agreements of that date, the "underwriting agreement," the "control agreement," his note for $34,000. The examination of the witness did not bring out what he referred to by "the agreement of September 19, 1913." Whatever his state of mind was he did not communicate it to the Salt Company. What he did was to remain passive. He had taken part in the proceedings up to and including the authorization of the bond issue by the directors, and what remained to be done was to obtain the consent of two-thirds of the stockholders over which he had no control. The making up his mind to go no further with the Salt Company did not in any way prevent the stockholders from acting, and had two-thirds of them consented, and had the bonds been issued, at that time or later, defendant's mental attitude would not have relieved him from liability. We do not think his having resolved to have nothing more to do with the Salt Company amounted to such repudiation of his obligation as to release the company from performance on its part. When he met Mr. Wilcox at the Olympic Club and handed his resignation as director and secretary to Wilcox, the reason he gave, whether the correct one or not, was not accompanied by any statement that he repudiated his obligation to the Salt Company. He said nothing and did nothing which would relieve the Salt Company from issuing the bonds. And when Wilcox saw defendant December 2, 1913, at Visalia, Wilcox's object in going there apparently was to raise $10,000 for the purchase of land. Defendant was not asked to pay his bond subscription, and nothing was said about his carrying out his agreements, nor was defendant informed that the company was ready or able to deliver the bonds, and his note was not yet due. Before the Salt Company could avoid performance, defendant's refusal to perform should appear to have been explicit, positive, and unequivocal. The rule stated by Mr. Benjamin is as follows:

> "A mere assertion that the party will be unable, or will refuse to perform his contract is not sufficient; it must be a distinct and unequivocal, absolute refusal to perform the promise, and must be treated and acted upon as such by the party to whom the promise was made." Benjamin on Sales, § 568.

In 6 Ruling Case Law, p. 1025, the rule is thus stated:

> "In order to justify the adverse party in treating the renunciation as a breach, the refusal to perform must be of the whole contract, or of a covenant going to the whole consideration, and must be distinct, unequivocal, and absolute. * * * It may be observed, however, that the renunciation itself does not, ipso facto, constitute a breach. It is not a breach of the contract unless it is treated as such by the adverse party." Hanson v. Slaven, 98 Cal. 377, 382, 33 Pac. 266; Bell v. Bank of California, 153 Cal. 234, 242, 94 Pac. 889.

In Smoot's Case, 15 Wall. 36, 21 L. Ed. 107, it was held that mere assertion that the party will be unable, or will refuse to perform his contract, is not sufficient to terminate it; it must be distinct and unequivocal absolute refusal to perform, treated and acted on as such by the promisee. Approved in Dingley v. Oler, 117 U. S. 503, 6 Sup. Ct. 850, 29 L. Ed. 984.

Cases cited by appellant where the defaulting party "has made it impossible for the contract to be performed," or where the defendant "by his own act prevented the performance by the complaining party," are not in point, for the reason that we do not think the facts bring the case within the rule governing in such cases.

[4] Certain minutes of the Salt Company corporation were offered in evidence, and upon objection by defendant, refused admission. These minutes pertained to the issuance of the bonds of the corporation. Later the resolution that was adopted October 14, 1913, authorizing the bonds, was introduced, and furnished the evidence which was intended by the minutes. There was therefore no prejudice in the ruling.

[5, 6] In several pages of appellant's brief is printed the cross-examination of defendant relative to payment of the $5,000 note and the understanding of the parties as to the meaning of the contract of June 16, 1913. Some of the questions were answered, while objections to others were sustained. The agreement, aside from the addendum, seems to be clear and not open to parol explanation. As to the added paragraph, its purpose is not plain. Apparently, it was not intended that what are referred to as defendant's "standard bonds" were offered as security for defendant's note, but were to secure the payment of the company's debenture bonds contemplated. The evidence was that the savings bank would not accept them and they were taken back by defendant and did not figure in any subsequent proceedings. We cannot see that appellant was prejudiced by the rulings of the court. Some questions on cross-examination of defendant as to what he did with the 3,400 shares of the company's stock issued to him were objected to and sustained. One was whether defendant had ever offered to return the shares to the company, and the other was whether he had ever written a letter to the company, advising it that the stock was in its safe. Defendant had testified, as we have shown, what he did with the stock, and that it was intended to be used as a bonus to purchasers of bonds, and was not his stock. Full latitude should have been given to test the probability or improbability of defendant's account of this stock. Several questions were asked and answered along this line. The questions objected to should have been allowed, but we do not think the ruling was prejudicial. The court gave the following instruction:

> "You are instructed that when a corporation proceeds to issue bonds by resolution of its board of directors, the resolution authorizing the bond issue must first be adopted by a unanimous vote of the board of directors at a regular meeting, or at a special meeting called for such purpose. Any resolution so adopted for the issuance of bonds must be afterwards approved by the written assent of stockholders of the corporation holding at least two-thirds of the subscribed or issued capital stock of the corporation, and such written assent must be filed with the secretary of the corporation.
> "If you find from the evidence in this case that the resolution, authorizing the issuance of debenture bonds and adopted by the board of directors of Pacific Coast Salt Company on October 14, 1913, was not thereafter, and prior to the commencement of this action, approved by the written assent of stockholders of said company holding at least two-thirds of the capital stock of the corporation, and that such written assents were not filed with the secretary of the company prior to the commencement of this action, then plaintiff cannot recover in this action, and your verdict must be for defendant."

Appellant objects to the second subdivision of this instruction as being "regardless of any act by defendant, whether preventing performance or repudiating his contracts, etc., it was necessary for the Salt Company to perform on its part, even though informed by defendant that he would not perform on his part," and that the instruction "is in direct conflict with section 1440 of the Civil Code." It is urged that the vice of this instruction becomes apparent when considered in connection with certain other instructions requested by plaintiff and given by the court with a proviso. There are five of these instructions. The first instruction was addressed to a case where, there being evidence that one party to a contract has, by some act, deliberately made it impossible for the contract to be performed, such act in law amounts to a prevention of performance, and if the evidence offered showed that defendant entirely repudiated his agreements, "there has been no failure of consideration," etc. The second instruction was that, where one of the parties to a contract declares that he will not perform his part, he thereby releases the other party from the contract; if, therefore, defendant declared he would not pay the notes sued on, there has been no failure of consideration, and plaintiff should recover. The third instruction was addressed to the proposition that if defendant prevented by act or conduct or by renunciation of liability under the contracts sued upon, during the period that the company had a right to deliver or tender the bonds, it was not necessary for the company to tender or deliver the bonds. The fourth was that if a party declares himself not bound by the contract, he cannot set up failure in either demand or tender on the part of the other party as a defense to an action brought by such other party on the contract, and that offer to perform is waived or unnecessary "when it is reasonably certain that the offer will be refused, or that performance will not be accepted." The fifth instruction was that the slightest consideration is sufficient to support the most onerous obligation, and that inadequacy of consideration is for the parties to consider, and not for the court or jury when the contract is sought to be enforced; that "we are not concerned with the motive that induced Harrell to enter into the agreements introduced in this case" if supported by a sufficient consideration as heretofore defined. To each of these instructions the court added the following:

> "Unless you find from the evidence that the resolution adopted by the board of directors of said company, authorizing the issuance of said debenture bonds, was not prior to the commencement of this action approved by the written assent of the stockholders of said company holding at least two-thirds of the subscribed or issued capital stock of the said company, and that such written assents were not filed with the secretary of said company prior to the commencement of this action, in which event your verdict must be for the defendant."

After giving the foregoing instructions as modified, the court gave the following instruction:

> "You are further instructed that the want of performance of an obligation, in whole or in part, or any delay therein, is excused when the debtor is induced not to make it by any act of the creditor intended, or naturally tending to have that effect, done at or before the time at which such performance or offer may be made, and not rescinded before that time."

Appellant does not object to this last instruction, but it contends that:

> "Not only are the foregoing instructions misleading and confusing, but the proviso added by the court makes them clearly erroneous, and necessitates a reversal of the judgment."

[7-9] To determine the importance of appellant's criticism, it becomes necessary to again call attention to the situation developed by the evidence. Beyond doubt, the burden was upon plaintiff to show affirmatively that defendant by his conduct prevented the company from getting out its bond issue. And the rule of law unquestionably is as stated by Mr. Benjamin in his work upon Sales:

> "In order to justify the adverse party in treating the renunciation as a breach, the refusal to perform must be of the whole contract, or of a covenant going to the whole consideration, and must be distinct, unequivocal, and absolute."

Further:

> "The renunciation itself does not ipso facto constitute a breach. It is not a breach of the contract unless it is treated as such by the adverse party." Benjamin on Sales and cases cited, supra.

There was no evidence that defendant omitted a duty resting upon him by contract or as a director in the matter of issuing these bonds. All that the directors could do had been done, and a circular letter had been sent out to stockholders, calling for their consent to the bond issue. Responses to this letter came in and were filed, but concededly not by two-thirds of the shareholders. Defendant had not agreed to obtain these consents, and there was no implied obligation upon him to do so. There was not a particle of evidence that he influenced or tried to influence any stockholder to withhold his consent, nor was there a particle of evidence that he influenced or attempted to influence any director to act in any particular way, and there was no evidence that any action or inaction of the directors had anything to do with the failure of two-thirds of the stockholders to give their consent. There is absolutely no explanation or reason shown why the requisite two-thirds did not consent. Had defendant sent in the consent of the 3,400 shares assessed to him, it would not have made up the requisite number. It is therefore immaterial whether or not we accept defendant's testimony that these shares did not belong to him.

The so-called "contract agreement" did not purport to require a transfer of Wilcox's shares to defendant, and they never were so transferred. Wilcox agreed to vote for directors satisfactory to defendant, and that was done. The further provision was that defendant should have control of Wilcox's shares during the period that the bonds might be an outstanding obligation against defendant—a period which did not arrive. As shown above, Wilcox must have retained his shares in his own control, for he sent in his assent to the bond issue as a shareholder. There was nothing in any agreement entered into by defendant requiring him to direct or authorize Wilcox, as a shareholder, to consent to the bond issue; nor was there any agreement that defendant should vote Wilcox's shares. Defendant exercised no control over the affairs of the company, and the evidence was that Wilcox was the president and general manager and conducted the business of the company.

[10] Conceding that the instruction as given did not leave the jury free to consider the effect of defendant's alleged conduct as having prevented the company from issuing the bonds, there was no substantial evidence upon which the jury could have found for appellant on this issue.

We have stated and restated what defendant's obligations were. Briefly and in substance he in June, 1913, subscribed for bonds to the amount of $5,000, and gave his note without date for that amount upon the express condition written on the back of it:

> "This note is subject to a subscription of $50-000.00 seven per cent. debenture bonds, when same [the note] will become due and payable."

No bonds had yet been authorized by the directors of the Salt Company. At this time defendant had no connection with the company, and he made no agreement to do more than to take these bonds when issued to the extent of $5,000. In the following September he became a director and secretary of the Salt Company. The agreement he then made in connection with his $34,000 note was to undertake the sale of bonds when issued of equivalent value and pay the proceeds to the savings bank for the Salt Company. By this so-called "underwriting agreement" the most defendant engaged to do was to take these bonds himself if he did not sell them. But he entered into no obligation to insure the issuance of the bonds or to pay his note whether or not bonds were issued.

Without repeating what has already been so fully stated, it may safely be said that the only outstanding and unperformed obligations of defendant are the two promissory notes in suit, the consideration for which has wholly failed, since no bonds have ever been legalized or issued. We are unable to discover any obligation resting upon defendant which he has not performed in respect of this bond issue.

We do not think the jury would have been sustained by the evidence had they found that defendant by his conduct prevented or excused the company from issuing the bonds. He made no such renunciation as the courts have held to be necessary to constitute such a breach of his contract as would release the Salt Company from performance on its part —a release which in the present case would mean that defendant should pay $39,000 to the company and receive nothing in return, a release also which would relieve the company from issuing any bonds, thus obtaining a large sum of money for nothing. The rule of law is that:

> "To justify the adverse party in treating the renunciation as a breach, the refusal to perform must be of the whole contract or of a covenant going to the whole contract, and must be distinct, unequivocal and absolute, and it must be treated as such by the adverse party."

There was no evidence from which the jury were authorized to infer that any such renunciation was declared by defendant. Part of the contract which it is now claimed defendant breached required that the consent of two-thirds of the stockholders to the bond issue should be procured, and to do this was no part of defendant's obligation. Defendant did not contract to sell or underwrite something which had no existence, and which became impossible of existence through no act of his. The obligation of the company had become impossible of performance. Under such a state of circumstances, the company had no right to enforce payment of those notes. The evidence did not warrant a finding by the jury that defendant had relieved the company from performance on its part, and therefore plaintiff was not prejudiced by the instructions.

The first instruction noticed was a correct statement of the law, and in restating its substance in the provisos to the other instructions noticed, there was no prejudice, for the reason that there was not evidence sufficient to have warranted the jury in finding that the defendant prevented the issue of bonds, or that he so far repudiated his obligations as to relieve the Salt Company from issuing any bonds or tendering or delivering any bonds to defendant. Objection is urged to the following instruction:

> "While it is true that the execution of the notes imports a consideration, the presumption that a consideration passed for the execution of the instruments is merely prima facie. It is disputable, and may be overcome by direct proof. But disputable inferences or presumptions, while evidence, are evidence the weakest and the least satisfactory. They are allowed to stand, not against the facts that they represent, but in lieu of proof of them. The facts being proven contrary to the presumption, no conflict arises; the presumption is simply overcome and dispelled; and, if you find from the evidence that no consideration was ever given for said notes, or either of them, or that the consideration for said notes, or either of them, has failed, then as to such note, or notes, for which defendant received no consideration, or for which the consideration has failed, your verdict should be in favor of defendant."

[11] This instruction, in its substance, was taken from Ruth v. Krone, 10 Cal. App. 770, 773, 103 Pac. 960. It was not there said that disputable presumptions are evidence the weakest and the least satisfactory. As a proposition of universal application this is not true. It was pointed out in Hitchcock v. Rooney, 171 Cal. 285, 289, 152 Pac. 913, that disputable presumptions "have such force as may in some cases outweigh positive evidence against them * * * and sometimes such presumptions as we are here considering require clear and convincing evidence to overcome them" (citing cases).

[12] The disputable presumption here was that arising from the promissory notes admittedly signed by defendant. Facts were submitted by defendant tending to show want of consideration and failure of consideration, and the instruction placed upon the jury the duty of determining the issue. The statement of the court which we think incorrect as a general proposition could not have been prejudicial, for the fact was admitted out of which the presumption arose, namely, that defendant did, in fact, execute the notes.

[13] We discover no prejudicial error in the instruction given as to where the burden rested of showing want of consideration for the notes. Nor do we think the court erred in instructing the jury that the fact that defendant was paid a salary of $100 for his services as secretary of the company constituted no consideration for the notes. There was no evidence, so far as we can discover, tending to show that this salary in any way induced defendant to make these notes.

The many angles to this case must be our apology for the unusual length of the opinion. We may be mistaken in our treatment of some of the phases of the case, but as to the verdict, we are convinced that it finds support in the evidence. And as to the rulings of the court and its instructions, whatever of error there may be, we cannot say, "after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, * * * that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Article 6, § 4½, Const.

PEOPLE v. LUCK SING. (Cr. 660.)

CRIMINAL LAW 🔑178—FORMER JEOPARDY—AMENDMENT OF INFORMATION.

Where an information charging a misdemeanor in two counts was dismissed and an amended information containing three counts was filed under provision of Pen. Code, § 1387, it will be presumed, in the absence of contrary evidence, that the amended information was based on the same preliminary examination of accused as the first, so that the dismissal was not a bar to the new information.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Luck Sing was convicted of violating the Wyllie Local Option Law, and his motion for new trial was overruled, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. G. Graham, of Fresno, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Defendant was accused by information with the violation of the Wyllie Local Option Law (St. 1911, p. 599) in the county of Fresno. The information contained three counts, charging as many violations of said law. Defendant was convicted upon all three counts, and sentenced to pay a fine of $500, or in lieu thereof to be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of Fresno at the rate of one day imprisonment for every $2 of said fine until the same shall have been satisfied. The present appeal is from said judgment and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The punishment imposed in this case made the offense a misdemeanor; and, under the provisions of section 1387 of the Penal Code a dismissal of an action in such a case is a bar to another prosecution unless the order is expressly made for the purpose of amending the complaint in the action. From the record it appears that, after one information had been filed against the defendant without the defendant having been brought to trial within 60 days, that information upon motion of the district attorney was dismissed for the purpose of filing an amended complaint in the action. Thereafter another information was filed against the defendant setting forth in three counts three distinct violations of the act, whereas the former information had set forth but two. It seems that, if the new information was not based upon the preliminary examination under which the defendant was held to answer and the first information filed, but upon a new proceeding in the justice's court, we would be required to hold, as contended by appellant, such new information would not come within the designation "amended complaint" as used in said section 1387, and that the defendant would by virtue of that section be entitled to a dismissal of the present action. The record, however, fails to show that there was a second preliminary examination, or that the information upon which the defendant was tried and convicted is not just what it purports to be, namely, an amended information. No error, therefore, is shown; and we will presume in harmony with settled law that the court proceeded regularly, and that the trial and conviction were had under an amended complaint. People v. Disperati, 11 Cal. App. 469, 474, 105 Pac. 617.

No error was committed by the trial court in its instructions to the jury, and the evidence amply sustains the judgment.

Judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FAGES. (Cr. 504.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 11, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 8, 1917.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑86—JURISDICTION—MISDEMEANORS—SUPERIOR COURT.

Pen. Code, § 1425, gives justice courts jurisdiction only of misdemeanors punishable by fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both fine and imprisonment. Const. art. 6, § 5, gives the superior court jurisdiction of "all criminal cases amounting to felony, and cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for." Held, all misdemeanors not falling within the class to which jurisdiction is given to justice courts are triable in the superior court, subject to the further exception that municipal courts in some instances are, by statute, vested with jurisdiction to try all misdemeanors, regardless of the extent of punishment which may be visited upon the person convicted.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS 🔑11 — COUNTY ORDINANCES — "CONFLICT WITH GENERAL LAWS."

Const. art. 11, § 11, provides that "any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." Pen. Code, § 19, provides that, except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding six months, or by a fine not exceeding $500, or by both. Held, these provisions do not limit the power of local authorities to make violation of a police ordinance enacted by them, such as one prohibiting the retailing of intoxicating liquors in certain places, a misdemeanor punishable by a greater punishment than stated in said section 19 for cases where no specific punishment is affixed, for the constitutional grant to local authorities of the right to make and enforce police regulations, "not in conflict with general laws," was intended to allow the making and enforcing of local regulations of every kind, except those punishing a particular act which was already included within the category of crimes covered by the general codes or statutes, or those affixing a punishment for acts of lesser degree than similar acts described by the statutes in excess or not in harmony with the punishment designated by the latter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. 🔑11.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Conflict with General Laws.]

3. Criminal Law 🔑1208(1)—Punishment—Doing Business Without a License.

Under Pen. Code, § 435, declaring the acts of any person a misdemeanor who, without a license, carries on a business requiring a license, but expressing no specific punishment, wherever the securing of a license is made a condition by ordinance or statute to the transaction of any business, the punishment for violation thereof is that prescribed by section 19, for a misdemeanor for which no punishment is otherwise prescribed.

4. Counties 🔑55 — Ordinances — Reasonableness of Penalty.

Under Const. art. 11, § 11, giving to counties, etc., power to make and enforce regulations not in conflict with general laws, the punishment prescribed by an ordinance must be both reasonable and in harmony with the state legislative enactments on kindred subjects.

5. Intoxicating Liquors 🔑19 — Ordinances—Reasonable Punishment.

An ordinance of the county of San Bernardino punishing retailing of intoxicating liquors outside of incorporated cities and towns by penalty not exceeding $600 fine or seven months' imprisonment, or both, was not invalid as prescribing an unreasonable punishment.

6. Intoxicating Liquors 🔑11 — County Ordinances—Harmony with State Legislative Enactments.

An ordinance of the county of San Bernardino penalized retailing of intoxicating liquors outside of incorporated cities and towns by a penalty not exceeding a $600 fine or seven months' imprisonment, or both. St. 1911, p. 599, provided for local option and, on adoption, for punishment for violation of the prohibition provisions by a similar maximum fine and imprisonment. Held, the ordinance was not invalid as being inconsistent with a state legislative enactment on a kindred subject.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Jean Fages was convicted of a misdemeanor, and appeals from order denying new trial. Affirmed.

Albert D. Trujillo and Robert M. McHargue, both of San Bernardino, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., and T. W. Duckworth, Dist. Atty., and John L. Campbell, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Bernardino, for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of a misdemeanor under an ordinance of the county of San Bernardino which made it unlawful for any person to sell, give, or furnish intoxicating liquor to another in said county outside of incorporated cities and towns. By this ordinance the retailing of intoxicating liquor, except for certain special uses, was entirely prohibited. The penalty fixed for a violation of the ordinance was that the person convicted should be punished by a fine of not exceeding $600, or by imprisonment in the county jail of San Bernardino county for not more than seven months, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Defendant presented a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is prosecuted from the order made in that behalf.

[1] As by section 1425 of the Penal Code justice's courts are given jurisdiction only of misdemeanors punishable by fine not exceeding $500 or by an imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both fine and imprisonment, the ordinance, by fixing a maximum term of imprisonment at seven months, described a misdemeanor of which the justice's courts would not have jurisdiction, but which would fall within the jurisdiction of the superior court, where in fact the case was tried; the district attorney having proceeded by information after the defendant had been held to answer. The main contention made by appellant is that the board of supervisors of the county of San Bernardino exceeded the legislative power vested in it when it attempted to define a crime commonly classed as "high-grade misdemeanor." There is no contention but that, if such power did reside in the board of supervisors, then the superior court was the court of original trial jurisdiction. By the state Constitution (section 5, art. 6) the superior court is given jurisdiction of "all criminal cases amounting to felony, and cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for. * * *" See this subject discussed in Ex parte Wallingford, 60 Cal. 103, and People v. Palermo Land & Water Co., 4 Cal. App. 717, 89 Pac. 723, 725.

The Legislature having given to justice's courts jurisdiction only in misdemeanor cases where the punishment may not exceed six months' imprisonment and $500 fine, all misdemeanors not falling within the class so limited are triable in the superior court, subject to the further exception that municipal courts in some instances are by statute vested with jurisdiction to try all misdemeanors, regardless of the extent of punishment which may be visited upon the person convicted. The question as to the extent of the legislative authority of a county to be exerted in the direction of creating crimes and fixing punishments may now be examined. While it is true that the general lawmaking power of the state is vested by the Constitution in the Legislature, it is also true that by section 11, article 11, there has been delegated to county and other inferior governmental agencies the right to exercise the police power in their respective localities; that provision reading as follows:

> "Any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

It has been held that the legislative authority so delegated to local and municipal bodies within the limits specified is as broad as the power possessed by the Legislature itself.

> "By virtue of this clause the constitutional grant of the police powers of the state to the city goes directly to and vests in the board, which thereby becomes possessed of the right to exercise within the city limits the entire police power of the state, subject only to the control of general laws. * * * The power conferred by the Constitution in this respect, subject to the two exceptions, that it is local to the city and that it is subject to general laws, is as broad as that of the Legislature itself." Odd Fellows' Cemetery Ass'n v. City and County of San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 73 Pac. 987; In re Montgomery, 163 Cal. 457, 125 Pac. 1070, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 130; Pacific Gas, etc., Co. v. Police Court, 28 Cal. App. 412, 152 Pac. 928.

Is the regulation consistent with the power granted, in that it treats of matters local in their nature and not in conflict with any general laws of the state? That it is a regulation local in its character is not disputed; but appellant's counsel argue that it conflicts with the general law of the state, because the Legislature has by general statute fixed the maximum punishment which may be enforced in misdemeanor cases.

[2] We are referred to section 19 of the Penal Code, which declares that:

> "Except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by this Code, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding six months, or by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or both."

Appellant would have us read this section as the law not only applicable to the numerous instances to be found in the Penal Code where offenses are declared merely to be misdemeanors without any specific punishment being affixed, but as comprehending all such offenses, whether to be found in the general statutes of the Legislature or ordinances of a municipal body. It is not contended, and the proposition certainly could not be maintained, that the Legislature may not in any general statute not made a part of the Penal Code proper determine the punishment to be affixed to the commission of any prohibited act. However, it is insisted that the provisions of the section furnish a limitation as to the punishment which may be determined upon by a municipal body; in other words, that any punishment which may be fixed by local authorities as the penalty for the commission of forbidden acts within the police power must in no case exceed a fine of $500, or six months' imprisonment in a county jail, or both such fine and imprisonment. We are not so inclined to construe section 19 of the Penal Code. There are numerous instances to be found among the sections of the Code (and in the general statutes of the state) where offenses are described as "misdemeanors" and no other penal clause is added thereto. Necessarily there must exist some general provision to which courts must look in prosecutions for such misdemeanors. Meeting such a case, the judge has to refer to section 19 and finds that in all cases, where a different punishment is not "prescribed by this Code," misdemeanors defined therein are to be punished by a maximum of either or both a fine of $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months. When the Constitution grants to local authorities the right to make and enforce police regulations "not in conflict with general laws," it is intended that local regulations of every kind may be made and enforced, except where the particular act described by the ordinance is the same act already included within the category of crimes as covered by the general Codes or statutes, or the punishment affixed by ordinance for acts of a lesser degree than similar acts described by the statute is in excess of or not in harmony with the punishment designated by the latter. All of the cases that we have examined go this far and no farther. Ex parte Sic, 73 Cal. 142, 14 Pac. 405; In re Desanta, 8 Cal. App. 295, 96 Pac. 1027; Ex parte Solomon, 91 Cal. 440, 27 Pac. 757; In re Ah You, 88 Cal. 99, 25 Pac. 974, 11 L. R. A. 408, 22 Am. St. Rep. 280; Ex parte Mansfield, 106 Cal. 400, 39 Pac. 775; Ex parte Bagshaw, 152 Cal. 701, 93 Pac. 864.

[3] This prosecution does not fall within what may be termed the "license" cases: Wherever the securing of a license is made a condition by ordinance or statute to the transacting of any business, then section 435 of the Penal Code directly applies, which declares the acts of any person a misdemeanor who, without a license, carries on any business or calling for the transaction of which a license is required. No specific punishment being expressed, necessarily reference must be made to section 19, hereinbefore referred to, in order to determine the measure of punishment which may be meted out. Where municipal legislative bodies in their enactments requiring persons to procure licenses to conduct a business fix a punishment different from that which section 19 prescribes, declarations in the ordinances as to that punishment have been held to be void and of no effect. Such was the case of Arfsten v. Superior Court, 20 Cal. App. 269, 128 Pac. 949 (cited by appellant here), and the case of Ex parte Stephen, 114 Cal. 278, 46 Pac. 86. The punishment prescribed under an ordinance must be both reasonable and in harmony with the state legislative enactments on kindred subjects. This was the effect of the decisions in Ex parte Ah You and Ex parte Solomon, supra.

[4-6] It cannot be said that the possible maximum of seven months' imprisonment under the ordinance here considered is an unreasonable penalty to be affixed for the commission of the acts prohibited. The ordinance is not inconsistent with kindred enactments of the state. We find in the general statutes of the Legislature (Stats. 1911, p. 599) an act providing for local option in the matter of the selling or distributing of intoxicating liquors. That act furnishes authority for the enforcement of prohibition within territory in which the electors thereof so declare; and, when such locality shall have become "no license territory," any person who vends or distributes intoxicating liquor, except for certain limited uses, may be punished upon conviction by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding seven months, or by fine not exceeding $600, or by both such imprisonment and fine. It will be observed that both the maximum fine and imprisonment there provided to be imposed and inflicted are precisely the same as those specified in the ordinance we are now considering.

We can find no error which entitles appellant to a new trial.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

Habeas corpus by E. R. Waite. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Allison & Dickson, of San Bernardino, for petitioner. T. W. Duckworth, Dist. Atty., and John L. Campbell, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The ground upon which petitioner seeks to be discharged from custody is that the ordinance of the board of supervisors of the county of San Bernardino, under which he was convicted, is void because the maximum punishment therein provided is in excess of the power of the local legislative body to prescribe. The argument to that point has been given full consideration in the opinion filed this day in the case of People v. Jean Fages (Crim. No. 504), 162 Pac. 137, where the decision is advrese to the appellant's contention. In deciding this application it will be sufficient to refer to that case for the views of the court on the question presented.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of San Bernardino county.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Willis I. Morrison, Judge.

Action by George H. Cram against H. H. McNeil. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George H. Woodruff and Clyde C. Shoemaker, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Bert Campbell and Willoughby Rodman, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment entered in favor of defendant.

As foundation for his suit plaintiff alleged the making of an oral contract under which defendant agreed to pay to plaintiff and one Norris a sum of money. The trial judge found all of the facts in favor of plaintiff, but as a conclusion of law determined that the contract was void because it was in violation of subdivision 6 of section 1624 of the Civil Code, that being one of the subdivisions of the statute of frauds. In the section referred to it is provided that certain contracts are invalid unless some note or memorandum thereof is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged or his agent, including:

> "6. An agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or a commission."

We quote from the findings of fact:

> "That on the 28th day of November, 1913, the plaintiff and one Harry C. Norris had knowledge of the fact that a certain person in Los Angeles, Cal., was desirous of buying a small improved ranch, with dwelling house thereon, and had been informed that such person was able and willing to pay cash for any property that he might determine to buy; that plaintiff and the said Norris also had information at said time that such person would not negotiate the purchase of any property through any real estate agent or agency.
> "That on the said 28th day of November, the defendant was the owner of a ranch located one and one-fourth miles from the Santa Ana car line and due north of Garden Grove station on the Anaheim-Long Beach oiled road in Orange county, state of California, * * * and that the plaintiff and said Norris knew at said time that the defendant was offering said ranch for sale through and by reason of a circular published by the defendant. * * *
> "That on the said 28th day of November, the plaintiff and said Norris told the defendant that they knew of a person desiring to purchase for cash a small improved ranch, and they also informed defendant at said time, that they believed that defendant's said ranch would suit such person, but that it would be useless for the plaintiff and said Norris, or either of them, to show or undertake to negotiate a sale of the defendant's said property to the person to whom they referred, for the reason that said person would not deal with or purchase property through any real estate agent or agency; that thereupon, and on the said 28th day of November, at the city of Los Angeles, in said Los Angeles county, the defendant orally promised and agreed to and with the plaintiff and the said Norris that, in consideration of the plaintiff and the said Norris putting the defendant in possession of information as to the identity and residence of such person, he, the defendant, would personally endeavor to sell his said 20-acre ranch to such person, and in case he should make a sale thereof to such person, then he, the defendant, would pay the plaintiff and the said Norris for such information a commission equal to 5 per cent. of any price at which he, the defendant, might sell his said ranch to such person, and the plaintiff and said Norris, in consideration of the said promise of the defendant, orally promised and agreed to put the defendant in possession of the said information; and the court finds that said agreement between the plaintiff and said Norris and the defendant was oral, and not in writing.
> "That thereafter, and pursuant to the said oral agreement, the plaintiff and said Norris, at the said city of Los Angeles, gave to the defendant the name and residence of one Frank Meier, being the person whom the plaintiff and said Norris knew was desirous of buying for cash a small improved ranch, as hereinbefore set forth, and that thereafter the defendant dealt and negotiated with the said Frank Meier, and thereafter, and before the commencement of this action, the defendant sold his said ranch to the said Meier, at the price of $16,000."

The findings further recite that no writing had been made evidencing the contract, and that payment of the amount of plaintiff's claim had been demanded and refused. A further finding appeared as to the assignment of the interest of Norris to this plaintiff.

[1] It is the contention of the appellant that the contract as made was not a contract employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate; that the contract as made involved no services to be rendered by any such agent or broker, and provided merely for the sale of certain information to the defendant by which a buyer for the defendant's property was secured through the efforts of the defendant. The case of Kincart v. Shambrook, 64 Or. 27, 128 Pac. 1003, is cited in support of the contention made by appellant. In the case cited it appeared that plaintiffs there, owning certain property and desiring to sell it and having then under way, with the prospect of successful conclusion, negotiations with a prospective customer, were induced by the offer of that defendant, who proposed to pay them $850, to relinquish their efforts and the attempt to make a deal with their customer in order that the defendant might have an opportunity to sell his land to the proposed customer. It will appear from this statement that that case on its facts is quite readily distinguished from this one. There the plaintiffs gave up a valuable prospect, that of disposing of their own property, in order that the defendant might profit thereby. In no particular did the plaintiffs there find a purchaser for the defendant. The contract as proposed to them by the defendant was not that they should furnish him with the name of the person with whom they were dealing (for the defendant knew that already), but that they should relinquish their efforts in the direction of attempting to dispose of their own property. The facts in this case, as they appear from the findings of the court, are that the plaintiff and his assignor sought the defendant and agreed to furnish him with the name of a person who would likely purchase his property, in consideration that he would pay them a commission. We are unable to distinguish these facts from a case where the defendant sought the plaintiffs in the first instance and requested them to find a purchaser for his property, and they had made efforts so to do and had finally furnished defendant with the name of a person whom they considered a likely customer.

[2] An agent or broker earns his right to a commission when he has either produced to his principal a person ready and willing to enter into a contract upon the terms proposed by the principal, or has produced to his principal a binding contract or offer to contract which the principal accepts. To be sure, it is the duty of an agent to exert himself to bring the parties together, but if the client is satisfied, as was the case here, to have the means furnished him by which he may himself make his deal with the opposite party, then the person acting as the intermediary is as fully an agent or broker, within the meaning of subdivision 6 of section 1624, Civil Code, as though he had actually produced the proposed purchaser before his principal. The services as found by the court to have been performed by the plaintiff were services naturally and necessarily incident to the performance of a contract of an agent or broker employed to sell real estate. We think that the determination of the case as made by the trial court was in accordance with the requirement of the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Robert M. Clarke, Judge.

Action for divorce by Joseph Rose Silva, Jr., against Amelia Rose Silva. Interlocutory decree for the plaintiff, and defendant's motion for new trial overruled, and defendant appeals. Order overruling motion for new trial reversed.

D. H. Laubersheimer, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Chas. F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff brought this action to obtain a decree of divorce upon the ground of desertion. Defendant answered, denying the alleged desertion, and as a further defense and by way of recrimination set forth a cause of action against plaintiff based upon his alleged willful neglect and extreme cruelty.

Upon trial of the action the court found the allegations of the complaint true, and that the matters affirmatively pleaded in defendant's answer as a bar to plaintiff's cause of action were untrue. An interlocutory decree for plaintiff followed. The appeal is prosecuted by defendant from an order of court denying her motion for a new trial.

Among other grounds upon which appellant asks for a reversal is the contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding to the effect that on October 15, 1911, defendant willfully and without cause deserted and abandoned plaintiff against his will and without his consent, and ever since said date has lived and still continues to live separate and apart from plaintiff, against his will and without his consent.

[1-3] It may be conceded that the separation of defendant from plaintiff on October 15, 1911, was with the intent to desert him without just cause and against his consent. Such fact, however, does not entitle plaintiff to a decree of divorce, since as provided in section 107, Civil Code, the status existing at the time of the desertion must continue for a period of one whole year. Separation by consent is not sufficient to constitute desertion. Section 99, Civ. Code. During the entire period the status must be without the consent of the deserted spouse. "It continues only so long as there is a want of consent to the separation on the part of the deserted party." McMullin v. McMullin, 140 Cal. 112, 73 Pac. 808. The complaint herein was filed on October 18, 1912, more than one year after the date of the desertion, during the while of which period defendant had separated herself from plaintiff. It appears, however, that on October 23, 1911, eight days after defendant's act of desertion, she and the plaintiff executed a written instrument in due form, whereby they mutually agreed to live separate and apart from each other. It thus appears that during a part of the time, dating from October 15, 1911, and ending October 18, 1912, at which time the complaint was filed, the separation was by mutual consent, as evidenced by this instrument in writing so executed by the parties. Such consent, however, as provided in section 101, Civil Code, is a revocable act, and if one of the parties afterwards in good faith seeks a reconciliation and restoration which the other refuses, such refusal is desertion. There was evidence offered on the part of plaintiff which it is claimed tended to prove that on the date of the execution of the agreement to live separate and apart, plaintiff, in good faith, sought a reconciliation with defendant and asked her to go home with him. Upon this testimony, while conceding the execution of the agreement, respondent insists it was revoked on the same day it was executed. Assuming this to be true, nevertheless, there was a period of time between October 15, 1911, and October 18, 1912, when the separation was by virtue of said agreement and by and with the consent of plaintiff. According to our view, the execution of the instrument was in the nature of a condonation, and the effect of it was precisely the same as though defendant had returned to her home and after a restoration of the marital relation for a time had again left with intent to desert plaintiff. The time of the desertion would date from the last departure, and not from the time when she first left. So in this case, the one year during which the desertion must continue must be deemed to have commenced at the time the plaintiff revoked the agreement under and by virtue of which the parties lived separate and apart, and not from October 15th, when defendant left him. In our opinion the action was prematurely brought, inasmuch as the desertion by defendant had not continued one year prior to the time when the complaint was filed on October 18, 1912.

[4] Respondent insists that the formal written agreement, duly executed by the parties, should be deemed invalid as an agreement of separation, for the reason that defendant did not intend to sign a contract of separation and did not understand its terms when she executed the same; and likewise insists that plaintiff did not understand its purport when he executed it, and therefore since the minds of the parties never met, the document constituted no valid contract between them. No claim is made that the signature of either party to the instrument was obtained by fraud, duress, or undue influence; nor is reformation thereof sought for mutual mistake. So far as appears from the record, they signed it freely and voluntarily, and it is unnecessary to cite authorities in support of the doctrine that under such circumstances the parties to an instrument must be deemed bound by the plain import of the language used.

For the reasons given, the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial is reversed.

WESTERN ASS'N OF SHORT LINE RAILROADS v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO v. SAME.

CARRIERS ⇨10—MOTOR TRUCK OR BUS LINES—JURISDICTION OF RAILROAD COMMISSION—"OTHER TRANSPORTATION COMPANIES."

Const. art. 12, § 22, as amended in 1911, giving the Railroad Commission power to establish rates for the transportation of passengers and freight by railroads "and other transportation companies," and providing that no railroad "or other transportation company" shall charge a greater or less compensation than specified by the tariff established by the commission, vested the Railroad Commission with regulatory powers over common carriers transporting freight by motor trucks or passengers by busses on the public highways of the state between cities and other places.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 12, 14–20; Dec. Dig. ⇨10.

In Bank. Application for writ of mandate by the Western Association of Short Line Railroads and another against the Railroad Commission of the State of California. Writ issued.

William M. Abbott, William M. Cannon, and Clarence M. Oddie, all of San Francisco (Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioners. Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco (Max Thelen, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Petitioner, Western Association of Short Line Railroads, is a corporation, organized to promote the best interests of the short, independent railroads, steam and electric, operating in the state of California and in other states. Fifteen of such California railroads are members of this corporation. It made application to the respondent commission to regulate, within the law, the transportation business of the so-called Wichita Transportation Company, which company admitted that it was engaged as a common carrier in the business of transporting freight in motor trucks on the public highways of the state of California between the city of San Diego, in San Diego county, and the city of El Centro, in Imperial county, as well as to intermediate and other points in this state. The United Railroads of San Francisco, petitioner, made like request of respondent commission for regulatory orders governing the conduct of the Peninsula Company, and showed that petitioner was operating an interurban electric car line, extending from Fifth and Mission streets, in San Francisco, to the city of San Mateo; it was so operating under franchises obtained from the proper authorities; that the Peninsula Company was regularly operating and maintaining a system of automobile busses, carrying from 16 to 20 passengers each, running upon regular schedule from the point of departure of petitioner's cars in San Francisco to their terminus in San Mateo, and making return trips from San Mateo to San Francisco in like manner, and upon a route paralleling as closely as possible the line of the petitioner's electric railway; that in so operating they charged for the service the identical through fare charged by the petitioner, and similar lesser fares for intermediate points; that the Peninsula Company was a common carrier, a public utility, and a transportation company within the meaning of the law, power to regulate which and the duty to regulate which were conferred by law upon the Railroad Commission.

The Railroad Commission declined to entertain jurisdiction of these petitions, upon the ground that the law had not vested in it jurisdiction so to do. Mandate was then sought from this court, and the single question thus presented is that indicated: Does the Constitution, or do the legislative enactments of the state, vest the power of regulation over such transportation companies in the Railroad Commission?

In denying these applications the Railroad Commission filed an elaborate opinion, in which the question of power was discussed under two heads: First, the question of the constitutional grant of power; second, the question of the legislative grant of power. Application for mandate before this court was in the first instance denied, it appearing to the court that the commission had reached and expressed a satisfactory conclusion upon both propositions. Subsequently this alternative writ of mandate was issued for further consideration of the first proposition, namely, whether or not the Constitution has conferred upon the commission regulatory powers over transportation companies such as have herein been described.

It is not and will not be questioned but that, if the Constitution has vested such power, it is not within the legislative power, either by its silence or by direct enactment, to modify, curtail, or abridge this constitutional grant. The language of the Constitution in dealing with these very powers places this beyond peradventure when it declares (section 22, art. 12) that:

> "No provision of this Constitution shall be construed as a limitation upon the authority of the Legislature to confer upon the railroad commission additional powers of the same kind or different from those conferred herein which are not inconsistent with the powers conferred upon the railroad commission in this Constitution."

See Telephone Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 653, 137 Pac. 1119.

We agree with the construction placed by the commission upon the legislative enactments and with its conclusion that the Legislature inadvertently failed or deliberately declined to make a specific grant of power to the railroad commission to regulate the affairs of these classes of transportation companies. We need not here repeat the convincing reasoning of the commission in this behalf, since doubtless its views will find expression in its own official reports, and it is sufficient for the purposes of this determination to express our concurrence in and with them.

We take up, then, the single consideration of the constitutional grant of power. It is found in section 22, art. 12, of the Constitution as it was amended in 1911. The section creates the railroad commission and defines its powers. In so doing it declares:

> "Said commission shall have the power to establish rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight by railroads and other transportation companies, and no railroad or other transportation company shall charge or demand or collect or receive a greater or less or different compensation for such transportation of passengers or freight, or for any service in connection therewith, between the points named in any tariff of rates, established by said commission, than the rates, fares and charges which are specified in such tariff."

It is not questioned but that the Peninsula Company and the Wichita Transportation Company are public transportation companies, are common carriers, and are public utilities within the definition of section 23, art. 12, of the Constitution. As little will it be questioned but that, if the quoted language of section 22 stood alone as a subject of construction, it would be unhesitatingly held, in the present day, as it is held in construing similar language in other states, that it conferred upon the Railroad Commission regulatory powers over all transportation companies, therein including transportation companies of the classes under consideration. Exempli gratia, in Georgia Railway & Power Co. v. Jitney Bus Co., the Georgia statute conferred jurisdiction upon the Railroad Commission over "all common carriers—railroads and express corporations or companies within this state," and its Railroad Commission held this to be a grant of power to regulate automobile busses and trucks carrying passengers and property for hire. Public Utilities Rep. Ann. 1915C, see page 928. Again, the Illinois Public Utilities Commission had, under section 8 of that state's act (Laws 1913, p. 464) been given "general jurisdiction over all public utilities," and a "public utility" was defined to be "every corporation that now or hereafter may own, etc., for public use any plant, equipment or property to be used for or in connection with the transportation of persons." Here, again, the Illinois Public Utilities Commission held this grant to confer upon it jurisdiction over such automobile passenger and freight carriers. Jacksonville Ry. Co. v. O'Donnell, Utilities Rep. Ann. 1915C, p. 853. Therefore we repeat that one would have no hesitancy in declaring that the language of the Constitution in conferring upon the Railroad Commission power of regulatory control over "railroads and other transportation companies" embraced within its grant companies of the nature we are considering. And we interrupt our argument here to say that, while the problem is to be resolved solely under the determination of the existence or nonexistence of the power in the Railroad Commission, no reason appears why such power should not have been conferred upon it, and multitudinous reasons exist why it should have been conferred. These automobile stage companies carry passengers to great distances, over many and devious roads. It is a part of common knowledge that one may travel by this method at least from San Diego to Sacramento, and doubtless further—a distance of over 600 miles. Thousands of passengers are thus carried over mountains and plains. Aside from the mere matter of the regulation of fares, every consideration suggests the desirability, if not the need, of safety regulations touching the care and upkeep of the machines, the skill and prudence of the chauffeurs, etc. And touching the movement of freight, while in many instances these truck companies parallel railroads, in others they enter, unrestricted and uncontrolled, into new territory. Modern transportation has unquestionably reached the point where it is no more an answer to the farmer who thinks that the rates of the auto truck which passes his farm are extortionate, to say that he may haul his own product, than it would be to make him the same answer if he were complaining of a railroad extortion. And, moreover, it is not only a matter of common knowledge, but is presented in these cases, that in many instances these unregulated companies interfere seriously with the revenues of controlled public utilities, a percentage of which revenues goes by way of taxes to the support of the state.

But returning to the fundamental questions: The nonexistence of the power in the Railroad Commission to supervise these corporations is found and declared by the Railroad Commission to rest upon the construction of the phrase "other transportation companies" given to it by this court in Board of Railroad Com'rs v. Market St. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 677, 64 Pac. 1065. It is said, and truly, that section 22, art. 12, of the Constitution, amended as it was in October, 1911, and embodying as it does the precise language contained in the section before amendment, will be held to have been amended and re-enacted in the light of the construction which this court had put upon that language. In 1901, section 22, so far as concerns the quoted language, stood identically as it does to-day. In that year the Railroad Commission made demand upon the Market Street Railway Company of San Francisco to produce its books, records, and papers and submit itself to the regulatory powers of that commission as defined by the act of 1880 (Stats. 1880, p. 45). The Market Street Railway Company resisted this demand. The Railroad Commission brought action in the superior court to enforce it. The railway company prevailed and the commission appealed, contending that it was given authority by virtue of section 22, art. 12, of the Constitution. Before this court the question for determination was stated to be:

> "Do the words 'railroad and other transportation companies' include a street railway company in a municipality engaged in the business of carrying passengers on street railroad cars?"

This was the sole proposition presented to this court for determination. Mr. Justice Temple, in dissenting, held that from the context the meaning of "other transportation companies" was so plain as to deprive a court of the power to construe it. But the view of the majority of this court was that the words called for construction. So construing them this court held, for reasons not calling for repetition, as they are fully set forth in the opinion, that "other transportation companies" did not embrace within its meaning "street railway companies carrying passengers for hire within the municipal limits." But the decision, upon fundamental and familiar principles, decided nothing more than that this particular character of transportation company was not embraced within the purview of the language of the Constitution. Thus it is said that the language of the Constitution "is inconsistent with the idea that the entire people of the state (through the State Railroad Commission) were interested in the rates for carrying passengers within the corporate limits of a town or municipality"; and it is further declared, arguendo:

> "Companies engaged in draying, running freight wagons, delivery wagons, delivering parcels, teaming, or running elevators, are engaged in the business of 'transportation'; but it surely could not be contended that they are subject to the jurisdiction of the 'Railroad Commission.' The people of the state would not have agreed to pay the salaries and expenses of the railroad commissioners, selected from different geographical sections of the state, for the purpose of regulating the charges of the 'United Carriage Company' of San Francisco. Yet it is a transportation company."

This language is convincing in establishing the unquestioned fact that this court had in contemplation and was discussing transportation companies of whatsoever kind, operating exclusively within a municipality; and good reason appears for this, because all such transportation companies were subject to license fees and police regulations imposable upon them by the municipal authorities.

All, therefore that was actually decided in the Market street case was that the Market Street Railway and other street railways of its character were not embraced within the meaning of the phrase "other transportation companies" as employed in the Constitution. The most that was inferentially declared in the obiter above quoted was that other transportation companies operating wholly within the limits of a municipality were not within the contemplation of the Constitution. Further than this the decision did not go, and further than this it should not be carried. It results, therefore, that the adjudication relied on by the Railroad Commission in no wise determines the question presented. That question is at large. It may be thus put: Did the Constitution in the language quoted exclude by necessary or even by fair construction control over transportation companies of the character here presented? Assuredly nothing in the language of the grant excludes them, and no legitimate construction upon the phrase so oft quoted demands their exclusion. It must be, and therefore is held, that the Constitution has granted regulatory powers over such corporations to the Railroad Commission by virtue of section 22, art. 12, of the Constitution, and it follows herefrom that mandate should issue to the Railroad Commission in accordance with the prayers of the petitioners.

It is adjudged accordingly.

Modification of Opinion.

PER CURIAM. We think that the opinion already filed in these cases sufficiently and clearly enough indicates the view of this court as to the extent of the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission as to such transportation companies as those involved in these proceedings. In view of what is said in the opinion, it is manifest that the writ of mandate ordered issued by the judgment is too broad in its terms and requires the exercise of jurisdiction not conferred by section 22 of article 12 of the Constitution. It was not intended to require the assumption by the railroad commission of jurisdiction of any matter not fairly covered by the provisions of that section.

The proceedings before the Railroad Commission involve substantially only matters relating to the rates to be charged by the transportation companies that were defendants therein, and for all practical purposes it is necessary only to grant relief in that particular respect.

It is ordered that the opinion heretofore filed be modified by striking out the words "in accordance with the prayers of the petitioners" at the end of said opinion and inserting in lieu thereof the words "to exercise such powers."

It is ordered that the judgment heretofore given be modified to read as follows:

> "It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue to the Railroad Commission requiring the commission to make its order that the defendants in the proceedings referred to pending before said commission, viz. the 'Wichita Transportation Company,' and the 'Peninsula Rapid Transit Company,' forthwith file with the commission their schedules of rates, fares, charges, and classifications, and further that the commission assume the jurisdiction over these companies which is conferred by section 22, art. 12, of the Constitution."

FRANCIS v. WEST VIRGINIA OIL CO.

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑290(1)—FORCIBLE DETAINER—CONTRACT TO PURCHASE.

The summary action for unlawful detainer against a tenant given by Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, subd. 1, cannot be maintained unless the conventional relation of landlord and tenant exists between the parties so that the latter is estopped to deny the former's title, and one in possession under a contract to purchase does not after default in the payments become a tenant at will subject to removal by unlawful detainer.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑291(12)—FORCIBLE DETAINER—EVIDENCE—CONTRACT TO PURCHASE.

In an action for unlawful detainer, defendant can introduce the contract to purchase under which he claims possession to show that he is not a tenant, though the validity of titles cannot be tried in such proceedings.

3. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑54(2)—OIL LANDS—CONSTRUCTION OF SALE CONTRACT—RIGHT TO POSSESSION.

A contract to sell oil lands, which provided that the purchaser should not remove any pipe or casing in any well drilled on the property, and that, in event of a forfeiture of the right to purchase, the casings and derricks should revert to the vendor, that it should not annul a previous contract between the vendor and the purchaser's assignor, but that the purchaser should hold and acquire the lands under that contract, by implication gives the purchaser the right to possession under the contract, though there is no express provision therefor.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action in forcible entry and detainer by Mary F. Francis against the West Virginia Oil Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Matthew S. Platz and C. E. Arnold, both of Bakersfield, for appellant. Geo. E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from an adverse judgment. By her pleading Mary F. Francis alleged that in the month of September, 1911, defendant had gone into possession of certain land in Kern county with her knowledge and acquiescence as her tenant at will; that on May 2, 1912, she had served notice requiring the West Virginia Oil Company to vacate the premises; but that said corporation had refused to accede to her demand. She alleged her right to the possession of the land and prayed for its restitution. Defendant admitted possession and refusal to surrender the land to plaintiff, but denied the alleged tenancy at will.

[1] At the trial it clearly appeared that the defendant had gone into possession after the execution of certain contracts of sale. The first of these contracts was made by Mrs. Francis and Mr. E. S. Good. The latter assigned all of his rights under this agreement to the West Virginia Oil Company, and in January, 1912, a new writing was executed by plaintiff and that corporation ratifying the assignment and substituting the West Virginia Oil Company as vendee in Mr. Good's place. This agreement called for the payment of stipulated sums at given times, and the plaintiff in her testimony stated that she had received $15,000 on the purchase price and $600 by way of interest. It was also in evidence that the defendant had expended something more than $85,000 in developing oil on the property.

It seems to be the theory of the plaintiff that, when the defendant corporation defaulted in one of the payments on the purchase price, it at once became a tenant at will subject to removal from the land by the summary method of a suit in unlawful detainer. In this she is in error. The true rule with reference to the existence of the relation of landlord and tenant necessary to support an action in unlawful detainer is thus expressed in Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 563:

> "The action of unlawful detainer can be maintained only where the relation of landlord and tenant subsists between the parties to the action, and hence it becomes material to determine whether parties stand in that relation to each other. While it is not necessary to show an express demise or letting of lands to sustain the action, the facts must show impliedly at least that the defendant occupies as tenant of the plaintiff and this must be something more than a mere quasi tenancy. It is some times said that one who is in possession of lands under a contract for a sale is a tenant at will to the owner. This is true in a restricted sense only. He is a tenant at will just as a mortgagor after condition broken is a tenant at will of the mortgagee. He may be deprived of the possession if it can be done peaceably or may be evicted in an action of ejectment. The mortgagor is not a tenant within the meaning of the unlawful detainer act, however. The conventional relation of landlord and tenant means the relation created by convention or agreement between the parties. The cases are numerous in which a summary remedy has been refused because the contract or circumstances under which the owner of premises permitted another to take possession of them contemplated some condition or consideration apart from rent or a tenancy at the mere sufferance or will of the owner."

This is the rule in California. Wheelock v. Warschauer, 21 Cal. 309–316; Steinback v. Krone, 36 Cal. 303–309; Johnson v. Chely, 43 Cal. 299–305; Walls v. Preston, 28 Cal. 225; and Henderson v. Allen, 23 Cal. 519. In order that such an action may be maintained, the conventional relation of landlord and tenant must be shown to exist. In other words, the action is limited to those cases in which the tenant is estopped to deny the landlord's title; and when a defendant in an action which under our Code is the equivalent of one in unlawful detainer proves the nonexistence of such relation, the plaintiff must fail. Richmond v. Superior Court, 9 Cal. App. 63, 64, 98 Pac. 57.

[3] Appellant contends that, since the contract did not in set terms give the defendant the right of possession of the property, its entry upon the premises was merely permissive, and therefore that of a tenant at will. There is no merit in this argument, because the agreement between Mrs. Francis and the oil company clearly contemplated possession and occupancy of the land by the vendee. It was therein provided that the purchaser should not remove or cause to be removed any of the pipe or casing in any well drilled on the property, and that, in the event of a forfeiture by the corporation of the right to purchase the land under the contract, the casings and derricks should revert to the vendor. By the terms of the writing it was understood that it should not set aside or annul the contract between Mrs. Francis and Mr. Good except as specifically provided, but that the oil company should "hold and acquire said lands under said contract." In view of this language and of the subsequent conduct of the parties to the contract, there can be no doubt that the immediate entry by the West Virginia Oil Company upon the land and the development of oil thereon were within the contemplation of the plaintiff and defendant. Courts have frequently held that by implication contracts have given the right to immediate possession by the vendees even where no express provisions to that effect were contained in the writings. In Olson v. Minnesota & North Wisconsin R. Co., 89 Minn. 280, 94 N. W. 871, the vendee was obligated to pay all taxes and assessments, and in case of default buildings and improvements on the land were to revert to the vendor. It was held that the right to possession by the vendee was implied. A similar decision was made in Welch v. Hover & Co., 75 Wash. 130, 134 Pac. 526.

A vendee in possession is not a tenant in any sense of the word, and only a tenant may be sued under the first subdivision of section 1161. The proceeding is purely statutory and is restricted in its operation to those persons specified in the statute. Martel v. Meehan, 63 Cal. 47–50; Ben Lomond Wine Co. v. Sladky, 141 Cal. 619–623, 75 Pac. 332. Failure of performance of his part of the contract of sale by the vendee in possession does not make him a tenant. Brown v. Beatty, 76 Ala. 250; Mason v. Delancy, 44 Ark. 444; Brown v. Persons, 48 Ga. 61; Griffith v. Collins, 116 Ga. 420, 42 S. E. 743; Goldsberry v. Bishop, 63 Ky. (2 Duv.) 143; Young v. Ingle, 14 Mo. 426; Hauser v. Morrison, 146 N. C. 248, 59 S. E. 693. The rule established by these and many other authorities is in accordance with justice. Even a vendee who has defaulted in his promised payments is entitled to an opportunity of showing his equities and presenting his defenses.

It is not necessary to comment upon any other contentions made by appellant, as they are substantially disposed of, we believe, in the foregoing discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ABRAMS. (Cr. 2033.)

1. ARSON 🔑12 — ELEMENTS — PRESENCE OF HUMAN BEING IN BUILDING.

Under Pen. Code, § 454, defining first degree arson as the malicious burning in the nighttime of an inhabited building in which there is at the time some human being, the presence of a human being other than the person or persons doing the forbidden act is essential to the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arson, Cent. Dig. §§ 26, 27; Dec. Dig. 🔑12.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Arson.]

2. ARSON 🔑37(1)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In trial for arson, where it appeared that defendant and his wife were lessees occupying the building as their dwelling at the time of the fire, evidence, being entirely circumstantial, pointing no more strongly to him than to the wife as committing the crime, held insufficient to show the presence of a nonparticipating person in the building at the time as required by Pen. Code, § 454, defining first degree arson, since the presumption of innocence, available to the wife in a proceeding against her could not be entertained, under the circumstances, against the husband.

3. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1167(2) — HARMLESS ERROR.

The contention of an accused that two different counts in the information charging different crimes had the effect of improperly charging in the information two different offenses was of no practical importance after he had been acquitted as to the matters embraced in the second count, since that subject-matter was no longer in the case.

4. Arson 🔑9—Ownership of Building.

One may be guilty of arson as to a building owned by another and occupied solely by himself in view of Pen. Code, § 452, providing that to constitute arson it is not necessary that a person other than accused should own the building, since this section clearly implies that ownership by a person other than defendant is sufficient.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred W. Houser, Judge.

Max Abrams was convicted of arson, and from the judgment and order denying new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Constantine M. Mooslin and Ford & Hammon, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This defendant and his wife were jointly charged by information with the crime of arson, in the willful, malicious, and felonious setting fire to and burning with intent to destroy a certain building, the property of another, occupied by them as tenants as a dwelling house. In a second count of the same information they were charged with burning and destroying the same property with intent to defraud an insurer thereof. Separate trials were demanded, and the trial of this defendant was had before his codefendant was put on trial. It does not appear that she has ever been tried. A verdict of not guilty was rendered as to the matters charged in the second count. As to the charge of arson the jury found the defendant guilty of arson in the first degree. Judgment of imprisonment in the state prison was thereupon pronounced. We have here an appeal from this judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The appeal in this case was taken, as the Constitution requires, to the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, and that court affirmed the judgment and order appealed from. A hearing in this court was ordered principally because we were not satisfied as to the correctness of the disposition by the learned District Court of Appeal of the claim that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict finding this defendant guilty of arson in the first degree. Further consideration of that question has satisfied us that the evidence furnishes no support for any such verdict.

[1, 2] By our statute arson, which is the willful and malicious burning of a building, with intent to destroy it (section 447, Pen. Code), is divided into two degrees. Arson of the first degree, the more heinous offense, is defined as being the malicious burning "in the nighttime an inhabited building in which there is at the time some human being." Section 454, Pen. Code. The presence of "some human being" in the building at the time of the burning is therefore obviously essential to this particular offense. And it is just as clear that it must be some human being other than the person or persons doing the forbidden act. It was so held in People v. Principe et al., 23 Cal. App. 729, 139 Pac. 658. In the case at bar the evidence clearly shows that no human being was in the building other than the defendants jointly charged, the appellant here and his wife. They were tenants occupying the building as their dwelling; the building itself, as we have seen, belonging to another person. There is not a shred of evidence pointing to this defendant as being the person committing the alleged offense rather than his wife. In fact, the only conceivable theory, apart from mere conjecture or surmise, upon which it can be held that the evidence sufficiently supports a conclusion that he was a participant in the burning, is, in view of the evidence, that both he and his wife were joint participants. The evidence, which is entirely circumstantial, points no more strongly to him than it does to the wife. In fact, if there be any difference, it points more strongly toward the wife, for she was the sole owner of and carried insurance on the personal property contained in the building, and the evidence points pretty clearly to the conclusion that, if the fire was incendiary, the primary object was the destruction of this personal property with a view to obtaining the insurance money, and that, if there was any destruction of the building intended (which appears not to have been accomplished to any substantial extent), it was entirely incidental to the accomplishment of this main object. Certain it is that, if the evidence sufficiently supports a conclusion of this defendant's guilt, it shows to the same extent the guilt of the codefendant wife, and there is nothing therein to support a conclusion that, the defendant being guilty, the wife nevertheless was a nonparticipant, and therefore one whose presence in the building would satisfy the requirements of section 454, Penal Code. The presumption of innocence available to her in any proceeding against her may not be successfully invoked, under the circumstances, against the husband. A verdict finding this defendant guilty of arson in the first degree involves, in view of the definition of that offense, a finding by the jury of the guilt of the husband and the innocence of the wife of all participation in the crime, a result absolutely unwarranted by the evidence. It follows from what we have said that upon the record before us the presence of the wife in the building cannot be held to satisfy the requirements of section 454, Penal Code, and that the evidence utterly fails to show that there was any human being, within the meaning of that section, in the building at the time the fire was applied by this defendant, if it ever was applied by him. The verdict given against him is therefore contrary to the evidence. He was thereby found guilty of an offense as to which there was no evidence furnishing legal support for a conclusion of his guilt, and the conviction cannot be allowed to stand.

For the purposes of further proceedings in the event that they are concluded to be advisable, we deem it proper to notice one or two other matters.

[3] The contention as to two different offenses, being improperly charged in the information, is no longer of any practical importance, in view of the fact that defendant has been acquitted as to the matters embraced in the second count, and that subject-matter is no longer in the case.

[4] We find no substantial merit in the other objections raised by motion to set aside the information and by the demurrer to the information. As to the particular objection founded on a claim that a tenant cannot be guilty of arson, under our statutes, as to a building owned by another, and occupied solely by himself, we concur in the views expressed by the learned District Court of Appeal, and adopt the same as a part of this opinion. They are as follows:

> "Although the information stated that the defendants occupied the building and were tenants therein, the further fact was alleged that the building was the property of Smith. 'To constitute arson it is not necessary that a person other than the accused should have had ownership in the building set on fire. It is sufficient that at the time of the burning another person was rightfully in possession of, or was actually occupying such building, or any part thereof.' Pen. Code. § 452. The foregoing section clearly implies that ownership of the building by a person other than the defendant is sufficient, although it is declared to be not necessary. In People v. Handley, 100 Cal. 370, 34 Pac. 853, it was held that the defendant was properly convicted of arson in burning a house occupied by him as tenant of another who was the owner thereof. People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 76, and People v. De Winton, 113 Cal. 403, 45 Pac. 708, 33 L. R. A. 374, 54 Am. St. Rep. 357, are decisions which do not, in our opinion, support the proposition of appellant that under the allegations of ownership and tenancy, as stated, there is no sufficient charge that the defendants were guilty of the crime of arson."

Certain questions raised as to instructions to the jury are of such a nature that they will probably not arise on another trial, and need not here be discussed.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

GRAZIANI v. DENNY, Superior Court Judge.

1. JUDGES ⚷25(1)—JUDGE PRO TEMPORE—JURISDICTION.

Although by stipulation in a divorce action a judge pro tempore was selected under Const. art. 6, § 8, with power to act in such capacity "in all further proceedings" in the suit, another judge of the same court was not without jurisdiction to pass upon a motion to set aside the interlocutory decree of divorce made by the judge pro tempore on the ground that such judge had no jurisdiction and that the judgment had been obtained through collusion; the constitutional provision not declaring that the power of a judge pro tempore shall be exclusive, and the jurisdiction of the court being a single entity, irrespective of its exercise by one judge or another.

2. PROHIBITION ⚷11—GROUNDS—IRREGULAR EXERCISE OF JURISDICTION.

Where a judge of a superior court exercises authority in a matter properly to be heard by another judge of the court, it is an irregularity only, and not a matter of jurisdiction to be controlled by prohibition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. ⚷11.]

In Bank. Application for writ of prohibition by Celia Graziani against Thos. C. Denny, as Judge of the Superior Court in and for Sonoma County. Alternative writ discharged, and proceeding dismissed.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for petitioner. L. E. Johnston, of Napa, and Geary & Geary, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition against Hon. Thomas C. Denny, one of the judges of the superior court of Sonoma county.

On September 28, 1915, the petitioner, Celia Graziani, commenced a divorce action in said superior court against her husband, Emil Graziani. The defendant filed his answer, and there was also filed a stipulation, signed by said Celia and Emil Graziani, plaintiff and defendant in the action, that L. E. Fulwider, a member of the bar, duly admitted to practice in all the courts of the state, might act and proceed in said cause as judge pro tempore.

Mr. Fulwider duly qualified as such judge pro tempore, and proceeded to hear and try said action of divorce. Having heard evidence, he signed, made, and entered, as such judge pro tempore, an interlocutory judgment or decree determining that the plaintiff, Celia Graziani, was entitled to a divorce from said Emil Graziani, and awarding the custody of the minor children of the marriage to the said plaintiff. All of these proceedings, from the filing of the complaint to the decree, were had within the space of a single day.

On the 15th day of March, 1916, within six months after the entry of the interlocutory decree, Emil Graziani filed in said superior court a notice directed to Celia Graziani and her attorney, notifying them that he would, at a given time, move said superior court for an order setting aside, vacating, and annulling the interlocutory decree of divorce, upon the grounds that the court, acting or presuming to act, through said L. E. Fulwider as judge pro tempore, had no jurisdiction, and that the judgment had been obtained through collusion and fraud. At the time specified in the notice said Emil Graziani, by his attorneys, appeared in said superior court, and requested the respondent, a duly elected, qualified, and acting judge of said court, to hear said motion. The plaintiff, Celia Graziani, objected to any hearing in said action by Judge Denny on the ground that L. E. Fulwider, as judge pro tempore, was present and willing and able to proceed, and that he alone had jurisdiction to act in the case. The respondent overruled these objections, and announced his intention of proceeding with the hearing of the motion. The purpose of the present proceeding (in which an alternative writ of prohibition has been issued) is to restrain Judge Denny from proceeding with the hearing of the motion.

The authority for the selection of Mr. Fulwider as judge pro tempore is found in section 8 of article 6 of the Constitution. That section, in its first form, read in part as follows:

> "But a cause in the superior court may be tried by a judge pro tempore, who must be a member of the bar, agreed upon in writing by the parties litigant, or their attorneys of record, approved by the court, and sworn to try the cause."

In 1910 the section was amended by the elimination of the words "approved by the court" and the addition of the following clause:

> "And the person so selected shall be empowered to act in such capacity in all further proceedings in any suit or proceedings tried before him until the final determination thereof."

The original provision was carried into the statutes by the adoption of section 72 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which includes, in addition to the above-quoted language of the Constitution, a provision for the oath to be taken by the judge pro tempore, and a declaration that his action shall have the same effect as if he were a judge of the court. We think it clear, however, that the constitutional provision, both before and after the amendment of 1910, was self-executing and that it required no act of the Legislature to make it effective.

The most notable feature of the amendment of 1910 is the elimination of the requirement that the selection of a judge pro tempore by the parties must be approved by the court. Section 8 of article 6, as it now reads, commits the choice entirely to the will of the parties. In the ordinary adversary proceeding, this mode of conferring judicial power seems unobjectionable enough. The trial of a cause before a person selected by the parties to act as judge may be likened to an arbitration, in which issues of law and fact are determined by "one or more persons" designated by the parties in interest. Code Civ. Proc. § 1281 et seq. It is manifest, however, that the appointment, under the unrestricted will of the parties, of any member of the bar as judge of a cause, may lead to very questionable, not to say scandalous, practices, when applied to litigation in which the public has an interest, separate and distinct from, and perhaps antagonistic to, that of the formal parties. The best illustration of such litigation is the very kind of case here involved, namely, an action for divorce. While the husband and wife are the only necessary parties to an action for divorce, the maintenance and protection of the marriage relation are matters of such concern to the state that divorce litigation has under our law, and that of other jurisdictions, been hedged about with a variety of restrictions unknown to other judicial proceedings. The danger of collusion in divorce proceedings is so great that special precautions are thought to be required to guard against it. For example, it is provided that divorces cannot be granted upon default or upon the uncorroborated statement, admission or testimony of the parties. Civ. Code, § 130. For these reasons, it is insisted by the respondent that the provisions of section 8, art. 6, of the Constitution have no application to divorce proceedings. It is claimed that in such cases there are, in effect, three parties, the plaintiff, the defendant, and the state, and that the agreement of the plaintiff and defendant alone will not suffice to empower a person selected by them to act as judge.

[1] While we fully recognize the dangers inherent in the trial and determination of divorce cases by persons selected by the parties themselves, we do not find it necessary here to determine whether section 8 of article 6 permits this procedure. Assuming that it does, we see no ground for holding that Judge Denny, a duly elected and qualified judge of the superior court of Sonoma county, is without jurisdiction to act in a case regularly pending in that court. The constitutional provision authorizes a judge pro tempore to try a cause, and empowers him to act "in such capacity in all further proceedings" in the cause tried before him until the final determination thereof. For the purposes of the particular case, he is given by the Constitution the same power that is vested in the regularly elected and qualified judge of the court. But there is nothing in the constitutional provision which declares that his power shall be exclusive, or that it shall be in any way greater than that of elected judges.

> "The jurisdiction of causes is vested by the Constitution in the court, not in any particular judge or department thereof. The Constitution, in fact, says nothing about departments. It provides that there may be as many sessions of the court at the same time as there are judges (Const. art. 6, § 6); but, whether sitting separately or together, the judges hold but one and the same court, and the jurisdiction they exercise in any cause is that of the court, and not the individual. The division into departments is purely imaginary, and for the conveniences of business and of designation. Transferring a cause for trial or disposition from one of those departments to another does not effect a change or transfer of the jurisdiction of that cause; that remains at all times in the court as a single entity." White v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 60, 67, 42 Pac. 480.

See, also, Carter v. Lothian, 133 Cal. 451, 454, 65 Pac. 962.

[2] The superior court of Sonoma county has two judges. For the purpose of this divorce proceeding, it may be said that the court has three judges. Any judge of the court has authority to act in a cause pending in the court. If one of them exercises authority in a matter which should more properly be heard by another, his action would constitute, at most, an irregularity. But the objection would not in any event be one going to the jurisdiction, which alone is involved in prohibition. The motion to vacate the judgment was presented, not to any individual judge, but to the superior court of Sonoma county, and there is no ground for holding that any judge of that court is without jurisdiction to entertain such motion.

The alternative writ is discharged, and the proceeding dismissed.

PEOPLE v. HORGAN. (Cr. 505.)

1. Criminal Law ⟹1170½(5)—Harmless Error—Cross-Examination.

In a prosecution for robbery committed in the course of a game of draw poker, where the person robbed and others participating in the game appeared as witnesses for the prosecution, cross-examination of them, to show circumstances from which the jury might deduce a direct promise of immunity pursuant to which charges of gambling made against them had been dismissed, was not prejudicial, in view of the fact that it fully appeared that the cases against them were dismissed without their knowledge of that fact, or of the reason therefor.

2. Robbery ⟹23(1) — Evidence — Fraudulent Gaming.

In a prosecution for robbery committed in the course of a poker game in which defendant had claimed that his money had been obtained by trick or fraud, evidence as to whether certain witnesses were regular patrons of the gambling place, offered to show that the proprietor conducted a "crooked game," was inadmissible, as the fact that some of the witnesses frequented the place did not tend to show that defendant's money had been obtained at play by fraudulent means within Pen. Code, § 332.

3. Criminal Law ⟹1170(1)—Harmless Error—Exclusion of Evidence.

In such prosecution, the exclusion of certain evidence was not erroneous, where defendant's substantial rights could not have been prejudiced thereby, as where upon his own evidence the jury could not properly have reached a different verdict.

In such prosecution, defendant's requested instruction that, if he did not take the money from the person alleged to have been robbed, but took it from the proprietor of the gaming place whom he claimed to have obtained it by trick or fraud, he should be acquitted, was properly refused where other instructions did not permit a verdict of guilty unless the jury was satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant, or persons acting under his orders, by means of force and fear resulting from the use of a gun, unlawfully took the money from the person alleged to have been robbed, who himself had not obtained defendant's money by winning at play through fraudulent means, as defined by Pen. Code, § 332.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Arthur Horgan was convicted of robbery, his motion for a new trial was denied, and he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Frank T. Bates, Walter J. Hartzell, and Charles L. Allison, all of San Bernardino, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. The defendant, with James Allen and Dan Boyd, were by information jointly charged with the crime of robbery, in that by means of force and fear they took from the possession and person of Jacob Widener, the prosecuting witness, the sum of $40, lawful money of the United States. Upon a separate trial from his codefendants, Horgan was convicted of the crime as charged. His appeal is from the judgment pronounced and from an order of court denying his motion for a new trial.

The alleged offense occurred in the city of Needles, Cal., at which place Boyd, Allen, and defendant arrived at about 10:30 p. m. on January 15, 1916, coming from Oatman, Ariz., where they had been employed as laborers in the mines. Upon arriving at Needles, Boyd and Allen obtained a room at a lodging house at which they registered, and then, with defendant, visited saloons and restaurants around the town until about 1 o'clock the next morning, when they went to a gambling house conducted by one Faust in the basement of a building, where a game of draw poker was in progress. Defendant and Allen each bought some $20 worth of chips from Faust and entered the game, in which Faust, Widener, and some three or four others were engaged. After playing for some time and losing the $20 which he had invested in chips bought from Faust, Horgan left the table and stood watching the game near Allen, who continued playing. In the deal immediately preceding the "hold up," Allen drew an ace-king flush, upon which, before other cards were drawn by the players, he raised the ante or bet. All but one of the other players laid down their hands. This player drew three cards, which, with the two cards retained, gave him three queens and a pair of jacks, upon which he won the stakes. Thereupon Allen, turning to defendant, said: "That is an awful way they have of getting our money." At this Horgan drew his gun and, pointing it at the crowd, ordered them to hold up their hands, saying: "All you ——— of ——— hold up your hands. I have got the best hand now." Thereupon Allen proceeded to take from Widener some $35 or $40, and from others, including Faust, who was conducting the game, he took various sums. Then, compelling Faust to open the door, they left by the stairway leading from the basement, immediately following which there was an exchange of shots between Faust on the one side and defendant on the other. They took a train about to leave Needles, getting off at Yucca, from which place they came to Los Angeles, thence to San Diego, where they were arrested.

It appears that Faust, Widener, and others engaged in playing were arrested for gambling and, after testifying at the preliminary hearing of the charge against Allen, Boyd, and defendant, the cases against them were dismissed.

At the trial of defendant two defenses were interposed: (1) That while admitting his part as stated in the hold-up, and admitting that they did, in the manner stated, take money from the table and from the person and possession of Faust, they assert they took none whatsoever from Jacob Widener, named in the information as the victim of the robbery. (2) That in taking money from Faust they were retaking their own money which had been obtained from them by means of trick and fraud. As to both of these questions it is conceded there was a direct conflict of evidence. There is ample evidence to show the taking of money from the possession of Widener, and the statement of defendant and those jointly charged with him, which is little more than a surmise of fact based upon what they conceived to be the probability thereof, that in the last hand played by Allen his opponent was dealt three cards off the bottom of the pack, which statement is directly contradicted by another witness. However, even were it true that Allen lost the money bet on this last hand by reason of the fraud claimed, it by no means follows, nor is there any evidence, that defendant lost his money or any of it by reason of like acts of Widener whom he robbed; nor is there any evidence showing that Faust was a party to such alleged fraud and trickery.

[1] As stated, Faust, Widener, and others of those engaged in playing, were arrested and charged with gambling. After they had testified at the preliminary hearing of defendant, the cases against them were dismissed. On cross-examination, questions were asked of Widener and others appearing as witnesses in behalf of the prosecution, the purpose of which it is claimed was, not to show directly a promise of immunity pursuant to which the dismissals were had, but to show circumstances from which the jury might make such deduction. Conceding the court might properly have granted defendant greater latitude on cross-examiantion, nevertheless, in view of the fact that it fully appears the cases were all dismissed without the knowledge of the witnesses and that they did not know why such action was taken, no prejudice could result from the rulings. This is particularly true, since it was conclusively shown by the testimony of the district attorney, called by defendant as a witness, that the dismissals were not had upon any suggestion or agreement made with defendants, but that such action was taken by the justice before whom the actions were pending, by reason of a statement made to him by the district attorney, as shown in answer to the question:

> "Mr. Hert, I will ask you whether or not it is a fact that the dismissal of these cases in Needles was obtained because of the fact that the witnesses had informed you, or you had been informed from some source which you understand came from the witnesses, that they would not be here for this case unless those cases were dismissed?"

An objection to this question being overruled, the district attorney replied:

> "No. At the time the preliminary examination was held, these men came in and testified; these witnesses that have testified here came up and testified, and after they had testified Judge Covage asked me what I thought about it, and I said: 'They have got it on you now, as section 1324 has not been read to them. Even if it was read to them, they are exempt from prosecution in this case, and I don't see where you will get anywhere with your prosecution against those fellows for gambling.'"

The court further stated to defendant's attorney:

> "If you desire to ask him if there was a promise of immunity by the district attorney's office or any reward, you may ask that."

[2] Other rulings in excluding evidence as to whether or not the witnesses were regular patrons of Faust's place, the purpose of which it is claimed was to show that he conducted a "crooked game," were proper. The question involved was whether defendant's money was obtained by trick or fraud, and the fact that some of the witnesses frequented the place did not tend to prove that defendant's money had been obtained by larceny, as defined in section 332 of the Penal Code.

likewise without merit. In no event could defendant's substantial rights have been prejudiced thereby, since upon the evidence adduced by him in his own behalf the jury could not properly have reached a different verdict from that rendered.

[4] Defendant requested the court to give two instructions, one of which was given as modified and the request as to the other was denied. These instructions were in effect the purpose for which evidence of the taking of money from others than Widener was introduced, namely, to show intent of the defendant with respect to the offense charged, and that if he did not take any money from Widener, but took it from Faust who had obtained it by trick and device, defendant should be acquitted. The subject of these instructions seems to have been fully covered by instructions given elsewhere, that in order to justify a verdict of guilty the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the money alleged to have been taken by defendant was in fact taken from the possession of the complainant Jacob Widener. The jury was also instructed as to what constituted larceny by trick and device, and told that property obtained in such manner was not the subject of larceny by the rightful owner thereof from which the property was so taken; and likewise instructed as to the purpose of admitting evidence showing the taking of money from others than Widener who were present, and expressly told that defendant was being tried solely and alone for the robbery of Jacob Widener. It is apparent, under the instructions given, that the jury could not have reached a verdict of guilty unless they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant, or persons acting under his instructions and orders, by means of force accomplished by the use of a gun and the fear resulting from the use thereof, unlawfully took the money from the person and possession of Jacob Widener, as to whom there is not the slightest evidence that he had obtained defendant's money in the manner pointed out in section 332, Penal Code.

The record discloses no error whereby defendant's substantial rights could have been prejudiced, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

1. Criminal Law 🔑1169(1)—Harmless Error—Examination of Witnesses.

In a prosecution for robbery during a poker game, questions to a witness for the defense, on direct, tending to show that witness had been promised that if he would change his testimony to convict defendant the same charge against him would be dismissed, was not prejudicial, where it was not claimed that witness' testimony was influenced or that he testified untruthfully.

2. Criminal Law 🔑1153(3)—Discretion of Trial Court—Order of Testimony.

The trial court's action, in permitting the prosecution on rebuttal to offer testimony that might have been introduced in chief, would not be disturbed, where defendant was accorded every opportunity to meet such alleged new evidence; since the order in which the testimony may be introduced is largely in the discretion of the trial court.

In a prosecution for robbery of a named person by unlawfully and feloniously and by means of force and fear taking and carrying away property from such person against his will and consent, defendant could be convicted of assault with intent to rob, where there was no proof that he obtained money from such person, in view of Pen. Code, § 1159, providing that the jury may find defendant guilty of any offense the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged or an attempt to commit the offense, and section 211, defining robbery as the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear.

James Allen was convicted of assault with intent to rob, his motion for a new trial was denied, and he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Frank T. Bates, Walter J. Hartzell, Raymond E. Hodge, and Charles L. Allison, all of San Bernardino, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. This case is a companion to that of People v. Horgan (Crim. No. 505), 162 Pac. 399, an opinion in which, affirming the judgment therein, was this day filed. The defendant here was jointly charged with Horgan and one Dan Boyd with robbing Jacob Widener. Upon trial he was convicted of assault with intent to rob one Jacob Widener. He appeals from the judgment and an order of court denying his motion for a new trial.

The facts as to commission of the offense are identical with those presented in the Horgan Case, and, as in that, the defendant here complains of a number of rulings by the court in admitting and excluding evidence, some of which were discussed in the Horgan Case. As to these it is unnecessary to repeat what was there said.

> "Q. Have you been approached by anybody, either the sheriff or district attorney of this county, to change your testimony as given at the two former trials of this case? Q. Is it not a fact that an officer from the district attorney's office came to you while you were in the county jail, and endeavored to get you to change your testimony? Q. And didn't he tell you at that time that if you would change your testimony that would convict Allen that the case against you would be dismissed?" to all of which objections were sustained.

In the absence of any enlightenment upon the subject, we are unable to perceive what purpose defendant had in asking the questions, or how they could possibly be material and pertinent to the issues being tried. It is not claimed that Boyd's testimony was influenced in any way, or that he testified other than truthfully; and even if it were conceded that the county officers did try to corrupt and induce him to commit perjury, since they failed to succeed, defendant could not be prejudiced by such efforts.

A number of questions were asked by the district attorney on cross-examination, to which objections were sustained and the jury told to disregard the questions; nevertheless defendant assigns the asking thereof as misconduct of the district attorney and well calculated to prejudice defendant in his substantial rights. We do not think so. There is nothing in the circumstances presented by the record from which a presumption of prejudice could be drawn, based upon the action of the district attorney in asking the questions, answers to some of which the court might properly have permitted as cross-examination. The record presents nothing upon which prejudicial misconduct of the district attorney can be predicated.

[2] Since the order in which testimony may be introduced is a matter largely in the discretion of the court (People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 65, 55 Pac. 698), its action, in the absence of anything showing an abuse of discretion, in permitting the prosecution on rebuttal to offer testimony that it might have introduced in chief, will not be disturbed. Defendant was accorded every opportunity to which he was entitled in meeting such alleged new evidence.

[3] As stated, defendant was jointly charged with the commission of the crime with James Horgan, who it appears was tried and convicted. At the trial, Allen was called as a witness on behalf of defendant and gave testimony which clearly tended, not only to incriminate the defendant Horgan, but also to incriminate himself. When the trial of this defendant was called, his attorney made a motion to dismiss the case against him upon the ground that section 1324 of the Penal Code had not been read to him when called as a witness for the defendant Horgan. The purpose of this provision is to enable prosecuting officers, by granting the immunity therein provided, to obtain testimony against one charged with an offense in cases where, prior to the enactment, a witness was protected by section 13, art. 1, of the Constitution. The language is that such person "is a competent witness against any other person so offering."

In the case of People v. Richman, 28 Cal. App. 761, 155 Pac. 142, this court, in discussing the interpretation to be given the statute, said:

> "The whole purpose of this enactment seems to have been to enable prosecuting officers to obtain the testimony of persons implicated in a criminal transaction. Under the provisions of section 13, art. 1, of the Constitution, no person may be compelled to give testimony against himself. The protective force of the constitutional provision applied to cases where the testimony sought from a party involved in a criminal transaction might tend in some way to fasten the crime upon him. In order to furnish a means by which testimony of an interested party, even though it might tend to incriminate him, might be obtained in aid of the prosecution of other persons, the Legislature has provided that such testimony may be compelled, but that when it is extracted in this mandatory way the person giving the self-incriminating testimony may not be subjected to prosecution for the offense concerning which he has furnished evidence against himself."

Defendant was not called as a witness against Horgan, but, without objection, testified for him. Availing himself of his constitutional right when so called, he, under section 13 of article 1 of the Constitution, might have refused to testify on the ground that his testimony would tend to connect him with the commission of the crime for which Horgan was being prosecuted. In our opinion, the provision was not intended to apply to codefendants called as witnesses for the defense, but to enable the prosecuting officer to obtain the testimony of those particeps criminis to a crime for the commission of which another is being prosecuted. To hold otherwise would mean that, in the trial of one of a dozen persons jointly charged with the commission of a crime pursuant to a conspiracy, he, since the district attorney would have no voice in the matter, might by calling his codefendants as witnesses secure their discharge from prosecution, however well equipped with conclusive evidence of their guilt the district attorney might be, thus depriving him of the control of the prosecution of those accused of committing crimes.

[4, 5] Another point made by appellant as ground for reversal arises out of that part of the charge of the court to the jury which deals with the form of their verdict and the offenses of which he might be convicted under the information. The court instructed the jury that their verdict might be either one of "not guilty," or one of "guilty of robbery as charged in the information," or "guilty of grand larceny," or "guilty of assault with intent to rob one Jacob Widener." The verdict of the jury was, as hereinbefore stated, "guilty of assault with intent to rob one Jacob Widener." Appellant insists that, inasmuch as the information charged defendant with the commission of robbery, committed as follows: "The said * * * James Allen * * * on the 16th day of January, 1916, at the said county of San Bernardino, state of California, did willfully, unlawfully and feloniously, and by means of force and fear, rob, take, steal and carry away from the person, possession and immediate presence of Jacob Widener, and against the will and without the consent of the said Jacob Widener, * * * then and there the property of the said Jacob Widener"—he could not be convicted of assault with intent to rob, since the information contained no appropriate allegations charging him with such offense. In our opinion, the contention is without merit. Section 1159 of the Penal Code provides:

> "The jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense, the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged, or of an attempt to commit the offense."

"Robbery" is defined by section 211 of the Penal Code as the "felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear." In People v. Chavez, 103 Cal. 407, 37 Pac. 389, the court says:

> "It may be conceded that an assault with intent to commit rape, as well as a simple assault, are included in the offense here charged" —which was that of rape.

There is evidence which clearly tends to prove that defendant was guilty as charged in the information, namely, that while Horgan, at the point of a loaded pistol, commanded those in the gambling room to hold up their hands, and, by means of such force and the fear resulting therefrom, he (the defendant) proceeded, against the will of Widener, to take money from his pockets. That it was done with a guilty intent admits of no doubt. In order, however, to constitute robbery, the defendant must have obtained money from Widener. Upon this point the evidence is in conflict, and apparently the jury were not convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that he obtained any money in the search of Widener's pockets. Such act, assuming no property was obtained from him, while incomplete as a robbery, possessed all the elements of robbery other than the taking of money. The assault was made and made with the intent to rob. That it was not accomplished may be due to the fact that Widener possessed no money, or to other causes. While an assault with intent to commit a crime may constitute an attempt, the converse of the proposition is not true, since there may be an attempt to commit a crime, such as larceny, for instance, unaccompanied by an assault. In robbery, however, there must be an assault, accompanied by an intent to rob, and the actual taking of the property by force and against the will of the one robbed; and since this is true, the lesser crime, namely, an assault with intent to commit robbery, lacking in the one element of the crime charged, is included in the offense for which defendant was prosecuted. Upon the record, which we have examined with some care, the jury might very well have acquitted the defendant; but since, on the other hand, there is evidence upon which they might have properly convicted him of the offense charged, this court cannot disturb the verdict rendered to the effect that he was guilty of an assault with intent to commit robbery.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by George J. Black against the Warehouse Investment Company, a corporation. From a judgment for defendant following an order granting its motion for nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Judgment reversed.

Grant & Zimdars and William H. Bryan, all of San Francisco, for appellant. L. A. Redman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in defendant's favor following an order granting defendant's motion for a nonsuit.

The action was one for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff by falling into an unguarded elevator shaft in a building owned by the defendant. The facts upon which the plaintiff relied for his recovery, and upon which he predicates his claim for a reversal of said judgment, are substantially these: The defendant, Warehouse Investment Company, was at and for some time prior to the injury complained of the owner of a warehouse in San Francisco fronting on Townsend street on the north, and extending to King street, designated in the record herein as the "old" building. The said defendant was also at the time of the accident engaged in the erection of another warehouse building designated as the "new" building, adjacent to the former building, but fronting on King street and extending back to a private alley, also owned by the defendant, and which ran through, and under the second floor of, the old warehouse building. The general brick and steel work of the new building was being done under a contract with Anderson & Rainey, but from the operation of this contract had been specially excepted the erection of two large steel beams or girders for a railroad track entering the building in the outside wall on King street. On the morning of June 14, 1913, the work of construction in that part of the building had so far progressed that it was ready for the placing of these beams, which were at the time in the possession of the Overland Freight Transfer Company, whose duty it was to transport them to the place of their erection when notified so to do. On the evening of June 13, 1913, a Mr. Qualters, an employé of the Overland Freight Transfer Company, met a Mr. Johnson, representing the California Erecting Company, and arranged with him to put the beams in place on the following morning. The plaintiff herein was an employé of Johnson or of his company, and was with him at the time of this interview with Qualters, who then gave Johnson a card bearing the telephone number of a stable to which the latter was to telephone when all was in readiness for the hauling of the beams to their place of erection. Qualters at the time stated that he would have to take up the matter of the agreement with Johnson for the erection of the beams with a Mr. Tilden, who, he said, was the boss at the building, for the latter's approval. On the following morning Johnson, Qualters, and Tilden met at the building, and the agreement being approved by the latter, Johnson, the plaintiff, and others went ahead with the work of preparation for putting the beams in position, and while such work was in progress Tilden informed Johnson that "We got a telephone in there, and you can go and use that phone, and phone to the barn when you are ready for the beams," at the same time pointing out to him where the office in the old building in which such telephone was situated was to be found. When all was ready Johnson told the plaintiff, Black, to go to the indicated telephone and send the message to the barn for the delivery of the beams. It was while Black was undertaking to fulfill this mission that he fell into the unguarded elevator shaft in the old building and sustained the injuries which form the basis of this action. This elevator shaft lay in the line of a driveway on the ground floor of the old building which could be entered by way of the alleyway which ran along the north end of the new building and intersected said driveway. It was along the most direct way to the office of the old building in which was the telephone to which the plaintiff had been directed to go, and it was while going along this route that the plaintiff fell into the unguarded shaft of said elevator.

At the trial and upon the conclusion of the plaintiff's case the defendant, Warehouse Investment Company, moved for a nonsuit upon the ground chiefly that no evidence had been presented connecting the said defendant with the accident or with the plaintiff's injuries, or showing or tending to show that the plaintiff was other than a mere trespasser, or, at most, none other than a licensee in entering the building in which the accident occurred, and that there was no evidence that said defendant was in possession of the old building at the time of the accident. The court granted the motion for nonsuit, and gave judgment for the defendant thereon.

[1, 2] In so doing we are of the opinion that the court was in error. We are satisfied from a careful reading of the record that there was some substantial evidence before the court tending to show that Mr. Tilden was the representative of the Warehouse Investment Company in general charge of the work of construction being done upon said warehouse. Mr. Qualters referred to him as the "boss," and required and received his approval of the agreement with Johnson. It was he who told Johnson where the telephone was located to which the plaintiff was presently directed to go. During the progress of the main work upon the building Mr. Tilden was shown to have been present directing the work. In addition to this, the plaintiff offered proof that the principal contract for the brick and steel work was entered into by the contractors with Mr. Tilden as the representative of the defendant at the warehouse in respect to that portion of the work of construction both at and after the time of the plaintiff's injuries. The court sustained the defendant's objection to this offer, and this, we think, was also error. Such offered proof, taken in connection with the facts that said Tilden was to approve and did approve the particular agreement with the plaintiff's employer, and did direct him to the place where the telephone was located to which the plaintiff was going at the time he received his injuries, would, in our opinion, have furnished both competent and substantial evidence tending sufficiently to show the general authority of Tilden as the defendant's agent and representative at the place and time of plaintiff's injuries to entitle the latter to have the case go to the jury.

For both reasons, we think the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

ALAMEDA COUNTY v. COOK et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 22, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 19, 1917.)

1. Clerks of Courts 🔑35—Fees—Right to Retain—Statutes—Construction.

Under Pol. Code, § 4152, making the county clerk ex officio clerk of the superior court, and section 4232, fixing his salary at $4,000 per annum, and section 4290, providing that such salary should be in full for all services, and section 4292, requiring him to pay into the county treasury all fees allowed by law except where such fees or percentage thereof were allowed to him, where Act June 29, 1906, c. 3592, § 13, 34 Stat. 600 (U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 535) provided that the clerk collecting naturalization and immigration fees could retain one half thereof and account for the other half to the federal bureau, the clerk was not authorized to retain such fees personally, but the county could recover them.

2. Clerks of Courts 🔑35—Fees—Right to Retain—Statutes—Construction.

The circumstance that Pol. Code, § 4233, fixing compensation of officers in Santa Clara county, at one time declared that the county clerk must pay into the treasury all fees received by him from whatever source derived, and that such section was amended by St. 1911, p. 1282, to read "including fees allowed by the government of the United States of America in all matters pertaining to the naturalization of aliens," was not an expression that every other county clerk could retain the naturalization fees for his own personal use.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Alameda County against John P. Cook and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Reed, Black, Nusbaumer & Bingaman, of Oakland, for appellants. W. H. L. Hynes, Dist. Atty., Walter J. Burpee, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., and T. P. Wittschen, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of Oakland, for respondent. Leon Moss and F. A. Stephenson, both of Los Angeles, as amicus curiæ.

LENNON, P. J. These are appeals from judgments rendered in favor of the plaintiff upon the defendants' default in answering after their demurrers to the plaintiff's complaints had been disallowed, in two actions wherein the plaintiff prayed for judgment against the defendant Cook for the recovery of certain sums of money aggregating $5,854.50, collected by him as fees during his incumbency of the office of county clerk of the county of Alameda, and against the corporation defendant, as surety upon his official bond. One action was for the recovery of that part of the aggregate amount collected by said Cook during the years 1907 to 1911, and the other action was for the recovery of the balance of said aggregate sum collected by him during his term of office commencing in the year 1911. Both cases being between the same parties and involving identical questions of law and fact, the appeals were presented and argued together, and will therefore be discussed and decided as one.

The sums of money in suit were alleged to have been collected by the defendant Cook as county clerk of Alameda county, under an act of Congress which provided that the clerk of any court collecting such fees was authorized to retain one-half thereof, and that the remaining one-half should be accounted for quarterly to the federal bureau of immigration and naturalization. 34 Stat. 596, c. 3592; U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 535, § 13. It is conceded that the corporation defendant is liable upon its bond if it be held that the complaint states a cause of action against the defendant Cook; but it is the latter's contention that he was entitled as a matter of law to retain for his own use and benefit one-half of the fees provided for by the federal statute in question and which he collected under and by virtue of that statute in his official capacity as county clerk.

[1] We are satisfied that this contention cannot be sustained. A similar contention was made in the case of City and County, etc., v. Mulcrevy, 15 Cal. App. 11, 113 Pac. 339; and in that case this court held that although the federal naturalization act authorized Mulcrevy as county clerk to retain, as against the government of the United States, one-half of the fees which he had received for services rendered in naturalization proceedings, the disposition of such fees did not concern the federal government, and that inasmuch as they were paid to and collected by Mulcrevy in his official capacity he was compelled to account for and pay the same into the treasury of the city and county of San Francisco pursuant to certain charter provisions under which he held and conducted his office, which provided that the salary allowed and paid to him should be in full compensation for all services rendered, and that he should pay into the city and county treasury all moneys coming into his hands as county clerk no matter from what source derived or received.

The Supreme Court of the United States, where the Mulcrevy Case ultimately went upon a writ of error, after a denial of a rehearing by the state Supreme Court, not only affirmed the judgment of this court, but incidentally answered the question now raised here adversely to the contention of the defendants, viz. that any construction of the federal statute denying to the county clerk the right to retain to his own use one-half of the fees collected by him, had no tendency to create antagonism between the state and its officers, and would not result in a conflict of law and authority between the state and the federal governments. In the course of its opinion the court in effect said that the federal statute did not purport to deal or interfere with the relation of the state and its officers, and that the disposition of fees collected under a federal statute by a state officer, after an accounting to the federal government for its proportion thereof, might very properly be covered and controlled by the law of the state without necessarily creating any antagonism between the state and its officers, nor any conflict between the federal and state statutes.

We are unable to perceive, as counsel for the defendants would have us do, any material distinction between the scope and effect of the charter provisions of San Francisco upon a construction of which rested the decision originally and finally rendered in the Mulcrevy Case, and the provisions of the statute law of the state which the plaintiff claims, and the court below held, compelled the defendant here to account for and pay into the county treasury of Alameda county the fees collected for services rendered by him, in his official capacity as county clerk, to the federal government in naturalization proceedings. While it is true that the decision in the Mulcrevy Case both by the Supreme Court of the United States and this court rested largely, and probably entirely, upon a consideration and construction of the particular provisions of the San Francisco charter, which prescribed that Mulcrevy's salary should be in full for all services rendered by him, and required him as county clerk to pay into the county treasury all moneys coming into his hands, as such officer, "no matter from what source derived or received," nevertheless the phrasing and purpose of those charter provisions were not in our judgment in effect peculiar to the municipal government of San Francisco, for analogous provisions are to be found in the statute law of the state prescribing the duties of county clerks throughout the state, providing for their compensation, and directing the disposition of fees collected by them in their official capacity. Those statutory provisions, it is conceded, were in operation either as a part of the former county government act, or as sections of the Political Code, at the time the defendant Cook received and retained the fees in suit. Thus the statute provided that the defendant as county clerk of Alameda county was ex officio clerk of the superior court of that county, and was required to perform the duties imposed upon him by law (Pol. Code, § 4152), and his salary as such county clerk and ex officio clerk of the superior court was fixed at $4,000 per annum (Pol. Code, § 4232), which was to be "in full compensation for all services of every kind and description" rendered by him either as county clerk or ex officio clerk of the superior court (Pol. Code, § 4290); and as such clerk he was required to charge and collect for the use of his county, and "pay into the county treasury on the first Monday in each month the fees now or hereafter allowed by law in all cases except where such fees or a percentage thereof" were allowed to him or were made a charge against the county (Pol. Code, § 4292). While these statutory provisions do not in so many words, as did the charter provisions involved in the Mulcrevy Case, direct that all fees, "no matter from what source derived or received," should be paid into the county treasury, nevertheless they did direct the defendant to collect and pay into the county treasury all fees "allowed by law," and this direction, we take it, is broad enough in its scope and effect to cover and control the disposition of all fees received by the defendant Cook in his official capacity regardless of the source from which they were derived.

That the fees received by county clerks under the federal statute in naturalization proceedings come within the category of fees "allowed by law" was definitely declared in the case of Freeholders, etc., v. Slater, 87 N. J. Law, 621, 90 Atl. 377, decided subsequent to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Mulcrevy Case, where it was held that inasmuch as the county clerk received such fees for services rendered in his official capacity as clerk of the court in which naturalization proceedings were had, he was required to pay them into the county treasury under a statute which provided that costs, allowances, percentages, and other perquisites of whatsoever kind which by law the county clerk may receive for any official acts or services rendered by him or his assistants, shall be for the sole use of the county. 4 Comp. St. N. J. 1910, p. 4643, § 38.

We are not unmindful of the several cases from other jurisdictions holding in effect that when rendering services in naturalization proceedings the county clerk is acting as the agent of the United States separate and apart from and without regard to his official relations to the state, and that therefore the disposition of the fees charged and collected under the federal statute in naturalization proceedings was no concern of the state. These cases, however, were all decided previous to the rendition of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Mulcrevy Case, and therefore their effect as authorities upon the question presented here has been seriously impaired if not destroyed.

[2] The circumstance that section 4233 of the Political Code, which fixes the compensation of county officers of counties of the fourth class (Santa Clara), at one time declared that the county clerk of counties of that class must pay into the county treasury all fees received by him in his official capacity from whatever source derived, and that such section was amended in 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1282) to read "including fees allowed by the government of the United States of America in all matters pertaining to the naturalization of aliens," was not an expression of the legislative will that the county clerk of every other county in the state might retain fees collected in naturalization proceedings for his own personal use and benefit. The amendment to the section in question, although more precisely expressing the legislative will and intent as to the disposition of fees received in naturalization proceedings, did not as a matter of law add anything to the meaning of the section as originally enacted, nor consequently by inference restrict the scope of the statutory provisions relating to county clerks throughout the state couched in the same general language as that relating to the county clerk of Santa Clara before its amendment.

The two cases of Alameda County v. Dalton, 148 Cal. 246, 82 Pac. 1050, and Sacramento County v. Pfund, 165 Cal. 84, 130 Pac. 1041, have no application to the facts of the present case. In the former it was the claim of Dalton that he, as the county assessor, was entitled to retain to his own use a certain percentage of the amount of poll taxes collected yearly by him under the terms of a statute which plainly provided that he was "to retain for his own use" the percentage in controversy, but which was in irreconcilable conflict with an earlier statute which expressly provided that he should not receive any compensation for his services in collecting poll taxes. The Supreme Court decided that the latter statute prevailed, and that it expressly justified the retention by Dalton for his own personal use of 15 per cent. of the poll taxes collected by him for the state.

The case of Sacramento County v. Pfund, supra, involved the right of the county clerk of that county to retain to his own use a certain percentage of hunting licenses sold by him under the hunting license act, which provided that "for each license sold, registered and accounted for by any person except a fish and game commissioner, he shall be allowed as compensation out of the fish and game preservation fund 10 per cent. of the amount accounted for. Stats. 1909, p. 663. Construing this act the Supreme Court held that the phrase "any person" was designedly employed therein to differentiate the service of selling licenses from the duties ordinarily required of the county clerk in his official capacity, that is to say, that the selling of licenses was purely a personal service rendered by the clerk as an individual; and that such differentiation indicated with sufficient certainty the legislative intent to confer upon the county clerk the right to retain for his own use the percentage provided for by the statute.

Clearly the cases immediately under discussion are not in conflict with the Mulcrevy Case, and do not tend in any degree to support the claim of the defendant that he was entitled to retain the fees in controversy here for his personal use, if we are correct in our previously expressed interpretation of the intent and purpose of the provisions of section 216 of the county government act which were in force during the first term of the defendant Cook as county clerk, and continued in force during his second term in the form of section 4292 of the Political Code, and which required county officers to account for "the fees now or hereafter allowed by law except where such fees or a percentage thereof is allowed such officers. * * *"

PEOPLE v. KNOX. (Cr. 354.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 21, 1916.)

1. EMBEZZLEMENT ⚿10—GIST OF OFFENSE.

The essential gist of the crime of embezzlement is in the breach of trust reposed in the agent, employé, or bailee by his principal, employer, or bailor, so that the charge of embezzlement always presupposes the lawful acquisition, by the agent, employé, or bailee, of the possession of the property which has been misappropriated or wrongfully converted.

2. LARCENY 🔑15(1)—DISTINCTION FROM EMBEZZLEMENT.

The essential distinction between the crime of embezzlement and that of grand larceny is that, in embezzlement, the original taking of the property is lawful, while in grand larceny the original taking involves a trespass, or is accompanied by a felonious intent to deprive the owner of the property taken.

3. LARCENY 🔑15(1) — ELEMENTS — LAWFUL POSSESSION BY DEFENDANT.

Defendant, in the automobile business, who borrowed money of the prosecuting witness, giving a bill of sale covering two automobiles as security, was not guilty of larceny in removing and selling one of the cars, where they were first kept in his garage for the prosecuting witness free of charge, but later an arrangement was made whereby the prosecuting witness hired a corner of the garage for a stipulated monthly rental, and moved his machines to that corner, whereby he became a bailee for hire.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

E. J. Knox was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial. Judgment and order appealed from reversed.

E. S. Bell, of Napa, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant, having been convicted of the crime of grand larceny, appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The information filed against the accused is in two counts; the first charging the crime of embezzlement in that he fraudulently converted to his own use an automobile, known as a "Krit roadster," the alleged property of one H. J. Beal, and in the second that he committed the crime of grand larceny in that he feloniously stole and carried away said automobile.

The point first called to our attention is that both counts of the information charge identically the same offense, viz. embezzlement, and that there is therefore no groundwork for the support of the verdict. This point, however, does not require consideration here, inasmuch as we have arrived at the conclusion that the evidence, as it is presented before us, shows that, if the defendant is guilty of any crime at all growing out of the transaction upon which this action against him is founded, it is that of embezzlement and not grand larceny.

Stating them as they were given at the trial by the prosecuting witness himself (H. J. Beal), the facts are substantially as follows: The transaction from which this prosecution arose was had between said H. J. Beal and the defendant on the 29th day of April, 1914. For a period of some four or five months prior to that time the parties named had been intimate acquaintances, both being members of the Methodist Church in the city of Napa. Beal was then engaged in the business of buying and selling real estate, and Knox was a dealer in automobiles, maintaining, in an alley or a small street in the rear of the Napa Hotel, a garage of rather limited capacity and used mainly for the storing of automobiles.

On the morning of the 29th day of April, 1914, the defendant called at the residence of Beal. The latter had just finished his morning meal when his doorbell rang. Upon opening the door, Beal saw the defendant, who stated that he had called for the purpose of securing from Beal, if he could, a loan of the sum of $475. Knox stated to Beal that he was about to obtain the agency in Napa of the Maxwell automobile, and that the company required, before vesting him with the powers of such agency, that he should deposit with it a sum of money as evidence "of good faith"; that the amount he needed for that purpose would be the sum of $475; that he would be able to return the money within a few days. Beal replied that, while he had no money to let out, nevertheless he was in a position and inclined to accommodate the defendant, and asked the latter what security he could give for the loan. Knox said that he could and would execute and deliver to Beal his promissory note for the amount, and as security therefor would execute and deliver to Beal a bill of sale of two automobiles owned by him—one a Maxwell and the other a "Krit" roadster. This proposition was satisfactory to Beal, who thereupon drew his check on the Bank of Napa for the sum of $475 in favor of Knox and delivered the same to the latter. Knox then delivered to Beal his promissory note for the sum mentioned, and at the same time delivered to him the bill of sale of the two cars above described. Beal did not take possession of the machines so pledged to him, but left them in the garage of the defendant, where they were at the time of the transaction mentioned. But it appears that either later on the same day upon which the loan in question was made, or the day following, Beal had heard that the defendant had not used the money borrowed by the accused for the specific purpose for which he represented to Beal that he wanted it, and thereupon and immediately called at the home of the defendant, and there, in the presence of the wife of the accused, told the latter what he had heard concerning the disposition that he (the defendant) had made of the money. Knox admitted to Beal that, in the place of putting the money up as deposit to secure the agency of the Maxwell Company, he had used it in paying off a balance or an amount due on the Maxwell car which, with the Krit roadster, he had pledged to Beal. The latter then declared that he did not approve of the conduct of the accused in so misrepresenting to him the use to which he intended to apply the money, and that he (Beal) desired therefore to take possession of the pledged property. Knox assented to this proposition, and thereupon the two men immediately proceeded to the garage or storeroom in which the two cars were kept, and on reaching the garage Beal said that he would, if agreeable to Knox, rent one corner of said storeroom in which he would store the machines, and asked Knox what rental he desired or would charge. The latter replied that, inasmuch as they were still personal friends, he would charge Beal nothing for the room occupied by the cars. Beal, however, said that he desired to pay for the use of the room, and thereupon it was agreed that he should and would pay therefor the sum of $2.50 per month. The two men then moved the cars to a particular corner in the garage. There they remained undisturbed for some three or four weeks, when Beal, after several other previous visits to the garage and finding the cars in the corner in which he and Knox had placed them, called at the garage and observed that the Maxwell car had been removed to a shed near and on the outside of the garage. Knox was at the garage at this time, and Beal asked him "what the Maxwell was doing under the shed," to which the defendant replied that he had sold it. "I asked him by what authority he removed it out of the barn," Beal continued to testify, "and he laughed and said: 'Beal, you don't care anything for either of these automobiles, for that matter; you have a good machine, and it is your money you want.' And he further told me that he had sold it to some party formerly—oh, I don't know—but that he had taken a mortgage on a house and lot in Vallejo as security for the Maxwell; he had sold it for $400." Beal further testified that nothing more was said or occurred by or between them on that occasion.

A few days after the conversation above recited—Beal fixed it at approximately a week from said time—the latter again visited the garage, and there met Knox and the party to whom the defendant had sold the Maxwell car. Beal testified that he passed "the time of day" with the party to whom Knox had sold the Maxwell, and that further than that nothing was at that time done or said. Beal further testified that, within about 30 days from the time that the defendant told him of selling the Maxwell, the accused paid him (Beal) the sum of $100 on the note referred to above.

In the month of October, 1914, the defendant (so it appears from Beal's testimony) moved his garage from the "barn" (Beal sometimes referred to it as a "barn") in the rear of the Napa Hotel to a small storeroom or building on Main street, between Pearl and First streets, in said city of Napa, where it remained for several months. Early in February, 1915, Beal missed the Krit roadster from the garage or storeroom of Knox. Shortly thereafter, Beal and Knox met at an automobile house in San Francisco. Beal on that occasion asked Knox what he had done with the Krit roadster, and in reply Knox stated that he had stored the machine in San Francisco, and that his purpose in taking it there was to sell it. Considerable talk went on between them about the Krit, Beal saying that Knox had no right to move the machine from Napa and no right or authority to sell it. Knox said that "I cared nothing at all for the machine, but it was the money I was after, that I wanted, and I told him that that worked one time, but it would not work twice."

It was shown by the witness Covington that he sold the Krit roadster to a party in San Francisco.

The above constitutes an accurate synoptical statement of the facts as testified to by Beal, the prosecuting witness, and it was undoubtedly upon his testimony that the jury founded their verdict, inasmuch as the record discloses no other testimony addressed to the question as to the possession of the pledged property or to the several transactions occurring between Beal and Knox relative to the said property.

Although brought out by the defense, there is another circumstance, the verity of which was in a measure admitted by the district attorney who prosecuted this case, and to which therefore we may properly advert, and it is: That during a portion of the year 1914, and after it had been pledged to Beal, the Krit machine was in the possession of Messrs. Bush & Haus, the owners of another garage in the city of Napa. Bush testified that Knox brought the Krit to his garage to have some repair work done on it, and that he said to Bush that, if he would make the repairs, he could, himself, use the machine whenever he desired to do so. On one occasion, Bush & Haus let it out to the district attorney, who was then making his canvass over Napa county for election to the office of district attorney. That official admitted at the trial that he hired the Krit from Bush & Haus at the time and for the purpose mentioned.

It is to our minds an unquestionable proposition that the facts as proved and above stated clearly disclose that, if the defendant is guilty of any crime growing out of the transaction between him and Beal, it is that of embezzlement.

[1, 2] The essential gist of the crime of embezzlement is in the breach of trust reposed in the agent, employé, or bailee, by his principal, employer, or bailor, and therefore the charge of embezzlement always presupposes the lawful acquisition by the agent, employé, or bailee of the possession of the property which has been misappropriated or wrongfully converted to the use of such agent, employé, or bailee. The essential distinction, then, between the crime of embezzlement and that of grand larceny, is that, in embezzlement, the original taking of the property is lawful, while in grand larceny the original taking involves a trespass or is accompanied by a felonious intent to deprive the owner of the property so taken. In other words, "in the case of grand larceny, the taking must be with a felonious intent; * * * but in embezzlement the original taking is lawful, and the crime consists in the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted." People v. Dye, 29 Cal. App. 169, 179, 154 Pac. 875, 879; People v. Howard, 160 Pac. 697; People v. Tomlinson, 102 Cal. 19, 36 Pac. 506. Of course, when a person obtains property from the owner thereof with the latter's apparent consent, but so obtains it with the intention of stealing it, and carries out that intent, he is guilty of larceny; but this record affords absolutely no ground for the inference that the defendant obtained possession of the machines with the intent to steal them.

[3] The facts of this case, however, as we have detailed them herein, plainly speak for themselves, and therefore require no analytical examination to demonstrate that the one essential element of larceny, namely, the asportation or felonious taking of the property, in the first instance is clearly wanting. It is, however, vigorously argued that, while originally the pledged property was permitted by Beal to remain in the possession of the defendant, the property was subsequently taken from his possession by the act of Beal in "renting" for a stipulated monthly rental a small portion or corner of the garage in which they had always been kept and removing the machines to the corner so rented for storage. We are unable to view the situation as the record here presents it in that light. We cannot see how it can truly be said that Knox was any the less intrusted with the machines after they were removed to a particular corner of the garage of which he had exclusive control than he was before they were so removed. He had used and was using the building or garage at the time of his transaction with Beal as a room in which to store automobiles. That he had the possession of the building at all times is not questioned. Necessarily, therefore, he had possession of its contents, whatever they were or by whomsoever they were owned, and was responsible for the safe-keeping of all property deposited or left therein for that purpose. The fact that in the first instance he was a mere gratuitous or voluntary bailee, and subsequently became a bailee for hire, cannot, of course, change the situation. He still held the property in trust for Beal. Let it be supposed, as a matter of illustration, that Beal, after receiving the bill of sale from Knox, had taken actual possession of the machines, and had removed and placed them for safe-keeping or storage in the garage of Bush & Haus, agreeing to pay the latter for the service so rendered a certain monthly rental, and that Bush & Haus had, without authority, sold the machines and pocketed the proceeds of the sale. In such case, would it be doubted for a moment that Bush & Haus had thus obtained lawful possession of the machines, and so would be guilty of embezzlement and not of grand larceny? The case presented against the defendant here is no different in any particular from the supposititious case above stated.

That the defendant not only openly exercised possessory dominion over the pledged property, but even exercised acts of unqualified ownership of a part thereof, and this with the knowledge and tacit consent of Beal, is indisputably shown by the proofs. He removed the Maxwell machine from the garage to a shed situated near the garage, where it was seen by Beal, who was told by the defendant that he (the defendant) had sold it. Beal made no serious protest against this act of the defendant; he merely asked the accused by what authority he had removed the Maxwell to the shed and sold it. Beal subsequently saw the purchaser of the machine at the defendant's garage. He merely "passed the time of day with him," but said nothing about his interest in the Maxwell, nor did he then question the defendant's right to sell it. However, the decision of the case must, obviously, rest entirely upon the solution of the question whether the defendant, at the time he disposed of the pledged property, did or did not have lawful possession of the said property. We repeat that, to our minds, there is no escape from the conclusion that the evidence unquestionably shows that he did have such possession, and that, consequently, the verdict adjudging him guilty of grand larceny is wholly without support.

The judgment and the order appealed from are, accordingly, reversed.

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⚷37—CONSTRUCTION OF LEASE—STATUTES.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1641, 1643, 1644, 1649, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1864, prescribing rules of construction of contracts, the scope, purpose, and effect of a lease must be determined from a consideration of it as a whole, rather than by resort to any individual clause; it must be given such an interpretation as will make it effective in conformity with the intention of the parties. If its terms are in any way ambiguous or uncertain, it must be interpreted in the sense in which the lessee believed, at the time of making it, that the lessor understood it. If different constructions of its clauses may be otherwise equally proper, that construction must be given which will be most favorable to the party in whose favor the clauses in controversy were made; and the words used must be taken and applied in their usual and ordinary sense.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⚷71—TERM OF LEASE—OPTION OF LESSEES—"REBATED"—"ENTITLED."

A lease granted premises to defendants for five years, commencing the 15th day of January, 1909, and ending on the 14th day of January, 1914, but provided that in case the premises should not be ready for occupancy by January 15, 1909, the rent reserved should abate and not be payable until the premises were ready for occupancy, that the failure to have the premises ready should not be a cause for vacating the lease, nor should the lessees be entitled to any damage, rebate, or recoupment, except the rent expressly agreed upon, but that the term of the lease should be extended so that the lessee should be entitled to occupancy for the full term of five years from the date when the premises should be ready for occupancy. Held, that the extension provision of the lease was intended for the benefit of the lessees rather than the lessor, so that, although the premises were not ready for occupancy until April 1, 1909, when the lessees entered, they were not required to hold possession, or liable for rent, after January 14, 1914, "rebated" having been used in its ordinary meaning of to deduct from and "entitled" having been employed to mean to give the right to demand or receive, being diametrically opposed to the idea of imposition of an obligation.

Action by the Edward Barron Estate Company, a corporation, against W. M. Waterman and Marcus Levy, copartners doing business under the firm name of Waterman & Levy. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court; Shaw, Sloss, and Lawlor, JJ., dissenting.

Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, of San Francisco, for appellant. Theodore L. Breslauer, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. This is an action for rent; and the only point presented in support of the plaintiff's appeal from the judgment entered in favor of the defendants involves the construction of certain clauses of a lease executed by the M. Fisher Company to the defendants on December 12, 1908, of certain premises in a building which was then in course of construction. Although the lease at the outset granted the demised premises to the defendants "for the period of five years commencing on the 15th day of January, 1909, and ending on the 14th day of January, 1914, at the monthly rental of $250," nevertheless a subsequent clause of the lease provided that:

"In case the demised premises shall not be finished and ready for occupancy by the 15th day of January, 1909, the rent hereinbefore reserved shall abate and shall not be payable until said demised premises are ready for occupancy; but it is expressly understood that the failure to have said demised premises ready for occupancy by the 15th day of January, 1909, shall not be a cause for vacating, annulling or rescinding this lease, nor shall the lessees by reason thereof be entitled to any damage, rebate or recoupment except the rent hereinbefore expressly provided and agreed upon; but in that event the term of this lease shall be extended so that the lessee shall be entitled hereunder to the occupancy of the leased premises for the full term and period of five years from and after the date when said premises shall be ready for occupancy."

The demised premises were not made ready for occupancy until April 1, 1909, at which time the defendants entered into possession of the premises and remained therein under the terms of the lease until January 14, 1914. In the month of May, 1911, the lessor, M. Fisher Company, conveyed its interest in the lot of ground upon which was situate the building in which the demised premises were located, together with its interest in the lease, to the plaintiff. The defendants paid the stipulated rent for the full time that they actually occupied the premises, but after they had vacated the same the plaintiff made demand upon them for the payment of rent from January 15 to April 1, 1914. This demand, which was refused, was predicated upon the theory that the lease obligated the defendants to occupy or pay rent for the demised premises for a full term of five years from April 1, 1909, the date of the actual occupancy of the premises.

[1] The scope, purpose, and effect of the lease, of course, must be determined from a consideration of it as a whole rather than by a resort to any individual clause thereof. Civ. Code, § 1641. So construed, the lease must be given such an interpretation as will make it effective in conformity with the intention of the parties (Civ. Code, § 1643); and if its terms are in any way ambiguous or uncertain, it must be interpreted in the sense in which the lessee believed at the time of making it that the lessor understood it (Civ. Code, § 1649); and if different constructions of its clauses may be otherwise equally proper, that construction must be given which will be most favorable to the party in whose favor the clauses in controversy were made (Code Civ. Proc. § 1864). Furthermore, the words of a contract, save in certain excepted cases not involved here, must be taken and applied in their usual and ordinary sense. Civ. Code, § 1644. The word "rebated" was doubtless used in the ordinary sense. Ordinarily, says Webster, "to rebate" means "to deduct from." The word "entitled" evidently was likewise employed in the lease, and is generally and ordinarily understood to mean to give "the right to demand or receive, * * * to furnish with good grounds of seeking," and, as thus defined, has been judicially declared to be opposed diametrically to the idea of the imposition of an obligation. 15 Cyc. 1085; 11 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 50; People's Trust Co. v. Smith (Sup.) 30 N. Y. Supp. 342.

[2] Tested by the foregoing statutory rules for the ascertainment of the intent of the parties to a contract (Civ. Code, § 1637), we have no doubt but that the trial court correctly concluded that the lease in controversy was sufficiently certain in its designation of the commencement and termination of the leasehold term, and also in its expression of the intent of the parties not to extend such term beyond January 14, 1914, save at the option of the lessees. In other words, the lease, in our opinion, was fairly construed by the trial court to mean that, although the leasehold interest was to take effect on January 15, 1909, nevertheless if the lessor's delay in completing the demised premises operated to deprive the lessees of the use and occupation thereof on and after the date designated for the commencement of the term, then and in that event the rent was to be rebated, that is to say, proportionately deducted for the time that the occupancy by the lessees was delayed through the noncompletion of the building; and the term of the lease, if the lessees so desired, extended for the full period of five years from the date when said premises were ready for occupancy. We think it plain that the extension provision of the lease was intended for the benefit of the lessees rather than the lessor, and, if so, must be construed as giving them the privilege of remaining in possession of the premises for the full term of five years from the date of their entry, while not imposing upon them the obligation to remain longer than the term designated in the leases by dates. The defendants, not having exercised the option granted to them for an extension of the leasehold term, were under no obligation to retain the demised premises beyond the date definitely designated in the lease for the termination of the occupancy, and consequently were not obligated to the plaintiffs for the rent claimed to have accrued subsequent to that time.

The judgment is affirmed.

SILVA v. NORTHERN CALIFORNIA POWER CO. (Civ. 1562.)

1. ELECTRICITY 🔑19(3) — ACTION FOR LOSS BY FIRE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where plaintiff suffered loss by fire which evidence shows started at a point on electric wires owned by defendant which in the ordinary course of events would not have happened if defendant had used proper care, under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, a prima facie case of negligence by defendant was shown, and the burden of excusing such negligence was upon defendant.

2. EVIDENCE 🔑219(1)—ADMISSIBILITY—FABRICATING EVIDENCE.

Evidence, showing that electric wires produced in court by defendant were not the ones in use at time of plaintiff's loss by fire, claimed to have been caused from defendant's wires, was admissible not as res gestæ, but in the nature of an admission that defendant had no defense except by fabricating evidence.

3. TRIAL 🔑252(7)—ACTION FOR LOSS BY FIRE—INSTRUCTIONS — CONFORMITY TO EVIDENCE.

Defendant's requested instruction that "defendant cannot be held liable for any defective wiring in the tankhouse" was properly refused, where there was no evidence to show that such wiring was defective; the claim being that plaintiff's loss by fire was caused from defects outside the house.

4. ELECTRICITY 🔑19(13) — ACTION FOR LOSS BY FIRE—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for loss by fire caused from defendant's electric wires, instructions held sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by M. G. Silva against the Northern California Power Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Freeman, of Willow, for appellant.
J. R. Robinson, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action is for damages occasioned by the alleged negligence of defendant in delivering electricity to plaintiff's tankhouse, resulting in the destruction of the latter by fire. The cause was tried by a jury, and plaintiff had the verdict for $500. Judgment was accordingly entered, from which defendant appeals on bill of exceptions.

The negligence complained of consisted in want of proper care in the delivery of electricity to plaintiff's motor placed in said tankhouse. Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the amended complaint set forth the following facts:

"That at a time prior to the destruction of said tankhouse by fire as hereinafter stated, and at the request of plaintiff, and for the purpose of supplying and selling to plaintiff electricity to propel said motor, defendant erected, placed, and installed the necessary wiring, appliances, and apparatus for the purpose of conveying an electric current from its said power line to said motor in said tankhouse. That said wiring, appliances, and apparatus as so installed extended from one of the poles of said power line on said land near said tankhouse to the said motor in said tankhouse, and included a transformer placed by defendant on said pole and connected with said wires for the purpose of reducing the current of electricity that should be conveyed to said tankhouse, and that from said transformer, the said wires as so installed extended to said tankhouse, where they entered the same through holes in the wall thereof made by defendant for said purpose and at an elevation of about 18 feet from the ground, and that they ran thence along and down the inner wall of said tankhouse to an electric meter, which was at all times herein mentioned owned by, and under the supervision and control of, defendant, and used by it to measure the electricity used by plaintiff for his said purposes, and which meter was situated on the inner wall of said tankhouse near said motor. That from said meter said wires ran to a switchboard on said inner wall near said motor, and were thence connected with said motor. That all said appliances, wires, and apparatus were installed by defendant as above stated. That thereafter, and until the fire hereinafter referred to, plaintiff purchased of defendant, and defendant sold to plaintiff, electricity for his said purposes, and which was delivered and conducted over and through said wiring and appliances as so installed.

"And plaintiff alleges that the wires, appliances, and apparatus herein referred to connected with and extending from said power line to the place where said wires entered said tankhouse as above stated, and used by defendant to supply plaintiff with electricity as above stated, were at all times herein mentioned owned by, and under the supervision and control of, defendant, and that prior to and at the time of the fire hereinafter referred to, defendant negligently and carelessly allowed the same to be and remain, and by reason of said negligence they became, and were, in such condition as to admit a dangerous amount or voltage of electricity to said wires in said tankhouse, and thereby to render them dangerous and unsafe with respect to causing fire to said tankhouse.

"And plaintiff alleges that by reason of said negligence and carelessness, and on or about the 15th day of January, 1915, the electric current conveyed by said wires at said tankhouse caused the said structure to ignite and take fire at or about the place where said wires entered said structure, and that the said tankhouse, together with its contents, including said pump and motor, were burned and entirely destroyed by said fire."

A general and special demurrer was overruled, and defendant answered: Admitted wiring plaintiff's tankhouse as alleged, but denied that defendant had any control over the same; alleged that it did have control over the wires leading from the transformer to a point within a few inches of the tankhouse, but denied that it had any control or was under any duty to keep in repair any wires beyond said point or in said tankhouse; admitted ownership of the meters in the tankhouse, but alleged that these were properly installed and were safe; denied that the wires which defendant did control were dangerous or unsafe in any respect, and denied any responsibility for the fire.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence a motion for nonsuit was made and denied. The correctness of the ruling is not made the subject of discussion, for the reason that evidence on the part of both plaintiff and defendant was admitted after the motion was denied. The rule is that if all the evidence given by both parties supports the verdict, the order denying the motion for nonsuit will not be disturbed. Van Horn v. Pacific Refining, etc., Co., 27 Cal. App. 105, 111, 148 Pac. 951.

Plaintiff lived upon a farm a short distance from the city of Chico, Butte county. His residence was about 45 feet from the tankhouse. Defendant, about 2½ years before the fire, had built a power line over plaintiff's land, carrying 6,600 volts of electricity. One of the poles of this line was 169 feet from the tankhouse, and on this pole was installed a transformer designed to reduce the current passing into the tankhouse to 220 volts, admittedly the proper quantity for the purpose of operating plaintiff's motor. The wires from the transformer to the tankhouse entered the latter through the shingled wall at a height of 22 feet from the ground, and just below the floor on which the tank rested; these wires crossed the tankhouse under this floor to the opposite wall and ran down that wall to meters and thence to the motor. Between the meters and motor was a switch for controlling the current passing into the motor, and there was also a switch above the meter. All the wires and appliances for operating the motor were installed by defendant. The meters were owned by defendant, and were used to measure the electricity sold by defendant to plaintiff. The wires from the transformer to the house were owned by defendant, but the wires inside the house were paid for by plaintiff. He testified that he did not know they belonged to him until he heard it so stated after the fire occurred. Whether his or defendant's is perhaps not important, for they were used by defendant to supply the current, and there was no evidence that there was anything wrong with the inside wires. About a year before the fire the transformer burned out, and the fire consumed the pole. The pole and transformer and the wires to the tankhouse were replaced at that time. The day before the fire something went wrong with the motor, and plaintiff telephoned to defendant. An electrician was sent out by defendant on the day of the fire. Plaintiff testified:

> "He came out and tested the fuse, put on some more fuses, throwed the switch, the fuse blowed right out, and he put on some more fuses, and then he said the motor was burned out; he told me I would have to bring it in, and he left for town. * * * When he went away he left the fuses he had put back. He put in the first fuses, and they blowed out; then he put in some more fuses and he left."

It appeared that no other change took place inside the tankhouse that day and at 9:30 that night the tankhouse fire occurred.

Referring to the wires in the building, plaintiff testified:

> "Those wires were in the same condition they were at the time they were put in—at the time they were put in by the defendant. They have never been changed nor moved. The building has never been repaired, nor has any part of it."

Of the wires going from the transformer to the building, he testified:

> "As those wires come from the pole to the building, they go right straight from the pole to the building. They are fastened on the outside of the building, right there on the side. I think they are fastened above the holes that they go through. They are fastened to some hooks. The wires that come from the pole go directly to those hooks, and are fastened to the hooks. Then the wires that go through the building are connected onto those wires, and they sag down a little and go into the building. It is a different wire that goes into the building from the wire that extends from the pole to the tankhouse. The wire that goes through the hole in the building is fastened to those wires that extend from the pole."

The witnesses to the fire all agree that it started outside of the building and at the point on the outside and next to the building where the defendant's wires were connected with the wires running into the building. Plaintiff testified that his attention and that of his wife was called to the fire by his daughter when the fire started, and the blaze was right at the junction of these wires next to the tankhouse; that he ran to the tankhouse and went in and took out one or two articles; that while in the building he looked up to where the wires entered, and there was no fire inside.

Mrs. Silva's testimony, as well as that of neighbors attracted to the fire, was corroborative of plaintiff's testimony. It appeared that in the installation of the plant by defendant the wires running from the transformer to the building were hung on a hook screwed into the building and connected with the inside wires two or three inches from the building. At this point insulators and what were called circuit breakers were on defendant's wires. Witness Wright arrived at the tankhouse shortly after the fire started. He testified:

> "The fire was burning around the wires at the place where the wires went into the tankhouse. * * * Q. Could you state whether or not all of the insulation was burned off at the end of those wires for 2 or 3 feet back from the end of the wires? A. I think it was all burned off before they fell."

The office intended to be performed by these circuit breakers and insulaters on defendant's wires at the point of connection with the wires going inside was to control the current or prevent its doing damage in passing into the building.

It further appeared that after the wires fell to the ground, the ends were brought together and caused a spark, showing that the current was then passing from the transformer over these wires. It appeared that the wires were insulated where they passed through the walls of the building and were at the time in place and, so far as known, in good condition. And the evidence was that the fire did not start elsewhere than on the outside and at the point of connection as already explained. The evidence was that the fire could not have been caused by any agency other than the electricity passing from the transformer.

[1] And as the fire started at a point on the wires admittedly owned by and in the control of defendant, we think sufficient was shown to make a prima facie case of negligence on the part of defendant and to cast upon defendant the burden of excusing its negligence.

We had occasion to examine somewhat fully into the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur in the case of Hill v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 22 Cal. App. 788, 136 Pac. 492, and we there held the rule inapplicable to the electric company for the reason that as to that company the evidence did not measure up to the requirements of the rule which is as stated in Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 556, 40 Pac. 1020, 1021 (29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146):

> "When a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care."

Defendant's position is a denial that the rule res ipsa loquitur has any application to the case, and that it was "essential for plaintiff to show from the record by his complaint and sustaining evidence that defendant was under an obligation with plaintiff to maintain the wires and apparatus under its contract in such condition as not to deliver to plaintiff a dangerous amount or voltage of electricity, and that it did deliver such dangerous amount or voltage to plaintiff's intended and known purposes, and that the damage complained of resulted from such delivery." We cannot accede to this view of plaintiff's duty. Having shown that the fire occurred under the circumstances and from causes hereinabove pointed out, a prima facie case of negligence was made out, and shifted the burden upon defendant of showing that defendant was not negligent. Defendant in fact undertook to show that it was not negligent. It introduced two witnesses, defendant's linemen, who testified that they were at the tankhouse the morning after the fire, and tested the transformers and found them in good condition; that they took the three service wires from the pole lying upon the ground and carried them to defendant's office and locked them up, where they remained in their then condition until produced at the trial and were introduced as exhibits; that "each of the three wires put in evidence as defendant's exhibits has on the end, alleged by defendant's witnesses to have been attached to the tankhouse, a loop, which is claimed by defendant to have been attached to an iron screw hook five inches long, and screwed into the wall of the tankhouse. On each wire from this loop * * * is a porcelain knob or ball called a 'circuit breaker' or 'insulator,'" the purpose of which was to keep the voltage away from the building; that these knobs were still on the end of the wires; and that no insulators had burned off except on that part of the wires that entered the building carrying the current. This evidence was put forward to establish the theory that the fire started in the wall of the building from the wires over which defendant had no control. The presence of the unburned knobs at the end of the wires leading from the transformers showed, it is urged, that the fire was not caused by defective appliances belonging to defendant. These same witnesses also testified to testing the transformers and finding them in safe condition. Witnesses for plaintiff who were at the fire were very positive in their testimony that the appliances used to safeguard the electricity passing into the building at the point of junction of the wires were all burned off the wires coming from the transformers, and that when the wires fell, there were no knobs or anything else on them, but that the wires back for some distance and the insulators on them were burnt off before the wires fell. These witnesses were shown the exhibited wires, and testified that they were not the wires that fell from the building, one witness testifying that if they were they had been repaired. Plaintiff testified:

> "When the wires fell, there was simply a straight wire; there was no knob on the end of the wire. They burned through and broke beyond the circuit breaker, in the part where the current was passing through to the building. I am sure that when those wires fell at my place, and when Osborne picked them up there was no circuit breaker attached to the ends of the wires. The fire was burning fully 20 minutes around these wires before they came down, that was the center of the blaze when it started. The end of these wires—the end of that circuit breaker was right in the fire."

[2] There was testimony which, if believed by the jury, justified them in finding that the fire occurred as claimed by plaintiff, and it also had a tendency to discredit the testimony of defendant's witnesses upon a very important fact advanced by defendant in explanation of the accident, and would also justify the jury in looking with disfavor upon other testimony of these witnesses.

> "It is laid down as a well-settled rule that all efforts by either party to a suit, directly or indirectly, to destroy, fabricate, or suppress evidence may be shown, not as a part of the res gestæ, but in the nature of an admission that the party has no sufficient case unless aided by suppressing evidence, or by the fabrication of more evidence." Jones on Evidence, vol. 1, § 22a.

The fabrication of evidence is calculated to raise a presumption against the party who has recourse to such practice, not less than when evidence has been suppressed or withheld. It was for the jury to determine in what light defendant's testimony was to be considered.

There was testimony submitted by defendant tending to show that the burned-out condition of the motor might have caused a short circuit, the effect of which would be the blowing out of the fuse in the tankhouse. It is suggested as defendant's theory that "the fire may have started because the insulators were affected by the burned-out motor and the resultant short circuit." This is mere conjecture. There was no evidence that such effect would follow. In reply it may be said that the appliances used by defendant to control the current are intended to withstand the burning out of a motor, which latter is not an uncommon occurrence, as the evidence showed. There was testimony submitted by plaintiff that failure to keep the necessary quantity of oil in the transformer would sometimes cause it to burn out, or cause a short circuit, which for the time would increase the voltage on the wires running from the transformer.

Defendant failed to acquit itself of negligence by evidence overcoming the prima facie case made by plaintiff. The defense seems to rest primarily upon plaintiff's failure to show facts sufficient to call for any explanation by defendant. This, we think, is based upon a misconception of the rule applicable to the case as developed by the evidence.

[3] The court gave a number of instructions at the request of the defendant and on its own motion. At the close of defendant's instructions the court refused the following:

> "You are instructed that under the issues presented in this case the defendant cannot be held liable in any way for any defective wiring in said tankhouse, if any existed."

There was no evidence tending to show that the wiring within the tankhouse was defective. The evidence was that this wiring was done by defendant; that it served its purpose perfectly and was in as good condition when the fire occurred as when put in place. The burning out of the motor was from some inherent defect, and in no wise related to the wiring, and it was not claimed that defective wiring within the building caused the fire. The evidence as to the cause of the fire centered around the insulators or circuit breakers in defendant's control where the fire first occurred. We cannot see that the instruction, given in its concrete form would have been of any service to defendant. Besides, instruction 9, given at defendant's request, seems to have been sufficient upon the point, for in all probability it was an excessive voltage passing from the transformer, for the moment, and not defective wiring that caused the accident. Instruction 9 was as follows:

> "I instruct you that while the law required of the defendant that it should use ordinary care to see that an unnecessarily dangerous amount of electricity, with respect to causing fires, was not permitted to enter upon the wires in said building of plaintiff, yet this does not make of the defendant an insurer. It only required of the defendant that it should exercise ordinary > care; that is, such a degree of care as an ordinarily prudent man under like circumstances would exercise, and if you find from the evidence that the defendant did exercise such ordinary and reasonable care to see that a dangerous and unnecessary amount of electricity, with respect to causing fires, did not enter upon the said wires in the said tankhouse, then, notwithstanding the fact that a fire did result from such electricity, if you should so find, then it will be your duty to find a verdict for defendant."

Defendant was further safeguarded by instruction 7, given at its request, as follows:

> "If you find that the said fire that destroyed said tankhouse was actually caused by reason of the wires, appliances, and apparatus of defendant being in such condition as to allow a dangerous and unsafe amount or voltage of electricity into the wires in said tankhouse, still the defendant is not liable in damages to plaintiff, and you cannot find a verdict against defendant, unless you also find that the defendant failed to use due and ordinary care to prevent such condition."

It is claimed that:

> Instruction No. 21 "is confusing, inaccurate, and prejudicial, because it makes no distinction at all between the defendant's service wires and the plaintiff's wires, and predicates defendant's liability upon both wires, whereas the complaint predicates defendant's liability upon only its negligence and carelessness in allowing 'the wires, appliances, and apparatus herein referred to connected with and extending from said power line to the place where said wires entered said tankhouse, as above stated, and used by defendant to supply plaintiff with electricity as above stated' (quoted from the complaint), to be and remain in such condition as to admit a dangerous amount of voltage to said wires in said tankhouse, and to thereby render them (the wires in the tankhouse) unsafe with respect to causing fire to said tankhouse."

The point of the objection arises out of a reference in the instruction to the wires within the building, whereas it is claimed that the complaint is founded, and other instructions also, on the theory that the alleged negligence consisted in defendant's failure to exercise care to keep the wires and apparatus which were under its control in a safe condition. Instruction No. 20 was as follows:

> "If the jury believe from the evidence that at the time and place claimed by plaintiff and mentioned in the proof, the wires, appliances, and apparatus referred to in this action extended from defendant's power line to the place where said wires entered the tankhouse of plaintiff, and that said wires were used by defendant to supply plaintiff with electricity, and that at said time and place mentioned in the proof were under the supervision and control of defendant, then it was the duty of the defendant, through and by its employés in charge of and in control of said wires, appliances, and apparatus, to use and exercise ordinary care to operate and control same, and to reasonably control and regulate a reasonably safe amount of electricity to pass through said wires, apparatus, and appliances, and to do so in a reasonably safe manner for the reasonable protection of plaintiff's building and property from fire."

In instruction No. 21 the jury were told that if they find that plaintiff exercised reasonable care in operating his motor and pump, and if they find that at said time—

> "the wires, appliances, and apparatus mentioned in the proof extended from said power line and entered the said tankhouse, and were at said time and place under the supervision and control of defendant, and that defendant failed to exercise ordinary care to keep said wires, appliances, and apparatus in reasonably safe condition, and failed to reasonably regulate the amount of electricity passing through said wires into plaintiff's said pumphouse," etc.

Defendant could not have been prejudiced by this instruction for the reason that there was no evidence that the wires within the building were defective, or that the fire was caused by any condition existing in the building through defendant's or plaintiff's negligence.

[4] The instructions given by the court very clearly left with the jury the question whether or not the fire occurred at a point where defendant had control of the wires and appliances, and whether or not defendant was guilty of negligence in conveying the electricity by means of these wires and appliances to the tankhouse. Instruction 7, above quoted, and instruction 11, given at defendant's request, show that this was the dominant question submitted to the jury, and properly so. Instruction 11 was as follows:

> "If defendant used ordinary care and was not guilty of carelessness or negligence, and did not carelessly or negligently allow the wires, appliances, or apparatus, as the same are described in the amended complaint, to become in such condition as to admit a dangerous amount or voltage of electricity to said wires in said tankhouse and thereby to render them unsafe or dangerous with respect to causing fire to said tankhouse, you cannot find for plaintiff and against defendant."

We do not think the instructions were either confusing or prejudicial, but that the issues arising out of the evidence, as well as the pleadings, were submitted upon instructions which fairly gave the law to the jury.

CLAY et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2164.)

1. Justices of the Peace 🔑159(9)—Appeal Bond—Recitals—Date of Judgment.

The erroneous recital of the date of the judgment, in an undertaking on appeal from a justice of the peace, is immaterial, where the notice of appeal was correct, and the undertaking was given in aid of that appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 565–569; Dec. Dig. 🔑159(9).]

2. Justices of the Peace 🔑159(10) — Appeal Bond—Time for Filing—Justification of New Sureties.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 978a, requiring the undertaking on appeal to be filed within five days after notice, and providing that if the adverse party excepts to the sufficiency of the sureties, and unless five days thereafter, on notice to the adverse party, they or other sureties justify, the appeal must be regarded as if no undertaking had been given, an undertaking is in time if filed within five days after the exceptions to the sureties with new sureties who justified, though it is filed more than five days after the notice of appeal, and though an entirely new undertaking on which the sureties had not justified, filed without notice of justification given to the appellee would be insufficient.

3. Justices of the Peace 🔑159(10) — Appeal Bond — Time for Filing — New Undertaking.

The fact that the undertaking on appeal from a justice of the peace was rewritten, and signed again by one of the former sureties and a new surety, does not make it a new undertaking within Code Civ. Proc. § 978a, fixing the time for filing undertakings on appeals.

4. Justices of the Peace 🔑159(9)—Appeal Bond—Stay of Execution.

An undertaking for a stay of execution of a justice's judgment, though written in the same document as the undertaking for appeal, is a separate undertaking, and the inclusion thereof in the second undertaking filed with justification of new sureties does not make the undertaking on appeal a new undertaking nor does its insufficiency to stay execution because of erroneous recitals affect the validity of the undertaking on appeal.

5. Justices of the Peace 🔑163 — Undertaking to Stay Execution—Recitals as to Judgment — Recovery of Personal Property.

An undertaking to stay execution of a justice's judgment for the recovery of possession of personal property with an alternative recovery of money, which refers to the judgment as an ordinary money judgment, is insufficient to stay the execution unde Code Civ. Proc. § 978.

6. Justices of the Peace 🔑159(9)—Appeal Bond—Sureties—Variance in Name.

The fact that, in the second undertaking on appeal from a justice's judgment with justification of sureties, one surety was referred to in the body and on the justice's docket by his initials, though he signed and justified by his full name, does not invalidate the undertaking since the record sufficiently establishes the fact that the justification shown by the docket, was by the same sureties who signed the undertaking.

7. Justices of the Peace 🔑159(6)—Appeal Bond — Justification of Sureties — Absence of Appellee.

Where the adverse party was notified of the justification of sureties on an undertaking on appeal from a justice of the peace, his failure to be present did not affect the justification, but merely waived his right to require further justification by the sureties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 555; Dec. Dig. 🔑159(6).]

Application for mandamus by C. H. Clay and others, copartners, doing business under the name of Sterling Laundry, against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and J. W. Curtis, Judge. Peremptory writ issued.

W. J. Hittson and John S. Cooper, both of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Albert G. Payne, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. On prayer of the petitioners an alternative writ of mandamus was issued requiring the superior court to make an order vacating an order dismissing an appeal from a justice's court, in an action to recover possession of certain personal property, and to proceed with the trial of that case, or to show cause why the same has not been done. Return having been duly made by the respondent, we are now required to determine whether the superior court was authorized to dismiss said appeal.

The petitioners were defendants in an action in the justice's court of Los Angeles township, in the county of Los Angeles, wherein Anna Lange was plaintiff. On June 23, 1916, the case came on for trial in that court, resulting in a judgment rendered on June 26, 1916, in favor of the plaintiff for possession of the described personal property, or $199.15, the value thereof, and $8.90 costs. On July 3, 1916, the defendants filed a notice of appeal and an undertaking, the sureties whereon were John J. Hutchinson and Wm. E. Shaw. On July 6th, the plaintiff duly served and filed an exception to the sufficiency of the sureties, and thereafter the defendants filed and served notice of justification of sureties to be had on July 10th. The docket of the justice shows, under date July 10th: "Sureties sworn, J. J. Hutchinson, W. G. McGehee; submitted." Also, that on July 25th the sureties were approved and the papers in the case transmitted to the clerk of the superior court. The transmitted papers include the undertaking which was filed in the justice's court on July 3d, and also an undertaking filed in the justice's court on July 10th; the sureties on this undertaking being John J. Hutchinson and W. B. McGehee.

[1] The recitals of the new undertaking refer to the judgment as having been given and entered on the 28th day of June, 1916, instead of June 26th; but this is an immaterial variance. The notice of appeal was correct, and the undertaking was given in aid of that appeal. Judd v. Superior Court, 29 Cal. App. 671, 157 Pac. 566.

On August 7, 1916, in response to a motion made by the plaintiff therein, the superior court dismissed the appeal. The grounds of the motion were that John J. Hutchinson and Wm. E. Shaw, the sureties named in the undertaking filed July 3d, "failed and neglected to qualify thereon"; also, "that afterwards, to wit, on the 10th day of July, 1916, the defendants filed their bond and undertaking on appeal in said action with the justice's court, but failed to serve or file any notice upon plaintiff, or appealing from said judgment rendered in the justice's court on the 26th day of June, 1916, other than the notice filed and served June 28, 1916"; that by reason of said facts the superior court acquired no jurisdiction of said cause.

Respondent contends that the superior court did not acquire jurisdiction of the case on appeal for the following reasons: (1) That the undertaking was not filed until seven days had elapsed after the filing of the notice of appeal, and that the document filed on July 10th was a new and different undertaking from the undertaking to which exceptions were filed. (2) That the second undertaking in the body thereof purports to be made by J. J. Hutchinson and W. B. McGehee, but is signed by John J. Hutchinson and W. B. McGehee, and that on account of such variance John J. Hutchinson was not in any manner obligated thereon; that the record does not show justification by John J. Hutchinson. (3) That neither the record nor papers on file show that the plaintiff or her attorney were present and participated in the attempted qualification of sureties on the undertaking filed July 10th.

[2] It is our opinion that all of these contentions of the respondent are without merit. Section 978a, Code of Civil Procedure, refers to undertakings on appeals from justices' courts and is as follows:

> "The undertaking on appeal must be filed within five days after the filing of the notice of appeal and notice of the filing of the undertaking must be given to the respondent. The adverse party may except to the sufficiency of the sureties within five days after the filing of the undertaking, and unless they or other sureties justify before the justice or judge within five days thereafter, upon notice to the adverse party, to the amounts stated in their affidavits, the appeal must be regarded as if no * * * undertaking had been given."

It is entirely clear that where other sureties justify in place of the original sureties, and such justification takes place within five days after the filing of exceptions to the sufficiency of the sureties named in the undertaking, the substitution of new sureties and their justification is within due time, even though it be more than five days after filing the notice of appeal. The time limited is exactly the same as if the justification were by the sureties originally named. Budd v. Superior Court, 14 Cal. App. 256, 111 Pac. 628. The decisions cited by respondent's counsel do not support his contention. Bennett v. Superior Court, 113 Cal. 440, 45 Pac. 808; Wood v. Superior Court, 67 Cal. 115, 7 Pac. 200; Martha Washington Council No. 2 v. Superior Court, 29 Cal. App. 45, 154 Pac. 298; Keefe v. Superior Court, 23 Cal. App. 750, 139 Pac. 899. So far as these cases bear upon the question at all, they are merely to the effect that where exceptions have been taken to the sufficiency of the sureties, and where, instead of causing the sureties or others in their places to justify after notice, appellant merely files a second undertaking without giving notice of justification of sureties, and the time limited has elapsed without justification of sureties, no jurisdiction is acquired of such appeal. But, on the other hand, if the sureties do justify, even though they may be new sureties substituted in place of those first named, it is sufficient. Judd v. Superior Court, 29 Cal. App. 671, 157 Pac. 566.

[3-5] The fact that the undertaking was rewritten and signed a second time by John J. Hutchinson, together with the new surety, does not make the document a new and different undertaking within the meaning of the terms of section 978a, Code of Civil Procedure, or deprive the appeal of its intended effect, which was to preserve the jurisdiction of the superior court to entertain such appeal. As a bond for costs on appeal, the two papers are identical; there is merely a substituted surety, who duly justified. It is true that each of the two documents contains an additional agreement intended to serve as an undertaking to stay execution on the judgment pending the appeal, and that they differ from each other both in the recited statement of amount of the judgment and in the penal sum wherein the sureties were to be bound. We think, however, that, although contained in the same document, an undertaking to stay execution is a separate and different agreement from the undertaking for costs, which is the undertaking necessary to support the appellate jurisdiction. Where the undertaking is sufficient to constitute a bond on appeal, jurisdiction of the appeal is sustained thereby, even though the undertaking be not sufficient for the purposes of a stay of execution. Judd v. Superior Court, 29 Cal. App. 671, 157 Pac. 566; Edwards v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 710, 714, 115 Pac. 649. Moreover, both of said documents are so written that in any event they would fail to have any effect as undertakings to stay execution. They refer to the judgment as an ordinary money judgment, instead of describing it as a judgment for the recovery of possession of personal property, with an alternative recovery of money if the property cannot be delivered to plaintiff; and neither of them purports to make the sureties responsible under the conditions prescribed for an undertaking to stay execution upon a judgment for the recovery of specific personal property. Code Civ. Proc. § 978.

[6] The fact that in the second undertaking, in the body thereof, the surety Hutchinson is named only as J. J. Hutchinson, whereas his signature and affidavit are in the name of John J. Hutchinson, does not, in our opinion, constitute a defect impairing the sufficiency of the undertaking. The same is true of the fact that the justice's docket shows justification by J. J. Hutchinson instead of stating that it was by John J. Hutchinson. The affidavit to the undertaking was made by John J. Hutchinson and in the first instance constitutes the surety's justification upon the undertaking, subject only to the right of the plaintiff's attorney to further examine him at the time set for justification of sureties. We consider the record to be sufficient to establish the fact that the justification shown by the justice's docket under date of July 10th was by the same sureties who signed the undertaking as settled and determined on that day.

[7] Since the appellant's sureties were present to justify on July 10th and the plaintiff's attorney had been duly notified of the time and place for such justification, it is of no consequence that the plaintiff's attorney was not then and there present, if in fact he was not present. The only effect of his absence under such circumstances would be that he thereby waived further justification of the sureties and would no longer be entitled to object to their sufficiency. Fletcher Collection Agency v. Superior Court, 159 Pac. 1049, decided August 1, 1916; W. P. Jeffries Co. v. Superior Court, 13 Cal. App. 193, 109 Pac. 147.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ issue, commanding that the court below vacate its order dismissing the appeal and restore the case to its calendar.

BROWNELL v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2192.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷390—UNDERTAKING—AMENDMENT — "INSUFFICIENCY OF UNDERTAKING."

Although the amendment of an undertaking on appeal may be allowed by the superior court on account of the insufficiency thereof, as "insufficiency of the undertaking" indicates a distinction between an undertaking which does not comply with the statute and the entire absence of an undertaking, where an undertaking was so defective that it did not identify the appeal which it was intended to support, it constituted no undertaking, and the superior court could not authorize its amendment and is wholly without jurisdiction in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2077–2088; Dec. Dig. ⚷390.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Insufficiency of Undertaking.]

Certiorari by Charles H. Brownell, as administrator of the estate of Hanson A. R. Brownell, deceased, against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of San Bernardino, and H. T. Dewhirst, Judge. Orders of the Superior Court granting leave to amend an undertaking denying petitioner's motion for dismissal of the appeal annulled.

William Guthrie, of San Bernardino, for petitioner. T. A. Williams, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Certiorari. The petitioner was plaintiff in an action against Bendigo Mines Company, a corporation, in the justice's court of San Bernardino township, county of San Bernardino. After judgment in that court in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant gave notice of appeal to the superior court of that county. On the same day that defendant filed in the said justice's court an undertaking entitled the same as the title of the action from which the appeal was taken, but which did not describe any judgment of that justice's court or refer to any appeal to the superior court of San Bernardino county. The references to a judgment were as follows:

> "Whereas, in an action in the justice's court of Los Angeles township, county of Los Angeles, and state of California, judgment was, on the 27th day of June, 1916, given and entered in said justice court, in favor of Charles H. Brownell, administrator of Hanson A. R. Brownell, deceased, and against Bendigo Mines Company; * * * and, whereas the said Bendigo Mines Company is dissatisfied with said judgment and desirous of appealing therefrom to the superior court of the county of Los Angeles: Now, therefore," etc.

All further references are to the "said appeal" and to the "said judgment" and to the "said superior court."

After the papers filed in the justice's court had been transmitted to the superior court of San Bernardino county, the plaintiff moved for a dismissal of the appeal upon the ground that no undertaking had been filed, or money deposited in lieu thereof at any time after the filing of the notice of appeal from the judgment, and that the superior court was without jurisdiction over the action. When said motion was presented, the superior court permitted the defendant to withdraw said undertaking from the files and have it amended by substituting, for the words "Los Angeles township," the words "San Bernardino township"; and for "county of Los Angeles," the words "county of San Bernardino"; and for the words "superior court of the county of Los Angeles," the words "superior court of the county of San Bernardino"—all of which was done upon the original document, with memoranda placed in the margin signifying consent to such amendments by the surety company through its authorized officers. This having been done, the motion to dismiss the appeal was denied, and the respondent superior court intends to proceed to trial and judgment in the action. Section 954 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for the substitution of a new undertaking on appeal where the undertaking first filed was insufficient. That section apparently refers only to appeals to the Supreme Court or District Courts of Appeal, and our attention has not been directed to any provision which would make it applicable to appeals from justices' courts. But it has been held that in such cases it is an authorized practice for the superior court to allow the amendment of an undertaking on appeal on account of the insufficiency thereof in like instances where such relief would be granted on an appeal to the supreme court. Cohen v. Connick, 26 Cal. App. 491, 147 Pac. 479.

The case now before us, however, is not one wherein such relief may be granted. The use of the phrase "insufficiency of the undertaking" indicates a distinction between an undertaking which does not fully comply with the requirements of the statute and the entire absence of an undertaking. Where the undertaking is so defective as not to constitute any obligation upon the sureties therein, it is in reality no undertaking at all. Several times it has been decided by the Supreme Court that the recitals in an undertaking on appeal must identify the appeal which it is intended to support and that, if they fail to do so, the error is incurable. Little v. Thatcher, 151 Cal. 558, 91 Pac. 321, and cases there mentioned. Such is the case at bar. The undertaking wholly fails to identify the appeal which it may have been intended to support. Therefore the superior court could not authorize the amendment and is wholly without jurisdiction in the case.

The orders of the superior court granting leave to amend said undertaking and denying petitioner's motion for dismissal of the appeal are annulled.

Petition for writ of review by D. B. Brians against the Superior Court of County of Sonoma and Thomas C. Denny, Judge. Writ denied.

L. E. Fulwider, of Santa Rosa, for petitioner. A. M. Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. A writ is sought by plaintiff to review the action of the defendant in a certain action wherein C. D. Johnson is plaintiff and D. B. Brians is defendant.

It appears from the petition that on April 1, 1914, said C. D. Johnson commenced an action against said D. B. Brians in the justice's court of Redwood township, Sonoma county, by filing a complaint therein; that defendant, Brians, entered his appearance in said action in said court, and an issue of fact was thereby presented; that on May 5, 1916, said action was called for trial in said justice's court, the plaintiff, Johnson, and the defendant, Brians, each being represented by attorney; that the original complaint in said cause was not then on file in said court, but was lost, which fact was then, and had been prior thereto, known to said Johnson's attorney; that on said day, May 5th, the said action was called for trial, no complaint being then on file in said court; that defendant, Brians, objected to the introduction of any evidence on the ground that there was no complaint on file, and over defendant's (Brians') objection, the cause was tried, and thereafter, to wit, on June 3, 1916, the said justice's court gave judgment for Brians, the defendant therein; that thereafter the said Johnson "took an appeal from said justice's court judgment to the superior court of Sonoma county, the defendants herein"; that on October 6, 1916, the said Johnson moved the superior court "for an order authorizing a copy of the original complaint in said action to be filed and used and served as the complaint in said action on the ground that the original complaint in said action had been and is lost"; that Brians, defendant in said action, objected to and resisted said motion, and on the 6th day of October, 1916, said court made an order granting said motion of said Johnson; that in making said order the court exceeded its jurisdiction; that there is no appeal from said order, and petitioner has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. Petitioner prays that said order be decreed to be in excess of the jurisdiction of the defendant court.

It appears from the return to the alternative writ that the cause of Johnson v. Brians came on regularly for trial on October 6, 1916, both parties represented by attorney; that plaintiff's attorney made a motion for an order permitting plaintiff "to file a copy of the original complaint to take the place of said original complaint, the same having been lost, whereupon comes now the court and orders that said motion be submitted." It further appears from what we take to be a copy of the clerk's minutes in the action as follows:

> "On said motion L. E. Fulwider [attorney for Brians] was sworn and testified on behalf of defendant, and opposed the said motion. C. D. Johnson was sworn, and testified on behalf of plaintiff, and a note and notice of sale were offered, received in evidence, and marked Plaintiff's Exhibits A and B. William F. Carr and W. F. Olney were sworn, and testified on behalf of plaintiff, whereupon plaintiff rests. Defendant not offering any evidence herein, comes now the court and orders that this cause be, and the same is hereby, submitted."

Then follows a copy of what is entitled "Findings and Judgment" in the case, signed by the judge of date October 6, 1916. It is recited therein:

> "This cause came on regularly for trial on October 6, 1916, on appeal from the justice's court of Redwood township, Sonoma county, on questions of both law and fact, both parties being present and represented by counsel, A. M. Johnson, Esq., appearing for plaintiff and L. E Fulwider, Esq., appearing for defendant."

The execution and delivery of the promissory note, the subject of the action, its assignment to plaintiff, partial payments, and the amount due are found and judgment entered for $30.65, the balance due.

The point relied upon by petitioner is that, the complaint having been lost before the trial in the justice's court, and no copy having been submitted in that court, the superior court was without jurisdiction to proceed after objection made by defendant.

[1] The argument is thus presented: An action is commenced in a justice's court by filing a complaint (Code of Civil Procedure, § 839); and such complaint must be in writing (Id. § 851); that a complaint or substituted copy must always be on file unless its absence is waived; and, that there can be no judgment without pleadings, original or substituted "and the allegations thereof must be sufficient to sustain the proof" (citing Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 241, 24 Pac. 114). The rule stated in the case cited is that a defense which is not pleaded cannot be considered, although shown by the evidence; for the rule as to curing defects by litigating a matter without objection applies only where the pleading is defective, and not where there is a total absence of averment. Hence it is claimed that the justice's court could not enter judgment in the absence of a complaint, original or substituted, and over defendant's objection.

The petition fails to show the ground on which petitioner "objected to and resisted said motion" made in the superior court to substitute a copy for the original complaint. All that appears in the minutes of the trial in the superior court is that "on said motion L. E. Fulwider was sworn and testified on behalf of defendant, and opposed said motion." The testimony of defendant's attorney is in the return, and relates only to what occurred in the justice's court. It appears from the return that, after the motion was granted and the substituted complaint presented and filed, the cause was tried upon its merits, the "findings and judgment" reciting that plaintiff was represented by attorney and defendant also represented by attorney. The only objection made by defendant's attorney was to the motion, and after the court ruled thereon defendant's attorney continued to appear for defendant at the trial on the merits, making no objection to the jurisdiction of the court.

Where the appeal from a justice's court is upon questions of law and fact, and the defendant seasonably challenges the jurisdiction of the court to try the action upon its merits, by reason of the want of jurisdiction of the justice's court over the subject-matter of the action appearing upon the face of the record, such defendant is entitled to an order dismissing the action for want of jurisdiction to try it upon its merits. Bates v. Ferrier, 19 Cal. App. 79, 124 Pac. 889; Bartnett v. Hull, 19 Cal. App. 91, 124 Pac. 885, and cases cited.

If the appeal is taken "on questions of both law and fact," the "action must be tried anew in the superior court" (Code Civ. Proc. § 976); and the justice is required to transfer to the superior court certified copies of his docket and all the pleadings and papers, etc., filed in the cause (Code Civ. Proc. § 977).

> "On such appeal," said the Supreme Court in Maxson & Harris v. Superior Court of Madera County, 124 Cal. 468, 57 Pac. 379, "therefore, the entire cause is transferred to the superior court, and thereafter the latter court has exclusive jurisdiction and its judgment is final."

It was said in Bullard v. McArdle, 98 Cal. 355, 359, 33 Pac. 193, 194 (35 Am. St. Rep. 176):

> "When the effect of an appeal is to transfer the entire record to the appellate court, and to cause the action to be retried in that court as if originally brought therein, as is the case when appeals are taken from a justice's court upon questions of law and fact, the judgment appealed from is completely annulled, and is not thereafter available for any purpose."

Had petitioner seasonably challenged the jurisdiction of the superior court to try the action on its merits by reason of the want of jurisdiction of the justice's court over the subject-matter of the action appearing upon the face of the record, he might have brought the matter within the rule in Bartnett v. Hull and Bates v. Ferrier, supra. His objection went only to the motion to substitute a copy for the original lost complaint. He made no objection to the trial of the case on its merits, and, as the superior court had undoubted jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action, and also had jurisdiction to order the lost complaint to be supplied (Code Civ. Proc. § 1045), the alleged illegal proceedings in the justice's court complained of were not available to petitioner.

In De Jarnett v. Marquez, 132 Cal. 700, 64 Pac. 1090, the appeal was from a judgment in a justice's court taken on questions of both law and fact. It was claimed that the superior court was without jurisdiction to try the case for the reason that the justice's court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and hence the superior court had no jurisdiction. At the trial of the case in the superior court on its merits defendant made no complaint of lack of jurisdiction in the superior court. It was held that, the court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action and of the person, and the parties having gone to trial upon the merits without objection to the jurisdiction of the court, the judgment was not void. In Nolan v. Hentig, 138 Cal. 281, 71 Pac. 440, it was urged that the justice's court had no jurisdiction. The court said:

> "The cause was appealed to and heard de novo in the superior court, without objection to the jurisdiction. The judgment cannot now be questioned"—citing De Jarnatt v. Marquez, supra.

[2] The writ must be denied on a further ground. It is admitted that a complaint was filed in the justice's court, and that court therefore had jurisdiction. This jurisdiction was not lost by the disappearance of the original complaint. A copy should have been substituted in the justice's court, but the trial had without it was an irregularity, and cannot be said to have been without jurisdiction. The missing paper, as we have seen, was authoritatively supplied in the superior court, and the cause was there tried on its merits without objection by defendant. The judgment cannot now be questioned.

The writ is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Jack Murnahan was convicted of lewd and lascivious conduct with a child of the age of ten years, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Grover C. Julian, of Susanville, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from the judgment of conviction on three separate counts for lewd and lascivious conduct with a child of the age of ten years.

[1] We find no merit whatever in the appeal. The evidence is ample to support the verdict. It is true it consists largely of the testimony of the girl herself, but we discover therein nothing incredible or improbable. We do not know of any legal objection to the action of the jury in accepting and basing their verdict upon the child's recital of the despicable treatment of her by appellant. We forbear to quote her statements as their publication would serve no useful purpose.

[2] The people were not required to make an election. In fact, the information charged that three different offenses were committed at different times on the same day and the evidence supported the averments. The course pursued was justified by section 954 of the Penal Code as amended in 1915, providing that:

> "The indictment or information may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission * * * or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, under separate counts. * * * The prosecution is not required to elect between the different offenses or counts set forth in the indictment or information, but the defendant may be convicted of any number of the offenses charged, and each offense upon which the defendant is convicted must be stated in the verdict."

The election of which appellant speaks is required when one act is charged and evidence is admitted of two or more similar offenses. There was no occasion here for the invocation of such principle.

[3] There was no error in the refusal of the court to strike out the testimony of the girl that "I can't remember whether he gave me candy or gum." She was attempting to relate all that occurred between her and appellant at the time of the commission of one of the offenses. Any donation by him would certainly be a significant circumstance tending to indicate appellant's ulterior purpose. The case of People v. Mathews, 139 Cal. 527, 73 Pac. 416, is entirely different. Therein the defendant was not permitted to show that he made gifts to his victim. The decision was really based upon the ground that it was not proper cross-examination. It was also undoubtedly open to the objection of self-serving acts and declarations.

[4] The only other point made by appellant not suggested by the foregoing consideration is that the court erred in modifying an instruction proposed by defendant. The modification consisted in striking out the following:

> "The defendant has offered himself as a witness and has given testimony in this case, and the jury are instructed that he is competent to testify as a witness, and in considering his testimony you should be governed by the same rules that control you in weighing the testimony of other witnesses who have given testimony before you in this trial."

But it is entirely manifest that this was covered by the following instruction given by the court:

> "The interest of a defendant in the result of an action does not deprive him of the benefit of his own testimony. The law makes him a competent witness in his own behalf, and his testimony is entitled to full and fair consideration by you the same as that of any other witness. He is considered innocent until the prosecution establishes the contrary by convincing proof and beyond a reasonable doubt. His evidence is entitled to full credit when you believe that he has spoken the truth, and the evidence of such witness is sufficient proof of any fact to which you believe he has truthfully testified."

There were other instructions to the same effect. Indeed, the jury were fully and correctly instructed as to every phase of the case, and there is no doubt the defendant had a fair and impartial trial.

We perceive no error and the judgment is affirmed.

PIPER v. KELLERMAN. (Civ. 1585.)

1. EVIDENCE 🔑439—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITING—NOVATION.

Although testimony is admissible to show that the execution of a written instrument was intended to constitute a novation and extinguish a prior written instrument, such agreement must be consistent with the terms of the writing, and where defendant contracted in writing to convey to plaintiff his interest in lease of oil properties, parol evidence that a written option subsequently given to defendant by plaintiff to repurchase such interest which did not in terms purport to cancel the contract, was inconsistent and not admissible, since if the contract was canceled, plaintiff had nothing upon which to give defendant an option to purchase.

2. NOVATION 🔑12—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action seeking to enforce a written contract for the conveyance of defendant's interests in oil properties, evidence held insufficient to show a parol agreement that a written option given defendant to repurchase the interests was intended as a novation of rights and liabilities under the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Novation, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. 🔑12.]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1177(8)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE.

In an action seeking the enforcement of a written contract to convey defendant's interest in a lease of oil properties, where an allegation of the answer that defendant on a certain day had canceled the contract in accordance with its terms was supported by sufficient evidence, and a finding supporting the defense would have reduced the amount due, but the trial court made no finding upon the averment, the appellate court will not order the judgment modified, which would amount to making a finding for the lower court, but will reverse it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. A. Richards, Judge.

Action by T. A. Piper against J. M. Kellerman. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, and C. W. Davison, of San Jose, for appellant. N. E. Wretman and B. A. Herrington, both of San Jose, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought to enforce a certain contract made between plaintiff and defendant on April 22, 1912. The prayer was for a judgment ordering the defendant to execute to plaintiff an undivided one-half interest in a certain lease from the T. A. P. Oil Company and for $1,250, in money, together with general relief. An answer and counterclaim were filed, whereby defendant asked judgment for $1,187.85 and interest, and for a restraining order enjoining plaintiff from prosecuting certain actions against defendant. The counterclaim was upon an assigned account of one N. E. Wretman. At the time of the making of said contract of April 22d, defendant was the owner of a certain lease from the T. A. P. Oil Company, a corporation, and a contract with the Suburban Oil Company, a corporation, whereby respondent was to take a lease on certain property theretofore leased to said company. At the same time appellant was the owner of certain leases upon properties situated near those covered by said lease and contract of respondent. For the purpose of combining their respective interests, appellant and respondent entered into said contract of April 22, 1912, whereby the former agreed to cause to be assigned to the latter an undivided one-half interest in his said leases, and respondent made a similar agreement in favor of appellant as to said lease from the T. A. P. Oil Company, and agreed also that any profits or benefits which he might derive from the contract between himself and said Suburban Oil Company should be equally divided between appellant and respondent. The contract further provided that respondent should pay all rents due, or to become due on said leases theretofore owned by appellant, and that any other property leased by Piper in the neighborhood of the other lands should be held and operated for the benefit of both; furthermore, that respondent should pay to appellant a salary of $250 per month from the date of the contract, and that appellant should operate all of the property under the supervision of respondent. There was also a provision that respondent might cancel the contract at any time. On October 17th the parties met at the office of J. N. Turner in San Francisco and executed an instrument in writing, providing that:

> "The party of the first part (T. A. Piper) hereby gives to J. M. Kellerman an option to purchase all his right, title and interest in and to all said first party's interest in that contract entered into by and between the Suburban Oil Company, a corporation, party of the first part, and J. M. Kellerman, party of the second part, on the 19th day of April, 1912, wherein said Suburban Oil Company gave said J. M. Kellerman a contract of lease on the following leased lands together with personal property thereon. * * * Said party also gives said second party an option to purchase all of said second (first?) party's right, title and interest in that lease executed by the T. A. P. Oil Company * * * to J. M. Kellerman of April 20, 1912, wherein said T. A. P. Oil Company leased to said J. M. Kellerman those certain leased lands, together with all machinery and personal property thereon situate near Los Gatos. * * *
> "It is understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that in the event that the said Kellerman discovers oil in paying quantities in any well on any part of the property known as the T. A. P. Oil Company's property, he will pay to said T. A. Piper the sum of $1,000 immediately upon the well becoming a commercial well.
> "It is understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that in the event that the said Kellerman discovers oil in paying quantities in any well on any part of the property known as the Suburban Oil Company's property, he will pay said T. A. Piper the sum of $1,000 immediately upon the well becoming a commercial well.
> "It is understood and agreed that in the event that said Kellerman fails to exercise this option and does not make the payments in accordance with the terms of this agreement hereinabove mentioned at the time said well or wells are brought in, that is to say, should he make the payment as provided for when a well is brought in on the T. A. P. Company's property and fail to pay the $1,000 as provided for when a well is brought in on the Suburban Company's property, or vice versa, then the option shall be null and void as to the property that he has brought in a well on and fails to pay said first party the $1,000 as herein provided."

In the foregoing we have set out all of said agreement except the formal part and the specific description of the property covered by said leases and said contract. At the same time that this option was given, a lease was executed by J. N. Turner to J. M. Kellerman, covering nearly all the property still standing in the name of Turner and owned by appellant prior to April 22, 1912. This lease, however, was canceled by mutual consent on June 23, 1913, and seems to be of no importance here.

As to the transaction of said date, the court found:

> "That on the 17th day of October, 1912, the plaintiff and defendant entered into new arrangements under and by the terms and conditions of which the property described in the leases standing in the name of J. N. Turner were leased to the defendant on different terms and conditions than those provided for in contract of April 22, 1912, and as part of said arrangements, the said plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement in writing which was duly made, executed and delivered and based upon good and sufficient considerations, moving from defendant to plaintiff, under the terms of which the said plaintiff gave to said defendant an option to purchase any and all right, title and interest, which plaintiff had or possessed in or to the said T. A. P. Oil Company lease, for the sum of $1,000, after a commercial well should be produced on any of the properties mentioned in said lease. That no commercial well has as yet been produced or developed on any of the said properties mentioned in said lease of the T. A. P. Oil Company to defendant. That said agreement and option is still in full force and effect. That on said October 17, 1912, and as a part of said new arrangements, the said agreement of April 22, 1912, was by mutual consent between the plaintiff and the defendant, and upon good and sufficient consideration, moving from the defendant to the plaintiff, terminated and ended, and the parties thereto released from all of the terms and conditions thereof, and that said agreement of April 22, 1912, has never been revived, and ever since October 17, 1912, said agreement of April 22, 1912, has been and is now entirely terminated, canceled, annulled and ended."

Of course, it is manifest that no language is used in the option of October 17th which expressly cancels the contract of April 22d. Upon the basis of respondent's contention, it is somewhat singular "that an attorney drawing a document for the purpose of terminating existing business arrangements and substituting wholly different matters therefor, should neglect entirely to say a single word upon the subject of canceling the former contract." And, as further suggested by appellant, there is nothing in the option which refers in any way to the contract of April 22d. This, if unexplained, is a remarkable circumstance if it was the intention that the former contract should be "terminated, canceled, annulled and ended." It is also plain that there is no inconsistency between said contract and the option which would prevent them from both existing at the same time. Another circumstance of some importance is that the option does not deal with all the subjects embraced in the contract of April 22d. But probably a stronger reason than any other for contending that said option of October 17th cannot operate as a cancellation and extinguishment of the contract of April 22d is found in the following recital by appellant: Before the contract of April 22d was executed, Piper had no interest in any of the leases held by the T. A. P. and Suburban Companies, and "it was only by that contract that he ever acquired any interest in such property. If that contract which gave him his interest was canceled, then he had nothing upon which to give Kellerman an option to purchase." This result would seem to reduce the option to mere waste paper. The effect of a total annulment of the former contract would be, naturally, to restore the parties to their condition prior to the execution of said agreement.

It is, at least, clear that we can find in the terms of the option itself no evidence of a purpose to substitute the new obligation for the old "with intent to extinguish the old obligation." Civ. Code, § 1531, subd. 1.

But parol evidence of such purpose was received by the court over the objection of appellant, and that involves a very important question in the case.

Respondent testified as to a conversation with appellant in which it was agreed that they would enter into another agreement, and—

> "that was what brought up the argument about making a contract, and we discussed that at times before I went to Mr. Wretman the first time. We sat on a pile of casing at the Suburban well and I said: 'Mr. Piper, I have expended much more money than we figured on, and I am ready now to enter into that other agreement.' 'Well,' he says, 'all right.' * * * On Tuesday I went to Mr. Turner's office, and we threshed over several propositions, and Wednesday we did the same. Thursday morning I made this proposition to them, that we would change the Turner lease, which was a contract between Turner and I, belongs to Piper and I—they signed many of these leases later on. 'Now, boys, wouldn't it be a better proposition if we changed the sublease of this property for a one-sixth royalty'—and we were paying a one-tenth to the landowners as Piper's lease called for, and they thought it over, and then we went into the whole matter and I had explained the whole thing the way I framed it in mind, that we would cancel the old contract of April—that is what I meant about in my mind at night. I made this memorandum of what I would like to do. * * * Well, they agreed to it, the Turner lease was made, and the option to me was drawn and executed. * * * Mr. Piper and I had agreed that we would sublease for a one-sixth royalty. * * * And then we agreed that Mr. Turner would make a straight lease to me for 3½, and that Mr. Piper—it would give it to Mr. Turner, but it was really Piper's—that would make him 3⅓; we agreed in lieu of the 2⅔ that we would just cancel the whole thing, the salary and all, and I would agree to give him $1,000 if I got a commercial well on either property, and then that ended it. * * * I mean to give the impression that it was understood at that time that the old contract was canceled; Mr. Turner used words something to the effect that the old contract might be of some use in the event that I failed to pay the $1,000 within a certain time after oil had been found in commercial quantities. * * * From the time Piper went to work, I paid him $250 a month until he quit; I paid him just any place I happened to meet him, except the last check that I gave him on the 17th of October, 1912, in San Francisco, in his office, that is the time we made this contract. * * * I made the remark to Piper when we had decided on everything, making this objection that his salary quit then and there, and I says to Mr. Piper, I said, 'You have so many days coming,' which made it five days less than a month, and I said, 'Tom, I have a check made out here for $250, so we will just let it go at a month up to the 27th'; he took the check; that was the last payment I ever made."

[1] The question as to novation is one of intention, and the general rule is that any competent testimony tending to show the understanding of the parties is admissible. 29 Cyc. 1139. But was parol evidence competent in this particular case?

In support of the negative, appellant quotes section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing when an agreement reduced to writing is "deemed the whole," and it is claimed that the section applies to the present instance since "no mistake or imperfection of the option was put in issue and the validity of the instrument is not in dispute nor is there any extrinsic ambiguity to explain nor any fraud alleged." Furthermore, quotation is made of section 1860 of said Code as authority for the declaration that the judge is to interpret the language of the parties, and that evidence of the surrounding circumstances is admissible only for the purpose of construction of its provisions, and it is contended that this section "does not permit evidence to be given (particularly in the absence of pleadings on the subject) of other conditions and further terms and additional understandings, about which the written contract is wholly silent." In this connection it is insisted that the rule is properly stated in 17 Cyc. 669, as follows:

> "The conversations and statements of the parties at the time of or just previous to the execution of the contract between them may be admissible for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the writing; but oral declarations of the parties made at or before the time of the execution of the instrument are not admissible for the purpose of showing an intention or purpose not therein expressed."

The last above statement of the rule is rather too sweeping, as will be discovered by an examination of the cases cited in support of the text. Indeed, there are many instances wherein oral declarations are admissible for the purpose of showing an intention or purpose not expressed in the written instrument. They are collected in the article on Evidence from which said quotation is made. Each instrument must be viewed, of course, in the light of its own peculiar circumstances, and the well-recognized exceptions to the general rule must not be ignored. The terms of an agreement when reduced to writing are deemed to have been completely set forth therein, but it is submitted that this rule of the Code would not necessarily preclude such parol evidence as was admitted herein. In other words, such evidence may sometimes be received without affecting the terms of the written instrument.

if the instrument were shown to express the complete purpose or intention of the parties in reference to the subject-matter, then the inquiry would be at an end. But where the written instrument is not complete, it has been held, as stated in 17 Cyc. 672, that:

> "In order to correctly ascertain the intention of the parties to a deed, contract, or other instrument of writing and properly interpret the same, it is competent to inquire into the purpose for which the writing was executed, and to this end parol evidence is admissible."

It may be proved, of course, by parol that payment of another obligation was intended by the execution of a note or other written instrument, and in a proper case it may be likewise shown that the execution of a written instrument and the creation thereby of different rights and liabilities was intended to constitute a novation and to effect a total extinction of privileges and obligations growing out of a prior written instrument. In many cases such evidence would not vary nor affect the terms of the later instrument. The qualification of the rule, however, in point here is that:

> "In order to let in evidence of a collateral agreement between the parties, such agreement must be consistent with the terms of the writing; and the evidence must not tend to vary or contradict the terms of the written instrument or to defeat its operation." 17 Cyc. 714.

It seems manifest that the case before us is brought clearly within said qualification. The parol agreement contended for, if rendered effectual, would surely defeat the operation of said option.

If the contract of April 22d was completely extinguished, it is difficult to understand how there remained in appellant any interest in and to the property, the option to purchase which was extended to respondent. Appellant having no interest left to convey, respondent certainly could not enforce specific performance of the former's covenant. And appellant having surrendered all interest in the property would be in no position to recover the amount of money promised by respondent, since the consideration therefor had failed. Again, by the agreement of April 22d, as we have seen, appellant acquired an interest in certain real property belonging to respondent and the agreement of October 17th could not operate as a complete cancellation of that instrument for the reason that it does not convey or purport to convey any of said interest from Piper to Kellerman. The later instrument, therefore, by its terms, presents conclusive evidence that it was not intended as a complete extinguishment of the contract of April 22d, and we think that the parol evidence was not admissible. If there had been an attempt to show that it was intended simply to modify the earlier agreement, to discontinue the salary, or to make other modification not inconsistent with the provisions of the later contract, a different question might be presented.

[2] But whether the foregoing be sound or not, there is another view which we think necessitates the conclusion that said finding is not sufficiently supported. From the whole record, it appears that appellant did not agree that said contract of October 17th should annul the former one. Such is a fair inference from the testimony of respondent himself. He does, indeed, speak in general terms as though it were the understanding that the one should be substituted for the other, but it is apparent that he was testifying rather to a conclusion than of a probative fact that would show that such was the understanding and agreement of appellant. He does not relate any statement made by Piper; he does not recite any definite proposition that was submitted by either to the other and acquiesced in that would justify the conclusion that their minds met in the understanding and purpose that the first agreement should be annulled. The nearest approach to any satisfactory showing that such was their intention was his statement:

> "We agreed in lieu of the 2⅔ that we would just cancel the whole thing, the salary and all, and I would agree to give him $1,000, if I got a commercial well on either property, and then that ended it."

But therein he does not state what was said, but he concludes that there was such an agreement. Other statements made by him, however, rebut his inference as to appellant's agreement to the cancellation. For instance, he testified:

> "Well, it looked as though that he [Piper] did not understand about us canceling the contract of April 22d."

Furthermore:

> "In the conversation with Mr. Turner, in the presence of Piper, I asked him to destroy the old contract, that I did not see as he had any use for it, and he made the remark that, 'No, that the thousand dollars might not be paid, and Mr. Piper would have nothing to fall back on,' therefore he thought we better keep the old contracts."

The correspondence also between appellant and respondent is persuasive to the effect that Piper had no intention of canceling the earlier contract. Of course there could not be any novation unless both parties agreed to it.

As to the counterclaim upon which respondent prevailed in the court below, a charge of fraud is made by appellant. It is claimed that a misrepresentation was made by Wretman as to the payment of a certain note for $600 of which Piper was one of the makers. The counterclaim is based upon an account stated, which was dated April 26, 1912. In the stated account was the following paragraph:

> "In connection with the third proposition I hold your note for $728 dated September 15, 1911, interest 7 per cent. payable quarterly and secured by 7,300 shares of Suburban Oil Company stock."

This note was based upon a note for $600 dated January 9, 1909, signed by appellant, Morrison and Arbuckle to N. E. Wretman, which was indorsed on September 16, 1911:

"Paid in full by T. A. Piper, and he is entitled to reimbursement from his comakers. N. E. Wretman."

At the time this note was thus taken up, Mr. Piper gave the other note for $728, and pledged the said 7,300 shares of stock for its payment. Respondent calls attention to the fact that shortly after this note was given, Mr. Piper had an interview with Mr. Morrison, wherein he is told of a supposed settlement by Mr. Morrison and Mr. Arbuckle with Mr. Wretman of the $600 note, and on November 13th, Mr. Piper wrote a letter to Mr. Wretman, in which he said:

"I saw Mr. Morrison the other day, and he is trying to find Mr. Arbuckle in regards to the note in which I settled with you for on the 16th of last September for $600, signed by myself, C. A. Morrison, and F. W. Arbuckle. He stated to me that when he and Arbuckle made the settlement with you that this note was included and supposed to have been canceled."

He then cautions Mr. Wretman not to sell the stock by reason of the nonpayment of interest, and closes by saying:

"I am sorry that I cannot see you before leaving, but will take it up immediately upon my return."

Attention is then directed to the dates of these various transactions as follows: January 9, 1909, $600 note; September 16, 1911, $728 note; November 13, 1911, date of Piper's letter to Wretman; October 1, 1912, date of stated account. It can thus be seen that the stated account was consummated long after appellant was put upon inquiry as to the alleged settlement. He could hardly claim, therefore, that he should be protected in his own recklessness in relying upon respondent's representations that the note had not been paid. Moreover, Mr. Wretman testified:

"I never had a settlement with Mr. Morrison and Mr. Arbuckle in regard to that note. I had a transaction with them in April or May, 1909, whereby if I could sell the property to a client of Mr. Piper, Mr. Broder, that I would then surrender this note and pay them $300 apiece. This transaction was never closed and the stock never called for."

We must accept Mr. Wretman's testimony as reliable, and according to his version of the affair, it amounted simply to an offer of sale which was for the benefit of all the parties. There seems to have been nothing to prevent Mr. Morrison or Mr. Arbuckle from withdrawing their stock or offer to sell when it was not called for or the consideration paid by Mr. Wretman. The offer of cancellation was conditional, and the conditions not having become actualities, the note, as we understand the situation, still remained a valid evidence of indebtedness.

[3] One other feature should be noticed. In one of the defenses to the action it is alleged:

"That on or about the 16th day of November, 1912, this defendant, pursuant to the right and privilege given him in said agreement dated April 22, 1912, terminated, ended and canceled the same; and also on said November 16, 1912, released, dismissed and discharged the said plaintiff from his employ, and since October 17, 1912, the plaintiff has performed no work or service for or in behalf of this defendant."

Said contract provided that:

"It is also understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the second party may cancel this contract at any time."

It is also true that there is evidence ample to support said allegation that the contract was canceled on or about November 16th. However, the court made no finding upon this averment. If it had been found as alleged, the result would have been the same except that the judgment for defendant would be less by $250, the salary for one month.

As the record is presented, though, it hardly seems consonant with the orderly course of established procedure to direct a modification of the judgment, as that would be in effect for us to make a finding for the lower court.

The judgment and order are reversed.

HANKE v. MARTIN. (Civ. 1848.)

1. EVIDENCE ⚷441(4)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITING.

Where a lease was explicit as to the term and rental of the premises, testimony as to an oral understanding between the parties that the lessee need not pay part of the rent stipulated by the lease was inadmissible.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷1047(2)—HARMLESS ERROR—RESERVING RULING ON EVIDENCE.

In an action for rent, the court's failure to make a direct ruling on plaintiff's motion to strike out evidence, as to which its ruling was reserved, was not prejudicial to defendant, where the evidence was inadmissible, and where the court, though not directly deciding the matter involved, in effect did so by its finding and judgment against defendant's contention, but in accord with the terms of the written lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Louis Hanke against Joe Martin. From an order denying defendant's motion for new trial, he appeals. Order affirmed.

M. K. Harris, Thos. F. Lopez, and H. A. Savage, all of Fresno, for appellant. Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial in an action brought to recover the sum of $1,310, alleged by plaintiff to be due and unpaid under the terms of a lease of certain premises. The record shows that upon the trial of the case the lease was introduced in evidence, from which it appeared that the defendant on June 4, 1912, leased two certain tracts of land, containing respectively 125 and 110 acres, from the plaintiff for the term commencing, as to the 125 acres, on the date of the lease, and, as to the 110-acre tract, on the 31st day of December, 1912, and ending as to both tracts on the 31st day of December, 1921, upon the following terms and conditions:

> "The second party shall pay to first party as rental for the above-described premises $1,110 on the 31st day of December, 1912; $750 on the 30th day of June, 1913; $1,310 on the 31st day of December, 1913; and $1,310 on the 30th day of June and 31st day of December of each year thereafter during the life of this lease."

The evidence further showed that the lease was canceled by the written agreement of the parties on June 30, 1914, but in which written agreement the plaintiff expressly reserved the right to insist upon the payment of the rent claimed by him to be due under said lease prior to the date of its cancellation. The undisputed proofs also showed that the defendant had paid to his lessor the sum of $1,110 on December 31, 1912, $750 on June 30, 1913, $1,310 on December 31, 1913, and no more, and that it was the payment of $1,310. claimed to be due on the 30th of June, 1914, according to the terms of the lease, for which this action was brought. The defendant, however, by his pleadings, and also by oral evidence offered at the trial, undertook to assert and prove that prior to and at the time of entering into said lease there was an oral understanding and agreement between the parties thereto that the rent which was reserved in the lease to be paid on December 31, 1912, and each six months thereafter, was to be a payment in advance from said first-named date, and that no rent was to be chargeable or paid for any portion of the year 1912, for the reason that the rent of the premises for the whole of the year had been already received by the owner from prior lessees. When evidence to this effect was presented by the defendant during the trial, the court at first admitted the evidence over the plaintiff's objection, but after its admission reserved its ruling upon a motion made by the plaintiff to strike out all of this evidence relating to such oral understanding upon the ground that it was in contradiction of the terms of the written lease. The court did not thereafter during the trial directly pass upon this matter, but rendered its findings and judgment adversely to the defendant and to his contention as to the existence of such oral understanding. The appellant here contends that the court committed reversible error both by its failure to make a ruling upon the plaintiff's motion in respect to which its decision had been reserved, and also in making its findings and rendering its judgment contrary to the evidence.

[1, 2] While it is true, as the appellant contends, that the practice on the part of trial courts of reserving their rulings upon the admission, rejection, or retention of evidence is one which should be discouraged, and while it is also true that the failure of the trial court to decide a material question in respect to which it has reserved its ruling may, in certain cases, be reversible error, still we are of the opinion that in the case at bar the appellant has not been materially prejudiced by the failure of the trial court to make a direct ruling upon the plaintiff's motion in respect to which its ruling was reserved; and this for two reasons, the first of which is that the lease between the parties was clear and explicit as to the term and rental of the premises in question, and hence that the testimony as to the oral understanding between the parties was inadmissible in the first instance, as amounting to a variance of its terms, and for the further reason that the evidence which was actually before the court as to the existence of such oral agreement was conflicting, and the court, while not directly deciding the matter involved in its reserved ruling, in effect did so by its finding and judgment against the defendant's contention, but in accord with the terms of the written lease.

For these reasons the order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

1. Principal and Agent ⚷107(1) — Authority to Contract for Street Improvement.

Where a party owning part of the land fronting on a street, who wished to have it improved, stated to two other parties owning land thereon, "I will leave it to you boys," he did not thereby constitute the other parties his agents to do anything more than bind him to pay the cost of the improvement of the street in so far as it affected his own property.

2. Contracts ⚷177—Contract for Street Improvements—Liability of Owner.

Where work of improving a street in which three landowners were interested was done under a contract signed by two of the landowners alone, no work being performed after the third signed the contract, the third was not bound for the entire cost of the improvement by the undisclosed intention of the contractors to contract with him as well as the others, the letter embodying the contract being addressed to the first two landowners alone, because the contractors did not know the third's initials, the third's subsequent act in signing the contract being merely a ratification of the acts of the other landowners in so far as they were authorized to act as his agents in binding him to pay his proportion of the cost of the work.

3. CONTRACTS 🔑10(1)—MUTUALITY.

Where a contract for the improvement of a street was embodied in a letter addressed to two owners fronting thereon, which contract they signed, as to a third owner, to whom the letter was not addressed because the contractors did not know his initials, but which he signed after the work was discontinued, the contract, which contractors intended should bind him for the entire cost, was lacking in mutuality, since after its breach such third owner could not in any event have recovered damages from the contractors for their failure to improve the property of the other owners.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by R. G. Tryon and W. C. Brain, copartners doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of Tyron & Brain, against C. N. Clinch, Robert T. See, and W. F. Markham. From a judgment against defendants, Markham appeals. Judgment reversed.

Harlan G. Palmer, of Los Angeles, for appellant. A. J. Sherer and Arthur G. Baker, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. It appears that the defendants owned a tract of land through which they had opened a street, and prior to its dedication for public use they agreed, for their mutual advantage, that it should be improved. The ownership of the land was not joint, but held in severalty, Markham owning approximately two-thirds of the tract, and the remainder being owned jointly by Clinch and See, who entered into negotiations with plaintiffs for doing the work of improving the street known as Morning Gate court, as a result of which the latter caused to be delivered to Clinch and See a letter reading as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., Aug. 12, 1913.

"Messrs. C. N. Clinch & Robt. T. See, 6401 Hollywood Blvd., Hollywood, Cal.—Gentlemen: Confirming our verbal bid of this date, we hereby propose to improve Morning Gate court between Sunset boulevard and Selma avenue in Hollywood for the sum of $1,475.00, payable upon completion of the work. [Then follows a description of the work proposed to be done.]

"If satisfactory to you the signing of this may substitute a good and sufficient contract between us for the said work.

"Yours very truly, Tryon & Brain,
"By W. C. Brain"

—followed by the word "Accepted." On the day of the receipt of this letter Clinch and See attached their signatures thereto and ordered Tryon & Brain to proceed with the work. At this time the defendant Markham was not in California, and did not return to California until the latter part of September. Tryon & Brain proceeded with the work until September 7th, at which time, under instructions from Clinch and See, they discontinued the same, the value of which as performed the court found was the sum of $1,240. Upon Markham's return to California on or about the 24th day of September, he, at the request of Clinch and See, attached his name to the letter, which was then, and after Tryon & Brain had completed the work, delivered to them.

The complaint filed contained two causes of action, the first to recover upon a common count for the value of the labor and work done and materials furnished, and the other a cause of action based upon the alleged contract against the defendants jointly for the sum mentioned therein; it being claimed—and with truth so far as Clinch and See, who suffered default, are concerned—that defendants, without the fault of plaintiffs, prevented the completion of the work. The findings made were in favor of plaintiffs, upon which judgment was entered against the defendants jointly for the full value of the work done, which, including interest, was $1,364, and from which Markham alone appeals.

[1] As to the first cause of action stated, the court in effect found that Markham became indebted to plaintiffs for and on account of the services, work, and labor performed and materials furnished by the plaintiffs to said defendants and each of them at the special instance and request of said defendants and each of them in the sum of $1,475, which they and each of them promised to pay plaintiffs. The only evidence in support of this finding and upon which to base any authority in Clinch and See to have the entire work done at Markham's expense is the fact that he owned part of the land fronting on the street, was interested in and wished to have it improved, and according to See's testimony he, upon leaving for the East, said to Clinch and See: "I will leave it [the improvement of the street] to you boys." A part of the street, however, as we have seen, was owned by "the boys"; and this evidence cannot be construed as sufficient to constitute Clinch and See as Markham's agents to do anything more than bind him to pay the cost of the improvement in so far as it affected his own property. Aside from any question involving the statute of frauds (to answer for the debt of another), the evidence does not purport to authorize Clinch and See to make a contract binding Markham to pay for the improvement of their land.

[2, 3] Upon the second cause of action, wherein plaintiffs sought to recover upon the written contract, the court found, in substance, that while the letter of Tryon & Brain was addressed to Clinch and See alone, with whom their negotiations were had, they intended it for Markham as well; his name being omitted for the reason that they did not know his initals. There is nothing in the letter showing such intention. On the contrary, it clearly appears that, as understood by plaintiffs, the letter, when accepted by Clinch and See, should be a substitute for a "good and sufficient contract between us for the said work." Clearly the pronoun "us," as here used, had reference to the plaintiffs and Clinch and See, with whom only plaintiffs were contracting. As shown by the record, all the work was done under the contract signed by Clinch and See; no work being performed after Markham signed the letter. Markham, under the circumstances, could not be bound for the entire cost of the improvement by the undisclosed intention of Tryon & Brain. Moreover, as to him, the letter considered as a contract is wholly lacking in the essential element of mutuality, since for its breach he could not in any event have recovered damages from plaintiffs for their failure to improve the property of Clinch and See. It appears that some time after the completion of the work recovery of the cost for the whole of which is sought, and on his return from the East Markham signed the letter. In doing so, however, his act cannot be construed other than as a ratification of the acts of Clinch and See in so far as they were authorized to act as his agents in binding him to pay his proportion of the cost of the work. The circumstances and evidence clearly show this to be the fact. Construing the evidence most strongly in favor of plaintiffs it shows only that Clinch and See were authorized by Markham to make a contract for and on his behalf for the improvement of the street so far as it affected his ownership thereof; the agreement between them, as stated by appellant's counsel, being:

> "That Clinch and See would have the street put in, and that Markham was to pay of the entire cost of the construction the proportion which the frontage of his property bore to the frontage of all the property in the tract."

And this, in our opinion, is the extent of plaintiff's right to recover the cost of making the improvement from Markham.

The judgment is reversed.

CONSOLIDATED LUMBER CO. v. FREW et al. (Civ. 2009.)

1. TRIAL 🔑39—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—EXHIBITS.

A record, showing that certain exhibits were introduced in evidence and marked for identification, and that they were subsequently treated as evidence, shows that they were admitted in evidence, not merely offered for identification.

2. SALES 🔑181(1) — DELIVERY — BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where defendant, after considerable negotiations concerning a lumber bill owing by him to plaintiff, gave a note for the amount thereof, that note was an admission that the lumber had been received, which, if not binding on defendant, at least put on him the burden of overcoming the admission by satisfactory evidence.

3. EVIDENCE 🔑441(11)—PAROL EVIDENCE—NOTE—CONSIDERATION.

In an action on a note given for the purchase price of lumber, evidence is inadmissible to show a previous oral agreement by the seller that he would adjust the claim for shortage when defendant was ready to settle the note; there being no claim of fraud or mistake.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by the Consolidated Lumber Company against Will L. Frew and others. From an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Andrew M. Strong, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Frank D. McClure and R. A. Turner, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The action is one to recover judgment for $7,500, with interest, upon a note dated September 30, 1911, made by the defendants in favor of plaintiff's assignor, one E. U. Wheelock. Execution and delivery of the note are admitted, as well as nonpayment thereof. A reduction is claimed on account of a so-called partial failure of consideration, the defendants offering to pay a sum slightly less than $4,000, together with interest thereon from date of the note to date of the commencement of the action. The case was tried to a jury, which returned a verdict for only $6,000, whereas the plaintiff contends for the entire indebtedness shown on the face of the note.

In December, 1910, the Consolidated Lumber Company and the Watts Lumber Company sold and delivered to the defendant American Aeroplane Company lumber which was used in the construction of grand stands, hangars and other structures on certain land known as Dominguez Aviation Field in Los Angeles county. Bills were rendered to the defendant company for such lumber, amounting to 648,710 feet, being the aggregate amount of the deliveries severally claimed to have been made by the lumber companies. The defendant company held a lease on the Dominguez Aviation Field lands whereon the structures above named had been erected The defendant company having failed to make prompt payment for its lumber, claims of lien against that property were filed by the lumber companies. Shortly before the time limited by law for the commencement of actions for the enforcement of such liens, conferences were held between the representatives of the lumber companies and of the Areoplane Company, which resulted in a settlement made for the purpose of preventing foreclosures. Mr. Will L. Frew was a director, and was secretary of the American Aeroplane Company, and seems to have represented that company in its dealings with the lumber companies when the lumber was ordered and delivered, and also in the subsequent settlement. As witness for the defendant company, Mr. Frew stated that Mr. Wheelock, who was representing the lumber companies, made a proposition that if the defendant company would pay 40 per cent. of the face of the claim, he would allow it to stand for a year on the condition that he would hold a transfer of the lease as security, and any time before the expiration of that year the debtor could pay the amount or adjust the amount of the claim, and the lease would be transferred back. This testimony was received subject to all legal objections which might be made to it. There was a stipulation covering such objections, both on general grounds and upon the special ground that such testimony tended to vary, modify, and alter the terms of the written contract between the parties, and that by reason of the acts, declarations, and transactions of the defendants they were estopped from proving, or offering to prove, a shortage of lumber delivered to the defendant company Following upon the negotiations above mentioned, the defendant company did pay 40 per cent. of the claim, and the defendant corporation executed an unconditional transfer of its lease to Wheelock in his own name, but really as trustee for the Consolidated Lumber Company, and the recorded lien claims were canceled. This transfer was made on April 25, 1911. It should be noted that on account of some objections made by Wheelock to the original lease held by the defendant company, a new arrangement was made, by consent of all the parties, with the lessors, whereby the old lease was canceled and a new lease made to the defendant company, which was dated and executed on April 25, 1911, and it was that lease which was on that day assigned by the defendant company to Wheelock. At the same time Wheelock executed to the defendant company a sublease of the property, which sublease recited Wheelock's ownership of the lease and provided that upon payments being made to Wheelock in the aggregate sum of $7,924.39, with interest as specified, on or before November 1, 1911, and further performing the conditions of the lease, Wheelock, in consideration of $1 agreed to assign and sell the buildings, structures and lease to the defendant corporation. It was provided that upon failure of the defendant corporation to make such payments and perform the conditions of the lease, its right to purchase the property and lease should terminate.

In September, 1911, the defendant company desired to have the lease returned, and asked Wheelock upon what condition it could be released. Negotiations followed as a result of which the lease was transferred by Wheelock to the defendant corporation, and that corporation, together with the other defendants in this action, executed to Wheelock two notes. One was for $724.19, which was paid when due; the other was the $7,500 note which is the subject of this action. Subject to like objections as those above stated, Will L. Frew was permitted to testify that at the time of negotiating the above-noted transactions of April 25, 1911, and also in September in connection with the execution of the notes, Frew and Mr. Temple, the president of defendant corporation, made a claim that there had been a shortage in the amount of lumber delivered, and were assured, both in the April and September transactions, that an adjustment would be made on account of any deficiency in the amount of lumber that had been delivered. Frew testified that as early as January, 1911, when Mr. Wheelock had asked Frew and Temple when the bill would be paid, the following occurred:

> "We told him we did not know, and that the bill was larger than we anticipated, more lumber than we looked for, and it was more than we expected to have to pay. We made our estimates from the architect's figures, and had not anticipated nearly that much, and we told him that we were sure that there was an error somewhere in the amount of the lumber delivered."

He said that Wheelock told him in reply that:

> "When you get ready to settle the bill we will look after the adjustment."

The court further permitted the defendants to introduce testimony of sundry witnesses for the purpose of showing that there were deficiencies in the amounts of lumber delivered, such deficiencies corresponding in value to the deduction claimed by the defendants in their answer as an offset to the note. The court having overruled plaintiff's objections to all of this testimony, the plaintiff introduced a considerable amount of evidence for the purpose of showing that all of the lumber was delivered. Also, Wheelock denied all of the statements above noted concerning objections to the account and any promised adjustment thereof.

[1] Counsel for appellants asserts that the testimony as to the alleged shortage of lumber is uncontradicted, and that there is no evidence of any delivery of lumber to the appellants. As to certain exhibits which were duplicates of bills rendered to the defendant company promptly after the time when lumber was delivered, counsel claims that they were never received in evidence. In this he is mistaken. The record shows that the exhibits "were introduced in evidence and marked for identification." This does not correspond with counsel's claim that they were merely produced for identification without being introduced in evidence. Moreover, further progress of the trial clearly shows that these documents were treated as in evidence. It would require a very long statement to develop here the particulars in which the evidence was conflicting.

[2] In view of the transactions occurring between the parties in April, 1911, and in September, 1911, finally culminating in the execution of the note in suit here, the defendants thereby admitted that the lumber was delivered for which this note represents the unpaid balance of the purchase price. If defendants were not thereby estopped to dispute the matter any further, at least the burden would be upon the defendants to overcome that admission by satisfactory evidence that some part of it was not delivered. From our inspection of the evidence, we are not inclined to the opinion that the judge who tried this case misused the discretion vested in him, if insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict was actually the ground which moved him to make the general order which was made granting a new trial of the case.

[3] But we also think the court erred in admitting the testimony introduced for the purpose of showing that the note was given subject to the terms of an oral understanding or agreement that a deduction would be made on account of some quantity of lumber not delivered. Since the defendants were not claiming that the note was obtained by fraud, or that by reason of any mistake the parties failed to understand the terms of the writing signed by them, all testimony offered by the defendants to contradict the terms of the note should have been excluded.

The order granting a new trial of this action is affirmed.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

SILVER LAKE POWER & IRRIGATION CO. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (Civ. 1887.)

1. Eminent Domain 🔑265(5)—Costs—Statute.

Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 1, provides that an action may be dismissed by the plaintiff himself upon written request to the clerk at any time before trial upon the payment of his costs, unless a counterclaim has been set up or affirmative relief sought by cross-complaint or answer. Section 1255a provides that the plaintiff may abandon condemnation proceedings before expiration of 30 days after final judgment by serving on defendant and filing in court a written notice of the abandonment, and that upon such abandonment, on motion of defendant, a judgment will be entered dismissing the proceedings and awarding defendant costs and disbursements, including expenses in preparing for trial and reasonable attorney fees. Held, that section 1255a relates to condemnation proceedings only and furnishes a special rule excluding the operation of section 581 in such cases.

2. Eminent Domain 🔑265(5)—Costs—Statute.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a, the clerk not being authorized to enter dismissal of condemnation proceedings, the effect of plaintiff's request to the clerk for a dismissal of his action and notice of such request to defendant was to apprise defendant of plaintiff's determination to abandon the action and entitle defendant to proceed under the section and move for judgment of dismissal and for costs, so that filing of a cost bill on the day of the order of dismissal, after hearing of defendant's motion, was in time.

3. Eminent Domain 🔑265(5)—Costs—Statute.

Where defendant in condemnation proceedings, on receipt of notice from plaintiff of intention to abandon the proceedings, filed a motion for dismissal and allowance of costs the next day and filed his bill for costs upon the granting of his motion and entry of the order of dismissal, he acted strictly in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a.

4. Eminent Domain 🔑265(5)—Costs on Dismissal—Statute—Constitutionality.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a, is constitutional.

5. Eminent Domain 🔑265(3)—Attorney's Fees—Statute.

Where it appeared in a condemnation proceeding that the attorney for defendant city was employed by the city under a special contract upon a retainer of $300 a month to handle the instant case and others, and that the compensation was to cease when all of the cases had been concluded, and at the time of the dismissal of the instant case a total amount had been paid of $7,000, and that he had performed a great deal of labor, and that he had apportioned one-fourteenth of the total amount paid him as properly applicable to the instant case, the court properly allowed $500 as attorney's fees incurred by the city.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Eminent domain proceedings by the Silver Lake Power & Irrigation Company against the City of Los Angeles and others. From an order denying plaintiff's motion to retax costs under a judgment dismissing the proceedings on defendants' motion after plaintiff's abandonment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Newman Jones, of Riverside, for appellant. Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., W. B. Mathews, and S. B. Robinson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. This was an action in eminent domain. The case was originally brought in the county of Mono; thereafter, because of the disqualification of the judge of the superior court of that county, it was transferred to the county of Alpine for trial; thereafter, on a showing made that the convenience of the witnesses would be better subserved thereby, another order of transfer was made, and the suit was finally located in the superior court of the county of Orange. The defendants had answered in the action, but before trial the attorney for the plaintiff, claiming the right so to do under the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 581, Code of Civil Procedure, made his written request to the clerk for a dismissal of the action, which was filed on June 28, 1915. On the same day the clerk made this entry in his docket: "This case is hereby dismissed." On the 30th day of June, a written notice was given to the defendants of the action so taken, and on July 1st of the same year defendants served upon appellant their notice of motion for judgment of dismissal and for costs and attorney's fees, which they claimed under the provisions of section 1255a, Code of Civil Procedure. This motion came on for hearing on the 23d day of July, 1915; whereupon the court made its order agreeable to such motion, directing that the action be dismissed and that defendants recover their costs, including a reasonable attorney's fee. On the day of the making of that order, the defendants served and filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Orange county their memorandum of costs and disbursements, which included a charge of $500 as attorney's fee. Thereafter the plaintiff made a motion to retax costs, moving to strike out all of the items included in the cost bill, which motion, after hearing, was denied, and this appeal was then taken from the judgment.

[1] Subdivision 1 of section 581, Code of Civil Procedure, by the authority of which the plaintiff assumed the right to dismiss its action by filing written request therefor with the clerk, is a general section providing the rule of procedure in actions not subject to some special requirement made by law. Section 1255a relates to condemnation proceedings only and furnishes a special rule. That section reads as follows:

> "Plaintiff may abandon the proceedings at any time after filing the complaint and before the expiration of thirty days after final judgment, by serving on defendant and filing in court a written notice of such abandonment; and failure to comply with section 1251 of this Code shall constitute an implied abandonment of the proceeding. Upon such abandonment, express or implied, on motion of defendant, a judgment shall be entered dismissing the proceeding and awarding the defendant his costs and disbursements, which shall include all necessary expenses incurred in preparing for trial and reasonable attorney fees. These costs and disbursements, including expenses and attorney fees, may be claimed in and by a cost bill, to be prepared, served, filed and taxed as in civil actions; provided that said costs and disbursements shall not include expenses incurred in preparing for trial where the said action is dismissed forty days prior to the time set for the trial of the said action."

The propositions advanced by the appellant are mainly to be resolved upon the question as to the constitutionality of the section 1255a above quoted.

[2, 3] By an examination of the provisions of that section it readily appears that the judgment of dismissal, therein provided to be made where a plaintiff in condemnation proposes to abandon his action, is one which the clerk is not authorized to enter as he is in the generality of cases covered by section 581, Code of Civil Procedure. Viewing section 1255a as a valid enactment, then it appears that the only effect of a request to the clerk for a dismissal of the action and notice of such request to the opposite party would be to apprise the defendant in such a suit of the determination on the part of the plaintiff to abandon the action. Thereupon the defendant would be permitted to proceed as is provided by section 1255a and ask the court by a motion for a judgment of dismissal and for his costs. The procedure followed by the defendants, after they had been apprised that plaintiff had abandoned its action, was strictly in accordance with that outlined in the section under consideration. It is insisted that by the enactment of section 1255a the Legislature has attempted to put into effect a law special in its nature and in violation of the provisions of the state Constitution, which declares that laws of a general nature shall be uniform in their operation and that special laws shall not be passed touching procedure in courts of justice; and further that the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution is violated upon the ground that under the provisions of section 1255a a defendant in a condemnation suit is deprived of property without due process of law, and is denied the equal protection of the law. It is true, as has been held in numerous cases, that acts of the Legislature of a special nature must find their justification in the reason for the distinctions which they create and rest upon natural and constitutional differences in the subject-matter or persons treated of. Here the question is as to whether the allowance of attorney's fees as a part of the cost charges to a defendant, which are not provided to be allowed in all actions, amounts to the extending of a special consideration to one class of litigants as against others standing in a similar situation and in like classes.

[4] In the case of City of San Francisco v. Collins, 98 Cal. 259, 33 Pac. 56, our Supreme Court has pointed out that, as section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made, the general statute relating to costs to be allowed to a plaintiff in an action cannot be made to apply in condemnation cases. In this decision it is quite clearly intimated that, by reason of the constitutional guaranty, suits in eminent domain are properly subject to different treatment in the matter of the rights of the parties to costs than are civil suits in general. But our attention is called to the case of City of Sacramento v. Swanston, 29 Cal. App. 212, 155 Pac. 101, wherein the precise question here argued was fully considered by the court and the constitutionality of section 1255a, in the particulars here subjected to attack, fully sustained. The court in that decision has gone extensively into the authorities, and we think the reasoning used is sound, and we adopt it with the conviction that the law was there correctly declared. Having reached this conclusion, the main point of contention on this appeal is disposed of. Counsel has said that the memorandum of costs filed by the defendants was filed more than five days after the notice of the dismissal of the action was given. The point of that argument depends altogether upon the matter as to which order of dismissal was effectual. Under the conclusion already expressed on the main question, it follows that the clerk was without authority to enter the dismissal at the written request of plaintiff and that a judgment of dismissal could only be entered, as was done, by the court upon application made therefor by motion. The cost bill was filed in time.

[5] There is a further contention that requires brief consideration: Counsel who appeared for the city testified upon the hearing of the motion to tax costs as to the attorney's fees which had been charged in the memorandum. The court's allowance was for the sum of $500 on this account. Counsel for appellant argues that the attorney's fees were not shown to have been specially incurred by the city, in that the attorney who represented it had other employment with the city for which he received a fixed compensation. This is hardly a correct statement of the situation as shown by the testimony given. Mr. Robinson, the attorney in question, testified that he had been, up to June, 1913, a deputy city attorney, and while acting as such deputy had had charge of a number of cases which included this one; that, immediately after his resignation as such deputy, the city employed him under a special contract upon retainer of $300 per month to handle to conclusion this case and six or seven others; that the compensation was to cease when all of the cases had been concluded, and at the time of the dismissal of this action a total amount had been paid to him as attorney's fees of about $7,000; that he had performed a great deal of labor in and about this case and that he had apportioned what he considered a very reasonable amount, to wit, one-fourteenth of the total amount paid to him, as properly being applicable to the work he had done in connection with this particular litigation. Upon this showing, we think the court was furnished with ample evidence upon which to make the allowance in the amount specified in the cost bill as for attorney's fees incurred.

Other smaller items contained in the cost bill are not made the subject of attack, except as they are included in the general argument touching the constitutionality of the statute.

BAUMAN v. WUEST et al. (Civ. 2014.)

TRUSTS 🔑92½ — RESULTING TRUST — ORAL AGENCY TO PROCURE LEASE — STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

Where plaintiff constituted a defendant his agent by parol for the purpose of securing a lease for more than one year which he was to take in his (the agent's) name, if necessary, and transfer to plaintiff, the agent had not sufficient authority to make a contract which could be enforced by the lessor against the plaintiff, or which the agent could compel the plaintiff to accept, and plaintiff, who has parted with no consideration, cannot compel the agent to transfer the lease taken to him, under Civ. Code, § 853, on the theory of a resulting trust, in spite of the statute of frauds.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

Suit by William Bauman against Albert Wuest and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. E. Dadmun, of San Diego, for appellant. Morganstern, McGee, Henning & Hendee, of San Diego, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff's suit was to enforce transfer to him of a certain lease of real property covering a term of years, in which lease defendant Wuest was named as the lessee. It was alleged that a transfer had been made without consideration by Wuest to defendant Morganstern. An answer was filed, and the case came on for trial. Judgment being entered in favor of the defendants, from which plaintiff appealed.

Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that he employed Wuest to secure a lease of certain real property for him, with the understanding that, if the lease could not be procured to be made directly to plaintiff, Wuest should, if possible, secure it in his own name and then transfer it to plaintiff. For this service it is alleged plaintiff agreed to pay Wuest the sum of $1,000. It was alleged that Wuest secured the lease to be made to himself, and denied any interest of this plaintiff, and assigned the lease to Morganstern. Plaintiff alleged that he had tendered payment of the $1,000 agreed upon as compensation for Wuest's services and had demanded that the defendants make assignment of the lease to him. In the answer of the defendants the making of any agreement constituting Wuest as the agent of plaintiff for the purposes alleged in the complaint was denied, and it was further alleged by way of defense that any agreement made in that behalf was void as not being expressed in writing. At the outset of the trial plaintiff proceeded to offer proof of the making of the agreement with Wuest by way of parol, and was met with the objection that such testimony was incompetent because of the provisions of the statute of frauds. Thereupon plaintiff made a complete offer to show the agreement, stating, however, that it rested altogether in parol, and that there was no writing evidencing the same. The whole case was submitted upon that offer, defendants objecting, as noted, and the objection being sustained by the court. The judgment appealed from was thereupon entered. The appellant contends that an agency of the kind alleged in the complaint may be established by parol, but does not contend that by the oral authorization made Wuest, as agent, would be empowered to execute on the plaintiff's behalf a binding contract of lease, as the term was for a period exceeding one year. Section 1624, subd. 5, Civ. Code. He seeks, however, to have his case brought within a classification of resulting trusts which equity by construction will enforce, and not permit the trustee to interpose the statute of frauds as a defense. He refers to the cases of Brown v. Spencer, 163 Cal. 589, 126 Pac. 493, and Bradley Co. v. Bradley, 165 Cal. 237, 131 Pac. 750; and we may add to the citation Hidden v. Jordan, 21 Cal. 92. Those cases all come within the express provisions of section 853 of the Civil Code, which declare that, where a transfer of real property is made to one person, and the consideration therefor is paid by another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of the person for whom the payment is made. In each of the cases cited the consideration was advanced by the person who sought to charge the agent as trustee. The section of the Code just referred to contains only a repetition of the well-established equitable rule that, when a person assuming to act for and on behalf of another, by actual fraud or that presumed from confidential relations, appropriates or gets into possession of the property which he should have delivered to his principal, and the principal is damaged thereby, he is chargeable as trustee, and may be required to account. It seems never to have been held, however, that an agency attempted to be created by parol in violation of the provisions of the statute of fraud will be held sufficient to impose a trust in a case like this where the principal who seeks its enforcement has parted with no consideration. Mr. Story, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (volume 2, p. 537), declares the rule as follows:

> "For where a man employs another person by parol as an agent to buy an estate for him, and the latter buys it accordingly in his own name, and no part of the purchase money is paid by the principal, there, if the agent denies the trust, and there is no written agreement or document establishing it, he cannot by a suit in equity compel the agent to convey the estate to him; for (as has been truly said) that would be decidedly in the teeth of the statute of frauds."

Sustaining this statement of the text is Collins v. Sullivan, 135 Mass. 462, where the court, quoting with approval from Kendall v. Mann, 11 Allen (Mass.) 15, says:

> "Where a man merely employs another person by parol as an agent to buy an estate, who buys it for himself and denies the trust, and no part of the purchase money is paid by the principal, and there is no written agreement, he cannot compel the agent to convey the estate to him."

The English case of Heard v. Pilley, 4 Law Reports, Chancery App. Cases, 548, at first glance might seem to support a contrary rule, but when analyzed we think is in accord with the authorities just referred to. Considering the facts here: Wuest had no sufficient authority by which he could make any binding contract on behalf of his alleged principal, the plaintiff, and any attempt that he might make in that direction could not be enforced by the lessor. Neither could the agent compel his alleged principal to accept the fruits of his labor, with the result that there would be no mutuality as to the binding effect of the contract either between the plaintiff and the lessor of Wuest or between Wuest and the plaintiff. We have not been favored with either brief or oral argument on behalf of the respondents in this case. However, lacking that aid, we have made a careful examination of the case and of the authorities, and feel satisfied that the judgment of the court was the proper one to be entered.

PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. COLE, County Treasurer. (Civ. 1593.)

1. Counties 🔑168(3)—Warrants — Order of Payment.

Under Pol. Code, § 3456, providing for assessments on lands in a reclamation district for reclamation work being collected and paid into the county treasury and placed to the credit of the district, and paid out for the work on warrants of the trustees of the district, and section 3457, providing that the warrants must be presented to the county treasurer, and if not paid on presentation, they must be indorsed to that effect and registered, and that, if not paid in four years, they may be extended for a like period by the trustees, and a record thereof filed with the treasurer, warrants are entitled to priority of payment in the order of their registration; so that payment of warrants cannot be required when there is on hand no more money than necessary for payment of prior registered warrants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company against Roy E. Cole, Treasurer of the County of Yolo. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harrison & Harrison, Leo H. Susman, and Wm. B. Bosley, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, both of Woodland, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Mandate. The action was commenced in the superior court of Yolo county to obtain a writ of mandate commanding defendant to immediately pay to petitioner the amount of each of two warrants, to wit, warrants No. 524 and No. 567 of reclamation district No. 730, with the interest legally due thereon, "out of any moneys deposited with or held by defendant for the purpose of paying outstanding unpaid and registered warrants of said reclamation district No. 730."

It is alleged in the petition: That reclamation district No. 730 is, and at all times mentioned in the petition it was, a reclamation district duly organized by the board of supervisors of Yolo county. That certain named persons were on June 29, 1912, the duly elected, qualified and acting trustees of said district. That on said June 29, 1912, for value received, there was executed and delivered to petitioner by said trustees a warrant, No. 524, reading in part as follows: "* * * The treasurer of Yolo county will pay out of the reclamation fund, district No. 730, to the order of Pacific Gas & Electric Company, five hundred and one and $^{85}/_{100}$ dollars"—duly signed. That said warrant was approved by the then board of supervisors of said county, and thereupon there was written upon the face of said warrant, by order of said board of supervisors, as follows: "Approved by the board of supervisors of Yolo county, Cal., July 1, 1912. M. H. Stitt, Chairman." That thereafter, thus approved, said warrant was presented for payment to defendant as treasurer of said county, "but said warrant was not paid and said warrant has never been paid." That when said warrant was so presented for payment, defendant as such treasurer indorsed thereon as follows: "Not paid for want of funds. July 1, 1912. Roy E. Cole, Treasurer, Yolo County, Cal." That "thereupon said warrant was duly registered." Like averments are set forth touching warrant No. 567, which was dated and delivered to petitioner May 4, 1914, for the sum of $416.98, approved by the board of supervisors May 5, 1914, presented to defendant for payment on that day, and on the same day indorsed by him as in the case of warrant 524, and was likewise "thereupon duly registered." That each of the said two warrants "is a valid outstanding unpaid and registered warrant of said reclamation district No. 730."

It is further alleged that on October 26, 1914, in an action theretofore commenced in said superior court by petitioner herein as plaintiff against said reclamation district as defendant pursuant to section 3457 of the Political Code, based upon said two warrants and upon certain other warrants theretofore drawn and issued by the trustees of said district, there was duly given and made by said superior court a final judgment in favor of the two warrants hereinabove mentioned, establishing their validity and adjudging that petitioner herein have and recover from said district the sum of $7,034.04, which was the aggregate of the principal amounts of said two warrants and of certain other warrants mentioned in the complaint in said action and of the interest accrued on said several warrants referred to; that no part of said judgment has been paid; that at the time said judgment was made "all of the warrants therein referred to in compliance with an order made by the above-entitled court were marked by the clerk of said court as having been canceled by order of said court and all of said warrants, after having been so marked, were surrendered to said reclamation district No. 730"; that thereafter execution upon said judgment was issued out of said court and delivered to the sheriff, and was by petitioner caused to be served upon defendant as treasurer and caused a demand to be made upon said treasurer on the ——— day of July, 1915, for the payment of the warrants referred to in said judgment, "which said warrants, at the time when said demand was made, had already been surrendered to said reclamation district No. 730 in compliance with said order of said superior court as aforesaid"; that none of said warrants at the time of said demand had ever been surrendered to said reclamation district otherwise than in compliance with said order of said superior court. It is then alleged that prior to the service of the writ of execution upon defendant, and when said demand was made upon him, said reclamation district had caused certain moneys to be deposited with defendant as such treasurer for the purpose of paying outstanding unpaid and registered warrants of said district, and at said time said defendant had in his possession and under his control, and ever since has had and now has in his possession and under his control, as petitioner is informed and believes, and so alleges, more than sufficient, of said moneys to pay said two warrants, together with the interest due thereon, and that said moneys are applicable to the payment of said two warrants; that nevertheless defendant refused to comply with said demand, and ever since has refused and still refuses to pay said two warrants or either of them.

In his answer defendant denied that either of said warrants is a valid outstanding registered warrant of said district; denied that petitioner is the owner of said two warrants or either of them; averred that petitioner on October 26, 1916, canceled and surrendered said warrants to said district, and immediately delivered the same to defendant and they have ever since been and now are in his possession; denied that there was a judgment, as alleged in the petition, made by said superior court on October 26, 1914, in the action referred to in said petition establishing the validity of said two warrants; averred that the complaint and judgment in said action were as shown in Exhibits A and B, respectively, made part of said complaint, and also made part of the answer herein, and that said district surrendered all of the warrants the subject of that action to defendant herein; admitted service of the execution referred to in the petition and that there is now in petitioner's possession the sum of $1,032.71 belonging to said district; denied that said moneys have been or now are available for or properly applicable to the payment of said two warrants; averred that said sum is on deposit with defendant as such treasurer for the purpose of paying outstanding unpaid registered warrants of said district "in their regular order of registration"; that "warrants Nos. 288, 292, 297, 312, and 313, issued by reclamation district No. 730, were registered and are payable out of said moneys prior to any warrants mentioned in the petition herein"; that after the payment of said last-named warrants "there will not be sufficient funds in the hands of respondent to pay any of the warrants mentioned in the petition herein."

The action referred to in the petition was an action against said district to recover judgment upon six different warrants of said district, among which were the two involved in this action. It was alleged in each cause of action set forth in the complaint in that action that, "although payment thereof [the warrants sued upon] has been frequently demanded, said warrant has not, nor has the debt evidenced thereby or any part thereof been paid," and the whole amount is due and unpaid. The prayer is for "judgment against defendant for the sum of $6,757.20 in gold coin of the United States of America, together with interest, * * * and for such other and further relief as may be proper in the premises." It appears from recitals in the judgment that defendant answered admitting the averments of the complaint and that defendant did not otherwise appear at the trial. The judgment was that plaintiff recover from defendant $7,034.04, being the amount of the principal and interest "as set forth in the complaint" and plaintiff's costs of suit. There is no averment in the complaint and nothing in the findings or judgment showing that the action was to "establish the validity of said two warrants" as charged in the petition herein.

To the present action the court found as facts: I. That the said two warrants have been at all times since they were registered as alleged in the petition, and now are, valid registered warrants of said district and are unpaid. II. That in the action referred to in the petition "an order was made by this court on the 26th day of October, 1914, directing the clerk of this court to mark as canceled the warrants referred to in said complaint," including the two warrants here involved, "and to deliver said warrants when so marked to the attorney for the defendant in said action"; that in obedience to said order the clerk so marked and canceled and delivered said warrants to said attorney; that neither of said two warrants "was ever canceled at all except as aforesaid, or was ever surrendered to said district except as aforesaid"; that said two warrants at the time they were issued were issued to petitioner, and petitioner was the holder thereof thenceforward until marked as aforesaid by the clerk of said court, "and each of said warrants has been at all times since it was issued as aforesaid, and is now, owned by the petitioner herein." Each of said warrants was delivered to defendant herein with the consent of said district subsequent to the 26th day of October, 1914, "and has been ever since it was so delivered to him and is now in his possession." III. That at the time when said demand was made upon defendant by petitioner there was in the hands of defendant belonging to said district the sum of $1,032.71, which was not sufficient to pay both said warrants and accrued interest, but was sufficient to pay warrant No. 524, and petitioner has offered to accept said sum of $1,032.71 in full satisfaction of said two warrants. IV. That when said demand was made there were outstanding certain other warrants "all of which had been duly issued and registered prior to the date of the earlier in date of said two warrants and all of which are unpaid"; that the aggregate of the amount of said last mentioned warrants is such that, "if all of said prior warrants were to be paid out of said money, * * * the balance would be less than the amount of either of said two warrants."

As conclusion of law the court finds that defendant is entitled to have the writ of mandate dismissed and judgment was accordingly entered. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll.

Respondent advances certain propositions in support of the judgment which were anticipated by appellant and made the subject of its points and authorities in its attack upon the judgment. Respondent contends: I. That the legal effect of the action brought by the electric company "was to destroy or annul them as outstanding, subsisting obligations of the district, and the recovery of judgment based upon them substituted a new and different obligation in a new and different form—that of the general judgment"; that the warrants have ceased to exist; that the general judgment substituted for them does not meet the requirements of sections 3456 and 3457 of the Political Code, and to pay the judgment would be a violation of the terms of the statute. II. Appellant having reduced its claim on the warrants to judgment, whatever rights or remedies it had as holder of the warrants were merged in its rights as judgment creditor. III. Reclamation district warrants must be paid, under section 3457, Political Code, in the order of the date of their issuance, or, if registered as outstanding, unpaid warrants, in the order of registration. IV. All moneys collected by a reclamation district must be deposited in the county treasury to the credit of the district and "paid out for works of reclamation upon the warrants of the trustees, approved by the board of supervisors." The court is authorized to proceed against a reclamation district in two ways only: First, issue a writ of mandate to compel the trustees to draw a warrant for the amount found by the court to be due in the mandamus proceeding; second, "to establish the validity of a warrant in order to prevent the same from being barred and so as to authorize the payment of the same or its application on an assessment after the expiration of four years from the date of its issuance."

Section 3456 of the Political Code provides for the appointment by the board of supervisors of commissioners to assess upon the land within the district the sum estimated as necessary for the proposed work.

> "The same must be collected and paid into the county treasury as hereinafter provided, and be placed by the treasurer to the credit of the district, and paid out for the works of reclamation upon the warrants of the trustees, approved by the board of supervisors."

Then follow provisions for the payment of bonds, if bonds have been issued, not involved in this case.

The more important provisions of the statute are found in section 3457, from which we quote:

> "The warrants drawn by the trustees must be presented to the treasurer of the county, and if they are not paid on presentation, such indorsement must be made thereon, and they must be registered and bear interest from the date of such warrant * * * and such warrants are and shall be considered as contracts in writing for the payment of money, and the period prescribed for the commencement of an action based upon said warrants, or connected therewith, is and shall be the term of four years from the date of their issuance; provided, that all warrants in excess of the sum of fifty dollars * * * shall be approved by the board of supervisors before the same shall be paid by the county treasurer.
> "Any owner of land in the district may at any time pay any assessments thereon (excepting an assessment upon which bonds have been issued), or any part hereof, with warrants of the district. No warrant shall be paid or received on an assessment, except within four years after the date of its issuance. The board of trustees and the treasurer must cancel all warrants not paid within four years after date of issuance; provided, that any warrant not paid or received on assessment within four years after the issuance may, before the expiration of such four years, upon the demand of the owner or holder, be extended for a like period of four years, upon the presentation of the same to the board of trustees of the district, such extension being indorsed thereon by said board and a record thereof filed with the treasurer. In case an action or proceeding based upon any warrant or connected therewith, be commenced within four years after the issuance of such warrant, and final judgment be obtained in favor of the holder or owner thereof, such warrant shall be paid or received on assessment the same as if it had been paid or received on assessment before the expiration of said four years from the date of its issuance.
> "In any proceeding for a writ of mandate to compel the trustees to issue a warrant, if a controversy arises as to the amount that may be due to the plaintiff, the court must determine the same in the manner provided for determining controversies in other civil actions, and shall cause a writ to issue for such sum as may be found to be due."

The action by appellant on the warrants here involved was commenced, under section 3457, July 7, 1914, as to warrant No. 524, two years and a few days after its issuance, approval, and registration, and, as to warrant No. 567, two months after its issuance, approval, and registration. The action was not necessary to establish the validity of the warrants or to determine any controversy over the amount due thereon; for they had the approval of the board of supervisors and had been registered as outstanding obligations of the district. Neither was the action brought for such purpose nor was any such relief given, nor was it necessary to bring the action in order to obtain an extension of time for payment, for one of the warrants had two years and the other three years and ten months to run. Besides the statute expressly provides that any needed extension of time may be given by the board of trustees on presentation of the warrant. "As contracts in writing for the payment of money," which the statute declares them to be, the action seems to have had no other object than to change these contracts into the form of a general judgment against the district with interest added and precisely this is what was accomplished. As found by the court in the present action, the warrants were introduced as evidence in the former action by plaintiff therein and by the direction of the court were canceled by the clerk, so far as appears, without objection by plaintiff and delivered to defendant therein with the consent of the district, and are now in defendant's possession. The usual course where an action is brought upon a written instrument, a promissory note, for example, is to surrender the instrument for cancellation precedent to judgment. It is true the court found that petitioner was the holder and owner of these warrants from their issuance until "marked as aforesaid by the clerk," and that at all times since they were issued plaintiff has been the owner of said warrants, and they are "now owned by petitioner herein." This fact does not nullify the finding that the warrants were surrendered by petitioner and were without objection canceled and are now in defendant's possession.

The statute does not authorize the treasurer to pay out money of the district except "upon the warrants of the trustees, approved by the board of supervisors." Whether or not petitioner by its judgment in the action on its warrants obtained any right except to have a warrant issued by the trustees for the amount of the judgment, which was for the aggregate amount of six different warrants and accrued interest, is a question in the case, and if such was the result of the action, a further question arises: Was the treasurer authorized to pay any money out of the treasury on the judgment, inasmuch as he can only pay out money upon presentation of a warrant. Fresno Canal & Irrigation Co. v. McKenzie, 135 Cal. 497, 67 Pac. 900. If he was not so authorized, mandamus would not lie in this case.

The petition states that the demand made upon the treasurer was by service of the execution issued out of the superior court on the judgment in said action, and it is alleged that the demand made was "for the payment of the warrants referred to in said judgment." The judgment made no mention of any warrants and furnished no information to the treasurer that the amount therein found to be due from the district was based upon warrants theretofore issued. Was the treasurer bound to inquire into the nature of the action and pay out the money of the district on such demand? These are questions of more or less importance in determining whether the writ should issue. But, as we think respondent was justified in refusing payment on other grounds, we refrain from passing upon the effect of the said judgment.

[1] Conceding that petitioner did not, by this judgment, lose its right to have the warrants paid, we think that holders of warrants on which demand for payment and registration had been made prior to petitioner's demand were entitled to priority of payment in the order of their registration, and hence, upon the facts found, the treasurer was justified in refusing payment of petitioner's warrants.

In La France Fire Engine Co. v. Davis, Treasurer, 9 Wash. 600, 38 Pac. 154, as we understand the decision, the warrants in question were issued at a time when there was no law requiring warrants to be paid in any particular order, but such a law was afterwards passed. The court said:

> "But, in our opinion, even before the passage of such act, it was the duty of the treasurer to pay warrants drawn upon any particular fund in the order either of their date, or of the time of their presentation to him for payment."

This rule was followed in Bardsley v. Sternberg, 18 Wash. 612, 52 Pac. 251, as applicable to the payment of city warrants, the court holding that:

> Warrants like those involved "are payable, in the absence of legislative direction, either in the order of their issuance or of their presentation, and not at the direction of the particular officer whose duty it is to pay them."

In First National Bank of Northampton v. Arthur, 10 Colo. App. 283, 50 Pac. 738, neither the charter nor the ordinance of the city prescribed the precise order in which the treasurer should pay the city warrants. A section of an ordinance of the city provided, that, whenever a city warrant was presented for payment and there were no funds for the payment of the same, it became the duty of the treasurer to register such warrants in a book kept for that purpose showing the date and amount of such warrant and the name of the person to whom payable, together with the date of presentation, and to indorse upon the face of such warrant the time and date of registry. The court said:

> "Ordinarily the debtor is required to seek the creditor, if he desires to discharge an obligation, and no place of payment is prescribed therein, but this rule does not prevail as to the warrants or orders of municipal corporations of this character. When, therefore, the holder of a city warrant presents it for payment, and this is refused on account of want of funds, and the warrant is registered by the treasurer, he has a right to assume, in the absence of any law or ordinance to the contrary, that his warrant will be paid in the order of his demand for payment, and of its registration. He has been diligent and has done everything in his power to secure and protect himself in his rights, which ought, in justice, to be superior to those who may secure evidences of indebtedness subsequently issued."

Referring to the registration required, the court said further:

> "This object, undoubtedly, was the ultimate redemption of the warrants in the order of their registration. Any other construction of the ordinance would tend to seriously impair the credit of the city, by making a creditor depend for the satisfaction of his claim solely upon the will and caprice of the treasurer."

Replying to the contention that the order of payment was within the discretion of the treasurer, the court said:

> "The ordinary rule of law is that a debtor can direct the application of payment. In this case, however, the city, not the treasurer, is the debtor; and in the absence of any direction by it, or by the general or special law which controls it, the courts will direct such application as will not be inequitable or unjust to the creditor, and at the same time subserve the best interests of the municipality."

After thus dealing with the question, the court calls attention to a general statute which the court thought did in terms require warrants to be paid in the order presented for payment. What measure of force was given this law in deciding the case we do not know, but we cannot assume that it was the controlling or only factor. However, we think the decision might well have rested upon the reasoning of the opinion apart from the law referred to.

Appellant contends that the question was directly presented in Meyer v. Widber, 126 Cal. 252, 58 Pac. 532, and decided favorably to its contention. That case was mandamus against the treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco to compel the payment of certain Dupont street bonds. The decision was by a divided court, and all the reasons advanced in support of the prevailing opinion were very earnestly assailed by the late Chief Justice Beatty in the dissenting opinion concurred in by Justices Henshaw and Temple. The concluding declaration is as follows:

> "The truth is the doctrine of this case, carried to its logical conclusion will permit the custodian of a fund in the position of this defendant to pay or refuse to pay those who make demands as his fancy inclines. As long as he is not sued he may refuse one and pay another, irrespective of the order of their demands, or he may refuse them all until some favored claimant serves him with a writ of mandate. The doctrine is, in my opinion, without reason to support it, and is pernicious in its consequence."

Notwithstanding that we think the views expressed by the court in First National Bank of Northampton v. Arthur, supra, and the decision by the Washington court are satisfactory and warrant our holding to the rule announced in those cases, we should feel bound to follow the rule laid down in Meyer v. Widber, until overruled by that court, if it could not be distinguished from the present case. We think the facts in the two cases are essentially different. It was stated in Meyer v. Widber in the prevailing opinion of the court, among other reasons for the decision, as follows:

> "There is no law requiring a record to be kept of the respective dates when demands may be made upon the treasurer for the payment of these bonds. The treasurer succeeding the present incumbent will have no knowledge whatever of any demands outstanding against the bond fund when he assumes his office. And at that time, if there be money in the fund, and demand be made upon him for the payment of certain bonds, we cannot see how he would be justified in refusing to apply these moneys to the payment of such bonds."

The statute made no provision for the registration of these Dupont street bonds or that any record should be kept of the holders of any such bonds. All that the treasurer knew when the demand was made upon him by Meyer was that there were other outstanding bonds in the hands of unknown persons of whose demands for payment, if such had been made, the treasurer had no means of knowing. In the present case the warrants held by the trial court to have priority were presented for payment, and of that fact and of the number of the warrants, a registration was made and the reason for nonpayment indorsed thereon.

As was said in the Arthur Case, 50 Pac., supra, the warrant holder "has been diligent and has done everything in his power to secure and protect * * * his rights, which ought, in justice, to be superior to those who may secure evidences of indebtedness subsequently issued." We think, as was there said, that the courts should "direct such application as will not be inequitable or unjust to the creditor, and at the same time subserve the best interests of the municipality."

In holding, as we do, that the treasurer was justified in refusing to comply with plaintiff's demand for the reason assigned by him, we are but giving to sections 3456 and 3457 of the Political Code a construction in harmony with the general law with reference to the payment of county warrants. Pol. Code, §§ 4108, 4109.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [2] The point emphasized on petition for rehearing is a challenge to the right to the writ, by the warrant holders held entitled to priority, for the reason that no demand was made by them for payment. It will be observed from a reading of the statute that the warrants bear interest from their date, and not from the date of registration, as is the case of warrants generally authorized by boards of supervisors, and they were therefore not required to present the warrants for payment in order to obtain interest.

Section 3457 provides as follows:

> "The warrants drawn by the trustees must be presented to the treasurer of the county, and if they are not paid on presentation, such indorsement must be made thereon, and they must be registered," etc.

It seems to us that this "presentation" is a demand for payment. The clause "if they are not paid on presentation" would seem to imply that the presentation was for payment.

However, the holders of these registered warrants who are given priority of payment are not seeking the writ. The respondent is justifying himself in refusing payment to petitioner because of the rights of these prior warrant holders. It seems to us that respondent could interpose this defense without showing a demand of the holders of these warrants made subsequently to their presentation and registration.

Upon other points we have no further comment to make. The petition for rehearing is denied.

1. SALES 🔑442(1) — CONDITIONAL SALE — BREACH OF WARRANTY—ACTION.

Where title is reserved in the seller, a breach of warranty will not entitle the buyer to recover general damages, because the rule as to the measure of damages applicable to such a case does not apply.

2. SALES 🔑442(3)—BREACH OF WARRANTY—DAMAGES.

On a seller's breach of warranty in a sale of machinery, the measure of damages is the difference between its value as fixed by the contract of sale and its actual value at the time.

3. SALES 🔑273(3)—WARRANTY OF FITNESS—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 1770, proving that the manufacturer of an article under an order for a particular purpose warrants by the sale that it is reasonably fit for that purpose, a warranty of fitness will be implied where the seller contracts with the buyer with full knowledge as to the particular use to which the article contracted to be sold is to be put.

4. SALES 🔑434 — CONDITIONAL SALE — ACTION FOR DAMAGES—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

A complaint, alleging that plaintiff desired to install a pumping plant to obtain water for domestic purposes, and for the irrigation of trees and crops to be planted, and that defendant, with knowledge thereof, proposed to furnish a gasoline engine, a pump and fittings, and guaranteed the engine to be well made and of good material, and guaranteed against defective material and workmanship for one year, that plaintiff accepted the proposal and the engine and pump were installed, and that by reason of poor material, workmanship, faulty plans and installation it was worthless, and alleging damages to crops, trees, and vines which plaintiff was prevented from raising by reason of the defective engine, and showing that plaintiff was not in default of payments prior to the breach, stated a good cause of action for some amount of damages, and was good against a general demurrer.

5. ACTION 🔑38(1) — JOINDER OF CAUSES — BREACH OF WARRANTY.

A complaint, alleging a seller's breach of his contract and warranty to furnish and install an engine and pump for irrigation purposes, and a loss of crops in reliance upon the seller's promises to replace and repair the defective pumping plant, was not objectionable for attempting to join two causes of action, as the allegation of such promises were proper to be considered only as showing a reason for the continuing damages alleged to have resulted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Mrs. J. E. Lichtenthaler against the Samson Iron Works. Judgment for defendant, dismissing the complaint on demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Daniel M. Hunsaker, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Valentine & Newby, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover a sum of money as damages alleged to have been sustained through the failure of defendant to furnish an engine and pump and erect the same as contracted for. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint, in which the general ground of objection was first stated that sufficient facts were not set forth in the complaint to constitute a cause of action. The complaint was also demurred to on the ground that it attempted to state two causes of action and was ambiguous and uncertain for the same reason. The superior court sustained the demurrer, and plaintiff declining to amend, judgment of dismissal followed. This appeal was then taken.

In the complaint it was alleged that about April, 1910, the plaintiff was the owner of certain real property in the county of Los Angeles on which she was residing and "on which, as defendant well knew and understood, plaintiff was desirous of, and intended, erecting and installing a pumping plant, for the purpose of obtaining water for domestic purposes and for the irrigation of certain trees and vines then planted and growing on said premises, and of trees and vines and crops to be planted, cultivated and grown by her on said premises." It is next alleged that about the same date defendant made a written proposal to her to furnish a gasoline engine with its fittings and accessories, also a vertical pump and its connections, together with an iron frame. The written proposal then proceeded with the following statement:

> "Foundation to be built by Samson I. Works per our plans, you to do all teaming and furnish all common labor. We furnish one competent man to assist in the erection of this engine and Samson Iron Works pay his traveling expenses to and from Stockton; you board and lodge him until his return to the depot. You haul him and his tools to and from depot. * * * We guarantee this engine to be well made, of good material, with best workmanship. We guarantee this engine against defective material and workmanship for one year."

Further terms of the proposal required that the purchase price should be paid in installments, $150 down and $100 every three months, with interest, and that title to the property should not be acquired by the vendee until it had been fully paid for, and that in default of payment as agreed, the vendor might take possession and remove the engine and pump "and collect reasonable charges for the use of same." Plaintiff then alleged that before April 14, 1910, she accepted the proposal, and that on or about May 1, 1910, pursuant to the contract, defendant delivered to the plaintiff a gasoline engine and pumping plant, and furnished a man to assist in the erection of the same on her premises; that the engine and plant were erected and installed under the direction and with the assistance of the man so furnished. It is then alleged:

> "That the man so furnished by defendant, for such purpose, was not competent, and that he erected and installed said engine and pumping plant in an unskillful and negligent manner. That said engine was not well made, or of good material, nor was it of the best workmanship, and said engine and pumping plant were carelessly and unskillfully erected and installed by the man so furnished by defendant; and the plans and specifications for the foundation of said plant, as prepared by defendant, were faulty and defective. That by reason of the incompetency of the man so furnished by defendant to assist in the erection of said engine and pumping plant, and the unskillful and negligent manner in which he caused the same to be erected and installed, and by reason of the fact that said engine was not well made or of good material or constructed with the best workmanship, and by reason of the further fact that the plans and specifications for both the foundations of said plant, as prepared by defendant, were faulty and deficient, said engine and pumping plant did not work properly, the same failed to pump or lift water, and was in consequence thereof rendered valueless to plaintiff, to her damage in the sum of $2,281, as follows."

The complaint then proceeds in its statement of facts to set forth that the plaintiff, relying upon the warranties and representations of the defendant, did, during the spring of 1910, plant 3 acres of potatoes and 1½ acres of onions and 4½ acres of fruit trees, with the expectation that the same would be irrigated with water to be raised by the pumping plant; that by reason of the failure of the plant to work, the trees and crops died, and she was damaged thereby in the sum of $1,550. She further alleged that at the time the plant was erected there were growing on the ground certain trees and vines which she had expected to irrigate with water to be raised by the plant, and that these trees died through the failure of the plant to raise water, and that she was damaged thereby in the sum of $398. It was then set out that she had paid on account of the purchase price, about May 18, 1910, the initial payment of $150; on or about August 22, $102; on or about December 11, $50; on or about January 25, 1911, $29; that in about May, 1911, the defendant, without the consent of plaintiff, removed, tore out, and took away the pumping plant. It was further alleged that many times after September 1, 1910, defendant had promised and agreed to replace and repair the engine and the defective parts thereof, and that the plaintiff, relying upon such representations and promises, did, in the spring of 1911, plant certain crops, which failed to grow by reason of lack of water, and that she purchased certain seed and caused ground to be specially prepared for particular crops, all of which failed because water was not produced from the pumping plant with which to irrigate them. It may be noted here that the pump was installed about the 1st of May, 1910, and that the plaintiff was not in default as to her payments until November, the same year. According to the allegations of her complaint, the pumping plant never did work properly by reason of the unskillful installation thereof, and by reason of deficiency in workmanship and material of the engine.

[1, 2] Respondent, in support of its demurrer, alleges: First, that no action can be maintained on the warranties of the defendant because by the contract no title would pass to the vendee until full payment had been made. It is also contended that under the facts alleged there was no implied warranty of the fitness of the machinery to do the work had in view by the plaintiff, and that therefore the special damages which she alleges to have suffered cannot be recovered. It is true that where title is reserved in the seller, a breach of warranty by the latter will not entitle the other party to recover what are termed "general damages." This is not because no actionable injury has been caused by the breach, but because the rule as to the measure of damages applicable to such a case does not apply, to wit, the difference between the value of the machinery as fixed by the contract of sale and its actual value at the time. This proposition is well stated in New Hamburg Manufacturing Co. v. Webb, 23 Ontario Law Repts. (Can.) 44, where the court said:

> "No one, in short, can be injured by a diminution in value, simply, of a chattel, until he owns it; but he may be injured by the failure of a machine to do the work he wants it for, no matter who owns the machine. * * * The purchaser says to the vendor, 'You furnish me a machine to do a certain kind of work and with a warranty the implementing of which implied the capacity of the machine to do the work—the machine will not do the work, and I have lost money thereby.' It would be no answer for the vendor to say, 'It is not your machine; it is mine.' The purchaser would say: 'What of that? You furnished me with the machine and warranted it to do my work—it is of no importance whose machine it is, yours, mine, or a third person's.' And he would be right."

In that case damages were allowed of a special nature, which included the loss of three seasons' profits occasioned by the engine furnished not developing the capacity contracted for or warranted.

> "One who manufactures an article under an order for a particular purpose, warrants by the sale that it is reasonably fit for that purpose."

Under the provisions of this section, it is well established that a warranty of fitness will be implied where the vendor contracts with the vendee with full knowledge as to the particular use to which the article contracted to be sold is to be put. Such was the condition of fact in Snyder v. Holt Manufacturing Co., 134 Cal. 324, 66 Pac. 311, and in Luitweiler, etc., Co. v. Ukiah, etc., Co., 16 Cal. App. 198, 116 Pac. 707, 712. In the case first cited the written order given for the harvesting machine contained an agreement on the part of the manufacturer and vendor in the following terms:

> "These machines are all warranted to be made of good material, and durable with proper care."

The Supreme Court there declared that, because of the circumstances of the case, under which it appeared that the machine was ordered for a particular purpose, and that the vendor had knowledge of the special purpose for which it was desired to be used, an implied warranty arose, under section 1770, Civil Code, for the protection of the vendee.

[4] Damages such as those in the main alleged in plaintiff's complaint may be recovered where such a warranty exists. We quote from Mechem on Sales, vol. 2, § 1756:

> "But there may be cases in which the buyer had in view such a special or unusual use or purpose that this mere difference in value will not measure it. If he had, two conditions will suggest themselves: Did he keep that peculiar use or purpose to himself, so that the seller had no intimation that any other than the ordinary consequences would ensue? Or did he, or did the circumstances, so fully disclose this special or unusual purpose that the seller may fairly be said to have had in his contemplation when he made the contract the losses which might accrue as a probable result of his breach of his agreement?"

We find no established rule which will prevent a vendee who has not obtained title to the property sold from prosecuting an action to recover any special damages which may have been caused him through breach of the warranty of his vendor. While it is shown by the complaint that plaintiff was in default as to payments to be made on account of the purchase price, it also appears that she had committed no default prior to the first breach of the defendant as to its warranty. She alleged that the entire plant was defectively constructed, both as to design and method, that the engine was not of the material and workmanship guaranteed, and that the plant would not pump water. This condition, it would appear as a proper inference to be drawn from the complaint, existed from the time of the installation of the machinery. The complaint, in our opinion, clearly states a good cause of action for some amount of damages, and, that being true, the objection made by the general demurrer is answered against the contention of respondent.

[5] The second objection raised by the special demurrer is that two causes of action are attempted to be joined, in that promises alleged to have been made by the defendant after September, 1910, that it would replace and repair the defective pumping plant, constituted a different cause for damages than that furnished by the breach of the original conditions stated. We think that this position is not correctly taken, and that the allegations last referred to are proper to be considered only as showing a reason for the continuing damage which is alleged to have resulted to the plaintiff, and for the further reason, as is stated in Luitweiler, etc., Co. v. Ukiah, etc., Co., supra:

> "The buyer's retention and use of the article beyond the stipulated time will not operate as a waiver of the benefits of the warranty when it was at the instance of the seller or his agent or when it was for the purpose of giving the seller or his agent an opportunity to remedy defects" (citing 30 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 188).

While the complaint might have been more concisely drawn in its statement of the facts, we think that it contained sufficient to render it unobjectionable to the demurrer, and that the special damages alleged were such as might, under sufficient proof, be recovered, measured by the rule prescribed by section 3314, Civil Code.

The judgment is reversed.

HAYNE et al. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 6802.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑450(1)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS—POWERS OF SUPERVISORS.

St. 1911, pp. 1686, 1691, amending San Francisco Charter, by adding chapter 8 to article 6, empowering the board of supervisors to order construction of tunnels and levy expenses on private property, and section 33 to chapter 2, art. 6, authorizing the board of supervisors by ordinance to use any method of procedure in any general law of the state, while not directly conferring authority on the board of supervisors to define districts benefited by the proposed improvement and to be assessed to pay the expense thereof, does authorize an assessment on a district to be approved by the supervisors.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑460—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENTS — "COST AND EXPENSES."

Under San Francisco Charter, art. 6, c. 8, § 1, authorizing assessment for cost and expenses of tunnel construction, the city may assess the damages to owners of abutting lots caused by the construction; such necessarily being part of the cost within the term "cost and expenses."

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Costs and Expenses.]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑447—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENTS — PREREQUISITES.

It is not prerequisite to the validity of an assessment for tunnel construction that the order for construction of the proposed tunnel or contract therefor shall actually have been made.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑447—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENTS — PREREQUISITES.

Since San Francisco Charter, art. 6, c. 2, § 33, authorizes the supervisors to adopt any method of procedure in any general law of the state for the collection of assessment and construction of tunnel, and there are several general statutes authorizing assessment to defray expenses of similar public work in advance of construction thereof, the implied meaning of the grant is that the supervisors may provide for collection of assessments before doing the work or letting a contract therefor.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑455—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENTS — PREREQUISITES.

Where the ordinance providing for a public improvement authorized the assessment to be made by the board of supervisors and estimates to be made by the board of public works, and the supervisors increased the estimate of the board of public works at the regular time for determining the assessment, there was no arbitrary action without notice or authority in so raising the assessment.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑455—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENTS — PREREQUISITES.

Where the ordinance providing for public improvements provided that the hearing on the special assessments might be continued from time to time and all persons interested should be deemed to have notice of the continuance, notice of the first hearing having been given, no notice of proceedings after continuance was required.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑545—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENT — PREREQUISITES.

Under San Francisco Charter, art. 6, c. 2, § 33, empowering the board of supervisors to adopt any method of procedure in any general law providing for special assessments, a summary sale of the property assessed is authorized; there being several statutes providing for summary sale after special assessment.

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑545—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENT — PREREQUISITES—"LEVY."

Since San Francisco Charter, art. 6, c. 2, § 33, provides for levy of special assessments to pay for public improvements, a summary sale of property so assessed is authorized; the word "levy" being sufficiently broad to cover that mode of collection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1256; Dec. Dig. 🔑545.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Levy.]

9. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑58—POWERS—CHARTER—CONSTRUCTION.

The rule that a city has no powers not expressly given or necessarily implied from its charter does not do away with the rules of interpretation, and all of the charter is to be considered in arriving at the meaning of any part of it.

10. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑554—POWERS—CHARTER—CONSTRUCTION.

Under ordinance providing that on summary sale of property assessed for public improvements, if for any reason the sale does not take place, it may be continued from day to day or postponed to another day not more than ten days thereafter, postponements from day to day or from time to time may be made indefinitely, but a single postponement must not exceed ten days.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. 🔑554.]

If an assessment is made by a valid procedure, property levied upon is justly liable for its due proportion, and the owner is not entitled to any relief in the court of equity unless he pays, or offers to pay, the amount actually due upon the assessment of his property.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Duncan Hayne, executor of Agnes Howard Hayne, deceased, and another, against the City and County of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Percy V. Long, of San Francisco (George Lull and Theodore J. Savage, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. J. A. Cooper, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The appeal is from the judgment. The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs are owners in common of a lot on the corner of Stockton and Washington streets in San Francisco, and that the defendant, without right, claims an interest therein adverse to plaintiffs. They ask judgment quieting their title. This relief the court below awarded to them. The defendant in its answer claims a lien upon the lot by virtue of an assessment levied thereon to pay the cost of a tunnel constructed under Stockton street from Bush street to a point near Sacramento street. The court below decided that the assessment was invalid and created no lien.

The same assessment was under consideration by this court in Mardis v. McCarthy, 162 Cal. 94, 121 Pac. 389. The objections there made to the validity of the assessment were held to be untenable. Additional objections are now made, and, as the plaintiffs here were not parties to that action, the new objections must be considered.

The assessment was levied by proceedings under an ordinance of the board of supervisors passed in pursuance of powers given to the board by tne amendments of 1911 to article 6 of the city charter of San Francisso (Stats. 1911, p. 1686), consisting of a new chapter designated "Chapter VIII" and a new section to chapter 2, numbered 33. For convenience, we quote section 1 of the chapter and section 33 in full. Section 1 of chapter 8 is as follows:

> "The board of supervisors are hereby empowered to order the construction of any tunnel, subway or viaduct, in, on, under, or over, any accepted or unaccepted open public street, avenue, lane, alley, place or court, within the city and county, or any other land of the city and county, or in, on, under, or over, any land in which and where the city and county may then have an easement or right of way therefor, and to levy the cost and expenses thereof upon private property, in the manner and under and subject to the proceedings, powers, restrictions and limitations in chapter II and chapter VII of this article provided for street work and street improvement." (There is no chapter VII.)

Section 33 of chapter 2 of article 6 reads as follows:

> "The methods of procedure in this article provided for the improvement of streets, or for the construction of tunnels, subways or viaducts and appurtenances thereto, and for the assessment of the expense thereof or any portion of such expense upon private property shall not be deemed exclusive, but the board of supervisors by an affirmative vote of not less than two-thirds of the members thereof, may by ordinance substitute therefor any method of procedure in any general law of the state of California now in force and effect, or as the same may be amended, or that may hereafter be enacted, providing for any such improvements in municipalities, and levying assessments for the expense or portion thereof upon private property; or the said board may by a like affirmative vote of the members thereof adopt an ordinance which may from time to time be revised or amended, providing a method of procedure for such improvement and assessment; and in such ordinance if said board deems it expedient provision may be made for the payment of any assessment levied in pursuance of the provisions thereof in annual installments covering a term not to exceed ten years upon conditions as to said board may seem reasonable and just, the rate of interest to be paid on such payments not to exceed seven per cent. per annum." St. 1911, p. 1691.

[1] 1. In Mardis v. McCarthy, we held that the charter amendments above mentioned authorized the board of supervisors to provide by such ordinance that the cost and expenses of the tunnel should be levied upon a special district. It is now claimed that the statement in the opinion in that case that by section 5 of chapter 2 of article 6 "the board of supervisors is expressly authorized to define the districts benefited by the proposed improvement and to be assessed to pay the expense thereof" is erroneous. It is true, as claimed, that section 5 does not directly confer such authority upon the board of supervisors. It gives that authority to the board of public works, which, after delimiting the district, must report and recommend its action to the board of supervisors. Other parts of chapter 2, especially section 2, in effect, require that the board of supervisors shall either reject or approve such report. The section therefore authorizes the assessment upon a district to be approved by the supervisors, which is the vital point of the decision. We adhere to the decision in that case.

[2] 2. The assessment included an item of $191,512 made up of allowances to owners of abutting lots for damages caused to them by the tunnel and by the construction thereof. Plaintiffs claim that this was unauthorized, that the phrase "cost and expenses," in section 1 of chapter 8, does not include such damages. We think the phrase should be given a broader meaning. The grant of power to cause the construction of the tunnel, of itself, implies a grant of sufficient incidental powers to accomplish that object. The Constitution (section 14, art. 1) requires the payment of all damages to abutting owners before such tunnel can be constructed. The payment thereof would be one of the necessary expenses of accomplishing the result desired. It is true it would not be a part of the expense of actual construction. The right thus paid for would not technically be a part of the material for the construction of the tunnel, but it is none the less an expense essential to such construction. The making of plans and surveys which precede the construction creates no material which goes into the work, but the cost thereof is uniformly understood to be an expense of the work. We think the payment of damages made imperative by the Constitution is as much an expense or cost of the tunnel as the expense of preliminary surveys and plans, and that the charter gives the power to include it in the assessment.

This meaning is also indicated strongly, if not made imperative, by the fact that the modes for charging upon private property the damages caused by public improvements, provided in other parts of the charter, do not appear to be applicable to damages caused to property not taken, where a tunnel is made in a street already opened. Furthermore, to deny the phrase "cost and expenses" a meaning broad enough to cover such damages would make the power to provide the procedure by ordinance practically inoperative and defeat the grant thereof. Such effect should never be given to words of a law if a more consistent meaning is reasonable. In re Mitchell, 120 Cal. 386, 52 Pac. 799. There are cases where words of like import in statutes relating to public works have been held to a more restricted meaning. We do not regard them as controlling authority. Each case must depend upon its own context and upon the object and purpose to be accomplished and the effect of the narrower or broader meaning upon such object, which considerations here point to the more liberal construction above stated.

We need not consider the point that this objection was waived by the failure to protest before the board, or the point that the objection admits the validity of the assessment, in part, and plaintiffs have not paid or tendered the part admitted to be valid.

[3] 3. At the time this action was begun and down to the time of the trial thereof, the board of supervisors had not yet ordered the construction of the proposed tunnel nor let a contract for such construction, although it had duly passed a resolution of intention to construct such tunnel. It is claimed that the power to collect the assessment lies dormant until such order has been made or such contract let. Counsel say:

> "It would seem that the point is unanswerable. The levying of the cost and expenses must have been after the order was made for the construction of the tunnel. After the board has made such order, then the power is given to it to levy the cost and expense upon private property."

Neither the charter, nor the ordinance under which this proceeding was had, makes the existence of the power to collect the assessment conditional upon the previous exercise of the power to order the construction of the tunnel. The city and county is nowhere prohibited from collecting the necessary funds before ordering the doing of the work. It is a well-established proposition that a municipal corporation may be empowered to levy and collect an assessment for a local public improvement before the work is ordered to be done. In Cooley on Taxation it is said:

> "But there is no reason in the nature of things why an assessment should not be made before the work is actually done, and before the cost shall be finally and conclusively determined." And further that the municipality acts as agent for the parties benefited, and that, in order to properly perform its functions as such agent, it may be "allowed to make the assessment, and even the collection if it shall be deemed proper, in advance." Volume 2 (3d Ed.) 1266.

The following cases sustain this doctrine: Henderson v. Baltimore, 8 Md. 352; Kingman's Petition, 153 Mass. 584, 27 N. E. 778, 12 L. R. A. 417; Scovill v. Cleveland, 1 Ohio St. 134; Davies v. Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 47, 24 Pac. 771; and Felker v. New Whatcom, 16 Wash. 183, 47 Pac. 505. The remedy in such a case, if the improvement is abandoned, it has been held, is that the property owner will be entitled to have his payment returned. Valentine v. St. Paul, 34 Minn. 446, 26 N. W. 457. The Constitution of 1879 originally went further and actually prohibited the doing of such work or the making of contracts therefor to be paid by special assessment upon private property, until after the assessment had been levied and collected. Article 11, § 19. That plan was evidently then considered to be not only within the governmental power, but also consistent with the best public policy. In Thomason v. Ruggles, 69 Cal. 467, 11 Pac. 21, speaking of the amendment of 1884, the court said:

> "The Constitution was amended by striking out the said clause, thus leaving no constitutional restriction as to performing work before the collection of the money, and leaving it to the Legislature to pass such laws in that regard as it might deem expedient."

There is therefore no constitutional objection to the plan.

[4] Section 33, above quoted, authorizes the supervisors to adopt the procedure prescribed in article 6 of the charter, or "any method of procedure in any general law of the state," or to enact an ordinance prescribing a procedure. There were and are in force several statutes providing for the making and collection of assessments to defray the expenses of similar public work in advance of the construction thereof, namely, the act of 1889, the act of 1893, and the act of 1903, each providing a mode for the opening of public streets through private lands (Stats. 1889, p. 70; Stats. 1893, p. 220; Stats. 1903, p. 376); the act of 1901, and the act of 1909, each for the improvement of public streets (Stats. 1901, p. 34; Stats. 1909, p. 1042); and the acts of 1891 and 1893 for changing the grades of streets and for doing the necessary work for that purpose (Stats. 1891, p. 116; Stats. 1893, p. 91). The act of 1901 provides that the assessment for the costs and expenses must be collected before the contract is let for the work to be done. Therefore, when the board of supervisors by the same section is empowered to enact a procedure as a substitute for these various modes, the implied meaning of the latter grant is that such ordinance may also provide for the collection of the assessment before the doing of the work, or the letting of a contract therefor.

There is no force in the argument that before the assessment can be collected the owner must have the security of a positive order by the supervisors that the tunnel shall be constructed, and that he cannot be held liable upon a mere resolution of intention to construct it. One would be no greater protection than the other. Either could be repealed immediately after it was adopted.

The plaintiffs cite as contrary to this: Waukegan v. Burnett, 234 Ill. 460, 84 N. E. 1061; Clark v. Chicago, 214 Ill. 318, 73 N. E. 358; Gage v. Chicago, 191 Ill. 210, 60 N. E. 896; Holdom v. Chicago, 169 Ill. 109, 48 N. E. 164; Swenson v. Board, 95 Minn. 161, 103 N. W. 895; and Hanscom v. Omaha, 11 Neb. 37, 7 N. W. 739. These cases merely decide that the assessment is void if it is based on benefits which may accrue in the future, not from the improvement to be made or thing to be done with the money raised, but from some other improvement which may or may not be made and which is not included in or provided for by the proceedings; in other words, that the benefits assessed must be produced by the improvement to be made therewith. Thus in Waukegan v. Burnett, the assessment was to condemn a right of way for a sewer. No proceeding to lay the sewer across this land had been commenced. It was held that the land assessed would not be benefited by the acquirement of the mere right to use the strips of land, nor until some provision was made for laying a sewer therein, and that it could not be assessed until that was done. But it was not even suggested that an assessment could not be collected after the proceeding was begun, but before the sewer was laid in pursuance thereof. The statement in Page & Jones on Taxation, §§ 417 and 418, that the property owner "must have a vested right to the improvement, and to the benefits which accrue therefrom," and that a local assessment cannot be levied for an improvement which the city is free to make or not at its discretion, is based on these decisions and can mean nothing more than that where the assessment for one improvement is founded on benefits to flow solely from another improvement which is not made, or which will not accrue at all unless some other thing is done for which, as yet, no proceeding has been begun and no order has been made, such future and contingent benefit will not support the assessment. These authorities do not contravene or affect the proposition that, in the absence of constitutional restrictions, the state may provide for the payment of the assessment before the doing of the work or the letting of the contract therefor. In Bellevue I. Co. v.

Bellevue, 39 Neb. 887, 58 N. W. 446, also cited by respondent, the language of the opinion is somewhat loose; but the point decided was that the assessment was void because it had been made without any regard whatever to the cost of the proposed improvement and without any estimate thereof. In the present case the ordinance enacted by the board of supervisors makes full provision for a complete and accurate estimate of the expenses of the proposed tunnel before the levying of any assessment therefor, and this procedure was scrupulously followed.

[5] 4. Another objection is that the supervisors, arbitrarily and without notice or authority, as it is claimed, raised the amount assessed against the plaintiffs from $3,317.50 to $3,351.57. We think this claim is unfounded. The raise was made in the regular course of procedure prescribed by the ordinance under which the supervisors were acting and in pursuance of the authority given thereby and sanctioned by the charter as aforesaid. It was made by the board of supervisors upon the hearing which the ordinance authorized that body to hold to consider and determine, finally, the limits of the assessment district, the damages to be allowed, and the amount of the assessment. Such raise was necessary because of the fact that the damages estimated by the board of public works in its tentative report to the supervisors were increased by the supervisors by the addition of $4,440. Under the terms of the ordinance, the assessment was to be made by the supervisors at the close of the hearings, not by the board of public works as claimed; it was not deemed to be made and completed until that time, and the so-called raise was not a raise of the assessment, but only an increase made by the supervisors in the proposed estimate thereof reported by the works board. Such increase by the supervisors was expressly authorized by the ordinance and was not without authority.

[6] There was no want of notice. The supervisors met at the time and place fixed for the hearing. Due notice thereof had been given as required by the ordinance. Plaintiffs did not appear and filed no protest. The supervisors proceeded with the hearing of the protests filed and decided to allow the addition of $4,440 to the damages to be paid, ordered an increase of the assessment to cover the additional sum, and then continued the hearing four weeks to give time to make the calculations made necessary by the change. No additional or personal notice was given to the plaintiffs of this continuance or of the increase in the damages and in the assessment. This is the want of notice complained of. No such additional notice was required. The ordinance provided that "said hearing may be continued from time to time by the board of supervisors and all parties interested shall be deemed to have notice of such continuance or continuances." The plaintiffs were bound by the notice of the hearing previously given, and were required to take notice that a continuance might be ordered. They had the privilege of attending at the hearing and of contesting any claim made for increase of damages. By failing to appear they waived the right and are concluded by the result.

[7] 5. Next it is claimed that the charter does not authorize the board of supervisors to direct a summary sale of property to pay the amount assessed against it for tunnel construction, nor to enact an ordinance authorizing such sale by the street superintendent.

Section 33, chapter 2, art. 6, above quoted, empowers the board of supervisors to adopt "any method of procedure in any general law" providing for "levying assessments for the expense" of public improvements upon private property, or, at its option, to enact an ordinance "providing a method of procedure for such improvement and assessment." We have referred to these general laws in discussing the third objection. Each statute provides, as part of the procedure, a mode for enforcing from the property owner payment of delinquent assessments. The act of 1889, the act of 1903, and the act of 1893, each provides for the collection of the assessment, if delinquent, by a summary sale of the property, to be made by the street superintendent. The acts of 1891 and 1893, for the grading of streets, provide a like mode of collection. The act of 1901 and the act of 1909, for the improvement of streets, each provides for such sale by the tax collector, if necessary to compel payment of the assessment for the cost and expenses. The conclusion seems clear that it was intended to give power, by the ordinance thus to be adopted as a substitute for the statutory procedure, to likewise provide a method of collection by summary sale; and, as every statutory method of procedure referred to includes a mode of collection of delinquent assessments, it is not reasonable to suppose that it was intended to limit the board of supervisors to the adoption of a procedure which did not include some method of enforcing collection.

[8] Another consideration leads to the same conclusion. It is to be presumed that the charter intended to authorize a procedure that would be practical and effectual to accomplish the object in view, the construction of the tunnel. In all cases where damages may be claimed by property owners from the doing of public work, the funds necessary to pay the same must be first provided; the collection thereof must precede the doing of the work. Some method of enforcing the collection of the assessments in such cases must therefore be provided. The collection could not be intrusted to a contractor, since there would be none at that time. It was necessary, or at least appropriate, to authorize the collection thereof by a public officer in advance of the doing of the work and by a summary sale rather than by a foreclosure proceeding. Section 1, c. 8, authorizes the board to "levy the cost and expense" upon private property. The word "levy" has a meaning broad enough to cover such mode of collection. In its usual sense it means the obtaining of money by seizure and sale of property. 2 Bouvier's Dic. 194; Standard Dic.; Webster's Dic.; State v. Camp Sing, 18 Mont. 145, 44 Pac. 516, 32 L. R. A. 635, 56 Am. St. Rep. 551. It is true that the word may, according to the context, mean other things; as, for example, the apportionment of the amount to be raised, the fixing of the rate, the ordering of the tax, the extending in the tax roll of the sums to be charged, or the determination of the total amount thereof. But the amendments of the charter adopted at the same time and relating to the same subject are to be considered as a whole. The presumption is that they were intended to be consistent and harmonious. In view of the provisions of section 33 giving power to adopt a procedure which includes a summary sale to enforce collection of assessments, we are of the opinion that the word "levy" in section 1, c. 8, is to be given the broader meaning, and that it includes the sale of property to raise money. For these reasons, we conclude that the sale by the street superintendent was lawfully authorized by the ordinance.

[9] We are aware of the rule that a city has no powers not expressly given by the terms of its charter or necessarily implied therefrom. This does not do away with the rules of interpretation. All of a charter is to be considered in arriving at the meaning of any part of it, wherever it appears that the context aids or controls such meaning. If with the aid of the context, or by the application of other correct rules of interpretation, the conclusion is reached that a power is granted, the rule first stated is fully satisfied.

6. Lastly, the plaintiff objects that the sale is void because it was made more than ten days after January 14, 1913, the time fixed therefor in the notice of sale. Three days before that time a property owner obtained a temporary injunction restraining the sale. This injunction was dissolved on January 31, 1913. The findings state:

> "That afterwards, the said tax collector proceeded to continue the sales, * * * stating that he would sell the same on Friday, the 7th day of February, 1913."

It is further found that on February 7, 1913, without request from any person connected with these proceedings, the tax collector continued the sale until Tuesday, February 11, 1913. There are two grounds upon which it must be held that this objection is untenable.

[10] (a) The provision of the ordinance upon the subject is that on the day fixed for the sale, "if for any reason the sale does not take place, the sale may be continued until the next day and so on from day to day, or postponed until another day, not more than ten days thereafter, and all parties shall be deemed to have notice of all or any such continuance or postponements." The contention of the plaintiff is that this clause forbids the postponement for more than ten days either by continuances from day to day, or by postponements for periods exceeding one day. There is nothing in the ordinance expressly authorizing a postponement where the sale is enjoined. It is reasonable to presume that this provision was intended to give power to postpone the sale from time to time or from day to day if an injunction or any other matter made it necessary to postpone the day of sale. It seems to favor the property owner as much as the city or general public. Its object is to save the expense of readvertising. We think the natural construction of the language is that postponements from day to day or from time to time may be made indefinitely, but that a single postponement for a time exceeding one day must not exceed ten days, that it does not forbid successive postponements of ten days or less each, nor daily postponements exceeding in all ten days.

[11] (b) As we find the assessment to be valid, the property of the plaintiffs is justly liable for its due proportion thereof. In such cases, the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief in a court of equity unless he shall pay, or offer to pay, the amount actually due upon the assessment against his property. As was said in Ellis v. Witmer, 134 Cal. 253, 66 Pac. 303:

> "This being the case, they cannot successfully invoke the assistance of a court of equity against the irregularities in the sale complained of, unless on the condition of paying what is due from them. * * * Here, no such condition has been imposed by the court, nor is there an offer in the complaint to pay what is due. The plaintiffs were therefore not entitled to relief."

This states precisely the fact and the law with respect to the present case.

We find no ground upon which the decision of the court below can be sustained.

The judgment is reversed.

TELEGRAPH HILL NEIGHBORHOOD ASS'N v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 6801.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 8, 1917. Rehearing Denied Feb. 7, 1917.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Proceeding by Telegraph Hill Neighborhood Association against the City and County of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Percy V. Long, George Lull, and Theodore Savage, all of San Francisco, for appellant. J. A. Cooper, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal involves the same tunnel assessment that was under consideration in Hayne et al. v. City and County of San Francisco, 162 Pac. 625 (S. F. No. 6802), this day decided. The parties have stipulated that the facts are the same, except as to the parties and the amount of the assessment, and that the decision in this case shall be the same as in No. 6802. The same judgment is therefore given. The judgment is reversed.

1. ARBITRATION AND AWARD ⟹73 — JUDGMENT—APPEAL.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1289, providing that a decision upon a motion to modify or set aside an award is subject to appeal, a separate appeal will not lie from the judgment entered on an award, even though the entry occurs after a decision on a motion to vacate made under sections 1287 and 1288; only appeal allowable being from the decision on the motion.

2. ARBITRATION AND AWARD ⟹80—STATUTES —REASONABLE INTENDMENT.

Every reasonable intendment will be indulged in to give effect to arbitration proceedings.

3. ARBITRATION AND AWARD ⟹76—REVIEW.

Where the submission to arbitration is unqualified, a court will not set aside the award on the ground that it is contrary to the law or evidence, unless error appears on the face of the award.

4. ARBITRATION AND AWARD ⟹1 — UNDER STATUTE.

The common-law principles of arbitration have not been changed by statute.

5. ARBITRATION AND AWARD ⟹76—TERMS OF SUBMISSION—EFFECT.

Where arbitrators are required by the terms of submission to determine a matter according to law, a failure to so determine is sufficient ground to avoid the award.

6. ARBITRATION AND AWARD ⟹29—RECORDING PROCEEDING—"JUDGE PRO TEMPORE."

An agreement that a submission to arbitration shall be entered as an order of the court under Code Civ. Proc. § 1283, does not make the arbitrator a judge pro tempore of such court under Const. art. 6, § 8, as amended.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Judge Pro Tempore.]

7. BILLS AND NOTES ⟹429 — PAYMENT BY CLERK.

Where the payee of a genuine check indorsed it to his bank for collection, and the bank in turn, instead of cashing it, deposited it in the bank upon which it is drawn, there being no fraud, the drawer is relieved from liability, even though the drawee is insolvent, as the giving of credit on deposit will be treated as payment, though the drawer knows that this is the usual way in which his checks are disposed of.

8. CORPORATIONS 🔑428(9) — KNOWLEDGE OF OFFICER IMPUTED TO CORPORATION.

Although the president of a bank was also treasurer of a corporation which was drawer of a check on the bank, and knew that the bank was insolvent, such knowledge will not be imputed to the corporation, not having been obtained in the regular discharge of duties as treasurer of the corporation.

9. NOVATION 🔑4—ACCEPTANCE OF CHECK.

The giving of a check to a payee who indorses it to his bank for collection, the bank in turn depositing it to his credit with drawee, is not, as to drawer and payee, a novation under Civ. Code, § 1530, providing that "novation is the substitution of one obligation for an existing one," and hence section 1533 is not applicable.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Novation.]

10. BILLS AND NOTES 🔑429—EXONERATION OF DRAWER.

Civ. Code, § 3255, exonerating drawers of checks from liability, applies only where there has been delay in presentment, and not to cases in which a check has been presented to the drawee and his credit accepted in lieu of cash.

11. ARBITRATION AND AWARD 🔑73 — TERMS OF SUBMISSION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Unless otherwise provided by the terms of submission to arbitrator, the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the award will not be reviewed on appeal.

12. ARBITRATION AND AWARD 🔑73—AWARD —REVIEW.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1287, does not authorize the court on appeal to determine the sufficiency of evidence to sustain an award.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Utah Construction Company against the Western Pacific Railway Company. From an order denying plaintiff's motion to set aside an award in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gavin McNab, B. M. Aikins, R. P. Henshall, and Luther Elkins, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Warren Olney, Jr., O. K. McMurray, F. W. McCutcheon, John S. Partridge, and A. R. Baldwin, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. A controversy existed between the plaintiff and the defendant with regard to a claim by the plaintiff that the defendant was indebted to it in the sum of $236,735.28 on account of the construction by the plaintiff of the defendant's railroad, and the claim of the defendant that such indebtedness had been discharged by the execution and delivery to the plaintiff by defendant of fifteen checks aggregating $153,562.24 and nine checks aggregating $83,175.04 upon the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, bearing date October 22, 1907. On April 29, 1910, the parties agreed in writing to submit said controversy to Charles P. Eells as arbitrator. The agreement empowered him to hear the evidence, judge and determine said controversy, and make a final award thereon, which should be a complete and final adjudication of all the matters so submitted, and provided that the submission should be entered as an order of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, in accordance with section 1283 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Pursuant to this agreement the parties produced evidence, submitted the matter, and the arbitrator made his award thereon declaring that the plaintiff take nothing and that the defendant should have judgment for its costs incurred in the proceedings. This award, signed by the arbitrator, was delivered to the parties and filed with the clerk of said court on April 19, 1913, and a note thereof was thereupon made in the clerk's register. Notice of such filing was served on the plaintiff. On April 23, 1913, the plaintiff duly served and filed a notice of motion in the superior court to vacate and set aside the award. This motion was denied on September 24, 1913. On September 27, 1913, the award was regularly entered by the clerk as a judgment in the judgment book of said court. The plaintiff has filed two notices of appeal—one from the judgment entered by the clerk upon the award; the other from the order of the superior court denying the motion to vacate the award.

The respondent contends that no appeal lies from the judgment entered by the clerk upon the award of the arbitrator. The judgment here involved was entered by the clerk, but the entry was made after the decision by the court on the motion to vacate the award. Section 1289 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "The decision upon the motion is subject to appeal in the same manner as an order which is subject to appeal in a civil action; but the judgment entered before a motion made cannot be subject to appeal."

This embraces the motions authorized by sections 1287 and 1288 only.

[1-3] We are of the opinion that the Code does not allow a separate appeal from the judgment entered upon the award. The policy of the law in recognizing arbitration agreements and in providing by statute for their enforcement is to encourage persons who wish to avoid delays incident to a civil action to obtain an adjustment of their differences by a tribunal of their own choosing. The statutory provisions for a review thereof are manifestly for the sole purpose of preventing the misuse of the proceeding where corruption, fraud, misconduct, gross error, or mistake has been carried into the award to the substantial prejudice of a party to the proceeding. The design was to avoid useless proceedings and to make the practice simple and as speedy as would be consistent with justice. In Peachy v. Ritchie, 4 Cal. 207, it is said that the statute providing for the review of such awards "gives to the parties no higher rights than they might have asserted in a court of equity in case of mistake, fraud or accident." It has also been said that, "by reason of the fact that the proceeding represents a method of the parties' own choice and furnishes a more expeditious and less expensive means of settling controversies than the ordinary course of regular judicial proceedings, it is the policy of the law to favor arbitration. Therefore every reasonable intendment will be indulged to give effect to such proceedings." 5 Cor. Jur. 20; Fluharty v. Beatty, 22 W. Va. 705; Payne v. Crawford, 97 Ala. 607, 11 South. 725; Wilson v. Wilson, 18 Colo. 620, 34 Pac. 175; Russell v. Smith, 87 Ind. 457; Groat v. Pracht, 31 Kan. 656, 3 Pac. 274; Snyder v. Rouse, 58 Ky. (1 Metc.) 627; Mickles v. Thayer, 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 119; Brush v. Fisher, 70 Mich. 473, 38 N. W. 446, 14 Am. St. Rep. 510; Tucker v. Allen, 47 Mo. 490; Caldwell v. Elevator Co., 10 N. D. 580, 88 N. W. 700; Bishop v. Valley, etc., Co., 78 S. C. 315, 58 S. E. 939; Jensen v. Deep Creek, etc., Co., 27 Utah, 75, 74 Pac. 427. In view of this policy of the law the reasonable conclusion is that section 1289 was intended to cover all the methods of review by appeal in arbitration proceedings. Where the submission is unqualified an award cannot be set aside by the superior court, or by the court on appeal, on the ground that it is contrary to the law or the evidence, unless the error appears on the face of the award. Carsley v. Lindsay, 14 Cal. 395. The same rule prevails generally. 5 Cor. Jur. 161. Where a motion, under section 1288, to modify or correct the award, is granted, the order should, of course, direct the judgment to be entered. In that case the appeal from the decision on the motion would embrace the judgment so entered, and would authorize a review of it for any errors on the face of the record and subject to review by the terms of the submission. If a motion, under section 1287, to vacate the award, is granted, the appeal from the order granting it will afford the aggrieved party all the relief he is justly entitled to. If such motion is denied, and the award has not then been entered by the clerk as a judgment, as provided in section 1286, but is entered afterward, the order refusing to vacate the award is equivalent to an order directing a judgment on the award, and the judgment then entered by the clerk will also be embraced in the appeal from the decision on the motion, and errors therein apparent on the face of the record, and made subject to review by the submission, may be reviewed on such appeal. And in any case where an appeal is taken from a decision denying the motion, whether to vacate, correct, or modify the award, such appeal must, of necessity, embrace any judgment on the award, whensoever entered, and make it subject to review for errors on its face. It is clear, therefore, that there is no necessity for a direct appeal from such judgment. Such appeal would be futile. No reason can be found for denying a direct appeal from a judgment on the award entered by the clerk before a decision on a motion made, and allowing it when the clerk enters it after such decision. The Legislature, as we believe, did not intend such distinction, but intended to allow appeals only from the decision on the motions provided for in sections 1287 and 1288. We will therefore consider only the appeal from the decision on the motion.

> "Whenever the arbitrators are required, by the terms of the submission, * * * to determine the rights of the parties according to law, a plain mistake in their construction of the law is sufficient ground upon which to avoid the award. * * * In the absence of special requirements the arbitrators are not bound to decide according to law." 5 Cor. Jur. 183; Id. 172; Morse on Arbitration, 300.

The latter statement would probably not be applicable in this state, even upon an unqualified submission, if the mistake of law appears on the face of the award. Tyson v. Wells, supra; Muldrow v. Norris, supra. The submission in this case was not without qualification. The second paragraph of the agreement provided that, if the arbitrator should find that the defendant did not discharge the debt by the checks in question, he should determine whether "in equity and fairness," upon all the circumstances, it should be required to pay interest upon the debt, and the plaintiff agreed to abide the decision on that point and waive its legal right to interest to the extent of the abatement thereof. The seventh paragraph, referring to the same subject, provided that the arbitrator should "make his judgment and award, according to the legal right of the parties except as to the matter of interest, which shall, as hereinafter provided, be determined in accordance with equity and fairness under all the circumstances of the case." It further provided that the arbitrator might appoint a stenographer to report the evidence; that after the parties had filed their briefs he should make his award in writing stating separately the facts found and conclusions of law, and should attach thereto a transcript of the proceedings and evidence taken before him. All this was done.

[6] There is no merit in the suggestion that the submission constituted the arbitrator a judge pro tempore of the superior court, under the amended section 8, art. 6, of the Constitution. The submission made him an arbitrator, not a judge. The award being for the defendant, the matter of interest is eliminated. As to all other matters, the provisions above mentioned bound the arbitrator to decide in conformity with the law, and left him without authority to do otherwise. 5 Cor. Jur. 183; Morse on Arbitration, 302.

Section 1287 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the superior court, on motion, may vacate an award and may order a new hearing before the same arbitrator, or not, in its discretion, on the grounds:

> "1. That it was procured by corruption or fraud; 2. that the arbitrators were guilty of misconduct, or committed gross error in refusing, on cause shown, to postpone the hearing, or in refusing to hear pertinent evidence, or otherwise acted improperly, in a manner by which rights of the party were prejudiced; 3. that the arbitrators exceeded their powers in making their award; or that they refused, or improperly omitted, to consider a part of the matters submitted to them; or that the award is indefinite, or cannot be performed."

No motion was made to modify or correct the award as provided in section 1288; therefore its provisions are immaterial.

The grounds of the motion to vacate the award were, in substance, as follows: (1) That the award and the findings of fact on which it was based were contrary to the evidence; (2) that it was against law; (3) that the arbitrator committed gross error and was guilty of misconduct: (a) In failing to consider the evidence of the financial condition of the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company from October 22 to October 30, 1907, and of the money it had on hand and of its ability to pay the checks in controversy during said period; (b) in failing to consider evidence upon the question whether or not it would have paid the checks if they had been presented for payment; (c) in failing to consider the evidence of the debit and credit entries made by such company on its books concerning said checks. Under the first ground the notice of motion specifies ten particulars in which it is claimed the evidence does not support the special findings of fact upon which the award is based.

[11, 12] Neither the terms of the submission nor the provisions of section 1287 authorize us to consider the weight of the evidence or to overrule the arbitrator where he has drawn reasonable inferences from the facts proven. There is no foundation for the claim that the arbitrator refused to consider the evidence, or any part thereof, or that his findings are contrary to the evidence. They are fully sustained by the evidence and the inferences legitimately arising therefrom. No mistake of law appears, so far as his consideration of the evidence and its sufficiency is concerned. We cannot inquire further on these subjects. Pratt v. Connor, 128 Cal. 282, 60 Pac. 862; Peachy v. Ritchie, supra.

The only questions remaining for consideration arise out of the claim that, under the qualification of the submission above mentioned, a mistake in the conclusions of law upon the findings should be considered a mistake appearing upon the face of the award, and good ground for vacating it if it affects the substantial rights of the plaintiff on the merits of the case, the theory being that in that event, as he did not decide according to the legal right, he has exceeded his limited power under the agreement in making the award as he did. Our final conclusion on the merits renders it unnecessary to determine whether the submission agreement, when properly construed, did or did not empower him to decide the law wrongly as well as rightly. We may assume, for the purposes of the case, that he was empowered only to decide correctly as to the law, and proceed upon that theory without deciding the point.

The facts on which the decision of the case depends are as follows: The Western Pacific Railway Company on October 23, 1907, owed the Utah Construction Company $236,735.28. It kept money on deposit with the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, which was doing a general banking business in San Francisco. It drew 24 checks in various sums aggregating said amount, each dated October 23, 1907, payable to the Utah Company, upon said Safe Deposit Company, and forwarded them by mail from San Francisco to said Utah Company at Ogden, Utah. They were received there, and by the Utah Company indorsed to the First National Bank of Ogden, for collection only. Said Ogden bank at that time kept a deposit account with said safe deposit company. The said Ogden bank forwarded the checks to the safe deposit company with instructions to credit the same to its account upon the books of said safe deposit company. Upon receipt of these advices the said safe deposit company charged the amount of the checks against the railway company on the books of said deposit company and entered the same as a credit upon the account of said Ogden bank on its books. The railway company then had deposits more than sufficient to cover the checks. All this was done prior to 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the 30th day of October, 1907. Said safe deposit company was during all this time, and for a long time previous thereto, insolvent, but this fact was unknown to the Utah Company, the railway company, and the Ogden bank. On the day last named, shortly after 2 o'clock in the afternoon, said safe deposit company closed its doors and suspended its banking business. Its assets were insufficient to pay its depositors. Upon ascertaining these facts, the Utah Company demanded of the railway company payment of the amount of the checks and the debt aforesaid. At the time said checks were drawn the customary course of business of the Utah Company with respect to checks it received from the railroad company on said safe deposit company was to deposit the same with the said Ogden bank for collection from said safe deposit company in San Francisco, by obtaining credit in the manner above detailed. The railway company was aware of this custom. The checks, however, were sent in due course of business, and there was no direction, order, or understanding by the railway company that they should not be presented to the safe deposit company for payment in money, or that they should be presented for credit only by said Ogden bank with said safe deposit company. At the time these checks were presented to the safe deposit company and credited by it on its books to the Ogden bank, as directed, the safe deposit company had on hand cash and cash resources immediately available sufficient to pay all of the said checks, and would not have refused to do so if payment had been demanded.

[7] Upon these facts, as said by the learned arbitrator:

"The case would seem to turn upon the single question whether the First National Bank of Ogden, plaintiff's agent, having the opportunity to cash these checks and preferring to deposit them and to take credit for the amount for its own purposes, thereby exonerated the drawer, notwithstanding the insolvency of the bank on which they were drawn; the checks having been drawn by defendant and received by plaintiff in good faith."

There is no doubt in our minds that the arbitrator correctly decided this question in the affirmative.

"A credit given for the amount of a check by the bank upon which it is drawn is equivalent to, and will be treated as, a payment of the check. It is the same as if the money had been paid over the counter on the check, and then immediately paid back again to the account or for the use for which the credit is given." 2 Morse on Banks, § 451; Oddie v. Bank, 45 N. Y. 735, 6 Am. Rep. 160; Bartley v. State, 53 Neb. 337, 73 N. W. 744; American, etc., Bank v. Gregg, 138 Ill. 596, 28 N. E. 839, 32 Am. St. Rep. 171; National Bank v. Burkhardt, 100 U. S. 686, 25 L. Ed. 766; Bank v. Burns, 68 Ala. 267, 44 Am. Rep. 138.

"The giving of credit is practically the same as paying the money to the depositor and receiving the cash again on deposit." 2 Morse on Banks, § 569.

"When a check on itself is offered to a bank as a deposit, the bank has the option to accept or reject it, but if it is received as a deposit, there being no fraud or lack of good faith, and the check being genuine and is credited to the depositor, it will operate as a payment." 7 Cyc. 1008.

The rule is the same where the holder of the check obtains credit by having the bank certify the check; the drawer is discharged. 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1055. The fact that the safe deposit company was insolvent at the time of these transactions, they having been made in good faith, and the insolvency being unknown to all the other parties, does not change the effect of the conduct of the bank of Ogden in taking credit with the safe deposit company instead of demanding payment. First National Bank v. Currie, 147 Mich. 82, 110 N. W. 499, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 698, 118 Am. St. Rep. 537, 11 Ann. Cas. 241.

"An indorsee may always insist that the conditions requisite to make his undertaking enforceable shall be strictly complied with, namely, presentment for payment and notice of dishonor." Id.

The drawer of a check has the same rights. Civ. Code, §§ 3177, 3254, 3255. The presentation of the check and the acceptance of credit instead of payment was a waiver of payment. The railway company did not authorize the taking of credit. That act created the relation of debtor and creditor between the safe deposit company and the Ogden bank and satisfied the check. The railway company cannot be held responsible because of the fact that, unknown to both parties, the safe deposit company was insolvent and has been unable to pay and has not paid its debt to the Ogden bank. The fact that the railway company was aware of the custom of the Utah Company to collect checks by creating such indebtedness, instead of exacting payment, does not make the railway company a guarantor of that indebtedness, nor otherwise responsible for its payment.

The plaintiff insists that "the giving of a check upon an insolvent bank is not a payment of the debt for which it is taken." This may be admitted. A check is never a payment of the debt for which it is given until the check itself is paid or otherwise discharged, unless expressly agreed to be taken in payment. Morse on Banks, §§ 543, 544. But here the checks, though not agreed to be taken as payment, were satisfied by the taking of credit therefor. This satisfaction exonerated the railway company, regardless of the solvency or insolvency of the drawee.

The finding that the safe deposit company could and would have paid the checks in cash had payment been insisted on, conceding it to be material, is based on inferences which we cannot say are unreasonable, even if we could inquire into such matters. Hence we cannot disturb the finding.

[8] The fact, that Brown was president of the safe deposit company and also treasurer of the railway company, and that he had, as president, personal knowledge of the insolvency of the safe deposit company, does not make that knowledge imputable to the railway company. He did not control the money of the railway company, nor cause it to be deposited in the safe deposit company, nor have power to do so. That matter was controlled by the latter's board of directors. The duties of Brown as treasurer of the railway company gave him no knowledge of the insolvency of the safe deposit company. His knowledge was not communicated to the former, and therefore cannot be charged to it. Lothian v. Wood, 55 Cal. 162; Wittenbrock v. Parker, 102 Cal. 102, 36 Pac. 374, 24 L. R. A. 197, 41 Am. St. Rep. 172; Iverson v. Metropolitan, etc., Co., 151 Cal. 750, 91 Pac. 609, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 866; 2 Cor. Jur. 863.

[9] Plaintiff also invokes section 1533 of the Civil Code, relating to novation. A novation is the substitution of a new obligation for an existing one. Civ Code, § 1530. The clause of section 1533 relied on provides that a rescission of a contract of novation may be made, when an order of a third person "is accepted in satisfaction," if at the time the order is received the third person on whom it is drawn is insolvent and the fact is unknown to the creditor. The checks of the railway company were not given as payment nor "accepted in satisfaction" of its debt. They were given merely as a convenient mode of payment, and were to operate as payment and satisfaction only in the event that they were paid or otherwise satisfied. The giving and acceptance of the checks was therefore not a novation. The only novation that took place was that between the Ogden bank and the safe deposit company when the former accepted the obligation of the latter in the place of and in discharge of the checks. To that novation the railway company was not a party. A rescission thereof by the two banks and the plaintiff could not place the railway company in statu quo, nor revive its extinguished liability on the checks. Section 1533 has no application to the case.

[10] It is also contended that since, under section 3255 of the Civil Code, the drawer of a check is exonerated by delay in its presentment only to the extent that he suffers injury thereby, and as the safe deposit company was at the time of presentment, and ever since has been, hopelessly insolvent, the railway company has suffered no injury by the delay and is not exonerated. This argument loses sight of the fact that the arbitrator has found that payment could have been made if it had been insisted on. But in any event the section applies only to a case where there has been delay in presentment, not to a case where there was a presentment to the drawee and credit with the drawee was accepted in lieu of cash.

We find no other points deserving of notice. The judgment and order are affirmed.

SMITH v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

1. Master and Servant 🔑416—Workmen's Compensation Act—Injury—Finding—"Knowledge."

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 291) § 20, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1089, § 8, providing that notice in writing, stating the name and address of the person injured, the time, place, and nature of the injury, shall be served upon the employer, provided that actual notice of such injury by the employer or his managing agent or superintendent in charge of the work on which the injured employé was engaged shall be equivalent to such service, a finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that the "employer had knowledge or notice of the happening of said accident within the time prescribed by law" was not a finding of the actual knowledge required by the statute, as the word "knowledge" may include that which is imputed.

2. Master and Servant 🔑405(1)—Workmen's Compensation Act—Knowledge of Injury—Sufficiency of Evidence.

Evidence held not to support a finding that the employer had knowledge or notice of the happening of the accident within the time prescribed by law, even assuming that the word "knowledge" in the finding imports actual knowledge as prescribed by Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1089, § 8.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚿416—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—KNOWLEDGE OF "ACCIDENT"—"INJURY."

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1089, § 8, requiring that written notice, stating the name and address of the person injured, the time, place, and nature of the injury, shall be served upon the employer, a finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that the employer had knowledge of the "accident" was insufficient, as the term "accident" has a narrower meaning than the term "injury," and as the employer might be fully aware that an accident had occurred without even suspecting that an employé thereby suffered an injury.

In Bank. Proceeding under a writ of review by James H. Smith, petitioner, to annul an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California in favor of Charles Rives, an employé of the petitioner. Award annulled, without prejudice to further proceedings before the Commission.

John H. Crabbe, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This is a proceeding under a writ of review to annul an award made in favor of Charles Rives, the employé of the petitioner. The Commission found that Rives was injured by accident in the course of his employment by straining his wrist while endeavoring to release a clamp. It is admitted by the respondent that no written notice of the injury was served upon the defendant employer, and the sole question presented is whether he had actual knowledge of the injury, within the meaning of section 20 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. It was denied by the petitioner in his answer and in his testimony at the hearing that he had any such knowledge of the injury,

[1] We are convinced that the contention of the petitioner must be upheld. The only finding made by the Commission touching the question of knowledge is in these words:

> "That said defendant employer had knowledge or notice of the happening of said accident within the time prescribed by law."

We do not think that this finding on the point of knowledge is sufficient. The statute calls for "actual knowledge," while the word "knowledge" may include that which is imputed. Section 20 provides that:

> "Notice in writing, stating the name and the address of the person injured, the time and the place where the injury occurred, and the nature of the injury * * * shall be served upon the employer; provided, however, that actual knowledge of such injury on the part of such employer, or his managing agent or superintendent in charge of the work, upon which the injured employé was engaged at the time of the injury, shall be equivalent to such service."

It is clear from these provisions that any kind of knowledge, other than actual, or first-hand knowledge, would be insufficient, for the statutory equivalent of the information required to be given in the notice is actual knowledge.

[2] But even assuming that the word "knowledge," as it appears in the finding, imports actual knowledge, and is sufficient under the requirements of section 20, yet we do not think that the finding is supported by the evidence. It is to be noted in this behalf that the finding only refers to the knowledge of the petitioner, and is silent as regards the "managing agent or superintendent." The question, then, is whether there is sufficient evidence to justify a finding that the petitioner himself had actual knowledge of the injury.

On this question it may be remarked that the testimony of Rives is neither very clear nor convincing. He was asked whether any one saw him get hurt, and answered:

> "The foreman, the man acting as foreman, he saw me do it; yes."

The evidence shows that the "foreman" referred to was in the East at the time of the hearing, and there was testimony to the effect that he had never been a foreman in that shop. Other testimony follows:

> "Q. Did any one else know at the time you got hurt? A. I do not know if they saw me. They knew I got hurt. Q. Did you complain to Mr. Smith that you were hurt? A. Yes; he knew I was hurt. Q. When did you report to him? A. About the time I got hurt. Q. What did you tell him? A. I told him I hurt my hand, my wrist. Q. Did you tell him how you hurt it? A. Yes; on the Monday morning I did not go to work. * * * Q. Was any one present when you told Mr. Smith that you had been hurt? A. No; I do not think so. I could not say as to that. * * * Q. Did you see Mr. Smith any time you were laid off that month—not working? A. Yes; he asked how I was and I told him, 'Pretty good.' Q. When was the first time you told him that you got hurt while working in his employment? A. The same day I got hurt. Q. Did you tell him then, explain to him how you got hurt? A. Yes. He never listened though, much. He walked away. * * * Q. You say that the very day the accident occurred you reported it to Mr. Smith? A. Yes. Q. Mr. Smith denies that he had any knowledge of the fact, or the assertion on your part that you were injured in his shop, until he had received a notice from the Commission. Is that true, or not? A. It is not true. It is a lie. Q. Will you state when, as nearly as you can recall, the same day as you were injured, when you told Mr. Smith? A. Right after I got hurt. Q. Was Mr. Smith in the shop at the time you were injured? A. It was Scott or Smith. They were both bosses. Q. Was Smith there? I am speaking of Smith. A. I do not know about that. Q. You said you told Smith immediately after. It was Smith, and not Scott?

A. Scott knows about it, too. Q. Will you state in which part of the shop Smith was standing when you told him you were injured. A. I do not know what part of the shop. Q. But you know you told him? A. Of course, I know."

The petitioner in his testimony flatly denied that Rives ever spoke to him about being hurt. And Scott testified that he was the foreman of the shop when the accident occurred, but only learned of it from others. We have quoted all the testimony of Rives bearing on the subject of the petitioner's alleged knowledge of the injury, because it clearly shows that it was information conveyed to the petitioner, rather than his actual knowledge of the injury upon which the award was made. It is plain that, in the contemplation of section 20, the petitioner had no actual knowledge of the injury. It is not even suggested that he was on the premises at the time. From an examination of the record it is evident that the Commission proceeded on the theory that, in the absence of a written notice, it is sufficient to prove that oral information of the injury was given to the employer within the statutory period of 30 days.

[3] It is also proper to note that the Commission found that the employer had knowledge of the "accident," while the present statute (St. 1915, p. 1089) requires knowledge of the "injury." We think the term "accident" has a narrower meaning than "injury." The employer might be fully aware that an accident had taken place in his shop without even suspecting that his employé thereby suffered an injury. That a wider meaning is to be given to the term "injury" than to "accident" is further indicated by the fact that formerly the statute required actual knowledge of the "accident and injury." Stats. 1913, p. 291. We have examined these questions with great care for the reason that they involve the jurisdiction of the Commission, for unless the provisions of section 20 have been complied with, by its express terms "no claim to recover compensation under this act shall be maintained."

The second proviso of section 20 reads:

"Provided, further, that the failure to give any such notice, or any defect or inaccuracy therein, shall not be a bar to recovery under this act if it is found as a fact in the proceedings for the collection of the claim that there was no intention to mislead or prejudice the employer, and that he was not in fact misled or prejudiced thereby."

Evidence was introduced by the petitioner thereunder, but the Commission made no finding.

Award annulled, without prejudice to further proceedings before the Commission.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. PILLSBURY et al.

MASTER AND SERVANT ⚷419—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—LIMITATIONS—ANSWER.

Where the insurance carrier which had made voluntary payments to a disabled employé, in answer to his claim for permanent partial disability benefits made more than six months after the last voluntary payment did not rely on the six months' limitations for filing claims prescribed by the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 287), § 16a, it could not raise the issue of limitations on a petition for a rehearing of the award.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. ⚷419.]

In Bank. Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by James E. McGee, employé, to recover compensation for partial disability. Opposed by United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, insurance carrier. A. J. Pillsbury and others, commissioners of the Industrial Accident Commission, awarded compensation to the employé, and the insurance carrier brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

Lloyd S. Ackerman, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. Writ of certiorari to review and annul an award for disability indemnity made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of James E. McGee, and against the petitioner as the insurance carrier for the Daniel Contracting Company.

For a time after the accident the petitioner made voluntary payments to the injured employé. But the payments were finally discontinued on May 12, 1915, upon the ground that the disability had ceased. After more than six months had elapsed from the date of the last payment, the employé applied to the Commission for compensation, and was awarded a permanent partial disability indemnity. The petitioner raises the objection that the Commission, under the provisions of section 16 (a) of the Compensation Act, was without jurisdiction to make the award. This identical question was decided adversely to the employer in Red River Lumber Co. v. A. J. Pillsbury et al., 161 Pac. 982, filed December 15, 1916. The ruling therein is decisive of this appeal.

It is proper to note, however, that the case at bar differs in one particular. Here the petitioner filed an answer. But he does not, directly or indirectly, plead therein the statute of limitations under section 16 (a), or otherwise suggest or raise the point that the claim of the applicant is barred. The answer, after alleging full payment of compensation in certain installments which are set forth, reads as follows:

> "That applicant's disability arising out of the alleged accident ceased and terminated on or before said May 12, 1915, and defendants deny that applicant is entitled to any further compensation than the amount paid as above alleged."

There are no further allegations. It is obvious that the answer was intended merely as a defense on the merits of the claim. Although the date of the last payment is alleged, the answer does not refer to the time of filing the application for compensation, or even suggest that it was filed more than six months after the said payment. The petitioner did not, in fact, assume to interpose any form of plea based upon the statute of limitations, but raised the point for the first time in the petition for a rehearing of the award.

The award is affirmed.

HUNT, County Treasurer, v. WICHT.
(L. A. 3742.)

1. Deeds 🔑61—Delivery to Third Person—Death of Grantor.

Where a deed is deposited by the grantor with a third person, to be delivered to the grantee on grantor's death, with the intention that title shall vest only on such delivery to the grantee, the deed is inoperative, as an attempt by the grantor to make a testamentary disposition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 140, 141; Dec. Dig. 🔑61.]

2. Deeds 🔑61 — Delivery to Third Person—Death of Grantor—Effect.

A deed deposited by the grantor with a third person for delivery to the grantee on grantor's death, with intention by the grantor to make his delivery absolute, vests present title in the grantee, the grantor retaining only a life estate.

3. Taxation 🔑861 — Inheritance Tax — Retroactive Effect.

The Inheritance Tax Law (St. 1911, p. 713), taxing transfers "to take effect in possession or enjoyment at" grantor's death, "whether made before or after the passage of this act," cannot lawfully be given retroactive effect to tax a transfer effected by a deed which, before the passage of the act, was delivered absolutely to a third party to be delivered to the grantee on the grantor's death, since such grant vested a present title in the grantee, subject to grantor's life interest, which vested property right could not thereafter be lawfully destroyed, impaired, or burdened under the guise of a succession tax on account of the transfer; it being immaterial that such transfer was made in contemplation of death or without valuable consideration.

4. Taxation 🔑861—Transfer Tax.

The question of liability to a transfer tax must be determined by the law in force at the time of the vesting in interest of property rights, and not that in force at the time when the grantee has the right to actual physical possession.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Proceeding by John N. Hunt, as county treasurer, against Mathilde Wicht, executrix. From judgment for defendant, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Robert A. Waring, of Sacramento, and John W. Carrigan, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Ernest C. Griffith and Frederick H. Griffith, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This proceeding was instituted against Ulrica Garms in the superior court of Los Angeles county for the purpose of having it determined that a tax was due the state from her under our act establishing a tax on gifts, inheritances, transfers, etc. (Stats. 1911, p. 713), on account of a transfer of certain real property to her by her husband, William Garms, having the amount of such tax fixed, and collection of such amount enforced. A demurrer to the petition was sustained, and petitioner refusing to amend judgment was given that the proceeding be dismissed. We have here an appeal from such judgment.

[1] The whole theory of the petition is that there was an effectual transfer by deed which was subject to a tax under our law. It is on the theory only of such a transfer that the proceeding is based, and any tax claimed. The material facts as to the transfer are substantially stated in the petition as follows: On April 12, 1905, William Garms was the owner of three small parcels of land in Los Angeles county. On that day he "executed a deed conveying to" said Ulrica Garms all of said property, "and thereupon delivered said deed to one Mathilde Wicht in escrow, to be delivered to the grantee therein named, * * * upon the death of said William Garms." On April 18, 1913, he died, and on the same day Mathilde Wicht delivered the deed to the grantee named therein. The allegations of these facts are followed in the petition by the following, viz.:

> "Your petitioner is informed and believes and therefore alleges that said deed was made, executed and delivered by said decedent as aforesaid in contemplation of his death and without valuable consideration, and that the same was intended to take effect in possession and in enjoyment as to the grantee therein named, respondent herein, after the death of said grantor."

So far as the statement herein contained as to the intention of the grantor with regard to the taking effect of the deed is concerned, it must necessarily be limited to his intention as to the mere actual possession and enjoyment of the property conveyed incidental to the ownership of a life estate therein, and cannot be taken as alleging an intention that title to the property should not immediately pass to the grantee upon the delivery of the deed in escrow. Otherwise we would have no operative transfer at all, and consequently nothing whatever upon which to base this claim for a tax. The case would fall within the rule declared in Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 637, 151 Pac. 1, 3 (Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703), as follows:

> "So, too, if it be the intention of the grantor when he deposits a deed that it shall only be delivered to the grantee by the depositary after the death of the grantor, and that the title is to vest only upon such delivery after his death, then the deed is entirely inoperative as constituting an attempt by the grantor to make a testamentary disposition of his property. This may only be done by will executed as required by the law of wills of this state, and a deed, the purpose of which is intended to be testamentary, cannot be given effect."

The petition must be taken as presenting the case of one making an absolute, unconditional conveyance of property and delivering it to a third party to be delivered to the grantee on the death of the grantor, with the intention on his part of making the delivery absolute and placing it beyond his power thereafter to revoke or control the deed. Such clearly was the intention of the pleader.

Concededly such a transfer may be taxed by the state. The difficulty in the case at bar is that at the time the deed was so executed and delivered to Mathilde Wicht in escrow there was no law imposing any tax on such a transfer as was here made. At that time the so-called "Collateral Inheritance Act" of 1893 (Stats. 1893, p. 193) was in force, the subsequent act approved March 20, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 374), which contained a provision repealing the act of 1893, being made by its express terms to take effect only from and after July 1, 1905. There was no effectual repeal of the act of 1893 prior to the date last named. The act of 1893 expressly excepted from the operation of its provisions any transfer to specific relatives including the wife of a grantor. It is conceded here that the grantee was the wife of the grantor at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed in escrow and that if reliance must be based on the act of 1893 there is no liability for a tax on account thereof. The claim is that the act in force at the time of the death of the grantor, viz., the act approved April 7, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 713), is the one that governs, especially as that act in terms provides for a tax on any transfer by deed "made without valuable and adequate consideration in contemplation of the death of the grantor, * * * or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death," when the party taking "becomes beneficially entitled in possession or expectancy to any property or the income therefrom, by any such transfer, whether made before or after the passage of this act." The words we have italicized are relied on as clearly showing an intention to impose the tax on transfers previously fully and effectually made. It may be conceded for the purposes of this decision that such was the intent. The question then is whether such a retroactive effect may lawfully be given to the statute.

[2-4] The well-settled effect of such a transaction as is shown by the petition is well stated by Mr. Justice Lorigan in the opinion in Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 Pac. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703, which was concurred in by all the members of the court. It was said:

> "It is well settled that a person may make a conveyance of property and place it in the hands of a third party to be delivered to the grantee named in it on the death of the grantor, and that such a delivery will be effectual to pass a present title to the property to the grantee, if the intention of the grantor is to make such delivery absolute and place it beyond the power thereafter to revoke or control the deed. Where delivery is made under these circumstances and with this intention, it is fully operative and effective to vest a present title in the grantee, the grantor retaining only a life estate in the property and the third party or depositary holds the deed as a trustee for the grantee named in it. Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 451 [33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186]; Moore v. Trott, 156 Cal. 353 [104 Pac. 578, 134 Am. St. Rep. 131]." (The italics are ours.)

Other decisions such as Keyes v. Meyers, 147 Cal. 702, 82 Pac. 304, Estate of Cornelius, 151 Cal. 550, 91 Pac. 329, and Husheon v. Kelley, 162 Cal. 656, 124 Pac. 231, may be cited in support of this statement of the law in this state. We have then the case of a grant of land so executed and delivered on April 12, 1905, as to be fully operative and effective on that date to vest a present title in the grantee, subject only to a life interest in the grantor; "an executed conveyance" (Estate of Cornelius, supra) of this property in fee-simple absolute, subject only to this life interest. Could the Legislature subsequently lawfully impose a succession tax upon this fully executed transfer of title, such tax accruing at the termination of the grantor's reserved life estate, simply because in the meantime the grantee was debarred by the intervening life estate from actual possession of the property conveyed and the other incidents of a life estate? It appears to us that to state the question is to answer it. The succession to the property by the grantee which is the thing attempted to be taxed, was complete upon the delivery of the deed in escrow, notwithstanding the reservation of the life estate. The whole estate conveyed vested irrevocably in interest at once, not withstanding that actual possession of the property itself and enjoyment of the profits thereof were deferred until the death of the life tenant. His death added nothing to the title theretofore acquired by the grantee, and there was no transfer of any property in any legal sense at the time of such death, or at any time subsequent to the delivery in escrow. The right of the grantee to have actual physical possession of the property itself, and enjoyment of the other incidents of an estate for life upon the death of the life tenant was absolutely vested by the delivery of the deed in escrow, and nondefeasible, and the Legislature could not thereafter lawfully destroy, impair, or burden this property right under the guise of a succession tax on account of the transfer. As said in Matter of Craig, 97 App. Div. 289, 89 N. Y. Supp. 971 (affirmed 181 N. Y. 551, 74 N. E. 1116):

> "The underlying principle which supports the tax is that such right (the right of succession) is not a natural one, but is in fact a privilege only, and that the authority conferring the privilege may impose conditions upon its exercise. But when the privilege has ripened into a right it is too late to impose conditions of the character in question, and when the right is conferred by a lawfully executed grant or contract it is property and not a privilege, and as such is protected from legislative encroachment by constitutional guarantees."

It is the vesting in interest that constitutes the succession, and the question of liability to such a tax must be determined by the law in force at that time. This view is not opposed to Estate of Woodard, 153 Cal. 39, 94 Pac. 242, cited by appellant, where the statute in force at the time of death of a testator was held applicable, rather than a later act, simply because it was at the time of such death that the estate vested in the devisee and legatee. What we have said appears perfectly clear on principle, and is sustained by practically all of the authorities in other states where the question has arisen. In New York the matter is thoroughly settled by several decisions. In the Matter of Pell, 171 N. Y. 48, 55, 63 N. E. 789, 791 (57 L. R. A. 540, 89 Am. St. Rep. 791), it is said that such a transfer tax being one not imposed on property, but upon the right to succession, it "follows that where there was a complete vesting of a residuary estate before the enactment of the transfer tax statute, it cannot be reached by that form of taxation," and also, "if these estates in remainder were vested prior to the enactment of the Transfer Tax Act, there could be in no legal sense a transfer of the property at the time of possession and enjoyment. This being so to impose a tax based on the succession would be to diminish the value of these vested estates, to impair the obligation of a contract and take private property for public use without compensation." See, also, Matter of Craig, supra.

It was said in the Matter of Delano, 176 N. Y. 486, 68 N. E. 871, 64 L. R. A. 279, referring to In re Pell, supra:

> "In that case the transfer was completed without the aid of a will and the effect was the same as a deed inter vivos. There was no foundation for a succession tax."

There is no New York decision that can fairly be construed as opposed to this view. It is clearly recognized as correct in People v. Carpenter, 264 Ill. 400, 106 N. E. 302, a case relied on for a contrary conclusion, and we have found no case which would sustain a conclusion that were an estate is fully vested by reason of a lawfully executed grant or contract, the Legislature may subsequently lawfully impose a succession tax on account of the transfer.

It is immaterial so far as the question we have discussed is concerned, that it is alleged that the transfer was made "in contemplation of his death and without valuable consideration." The estate conveyed fully vested at the time of the delivery of the deed in escrow, entirely regardless of the motives of the grantor for the conveyance, and without regard to whether the transfer was without valuable consideration, and there was then no law imposing a tax on any such transfer.

The judgment is affirmed.

PACIFIC POWER CO. v. STATE et al.
MONO COUNTY IRR. CO. v. SAME.

(Civ. 1460–1463.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 19, 1916.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑151(4) — Right to Appeal—"Party Aggrieved"—Statute.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 938, giving a right of appeal to a party aggrieved, the state of California, made a defendant with certain fictitious parties in a condemnation proceeding, and disclaiming ownership of the property and alleging that it was improperly joined as a defendant, where the court found against such claim and rendered judgment for the plaintiff against the state, with damages, was a "party aggrieved" entitled to appeal.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Party Aggrieved.]

2. Appeal and Error 🔑771—Briefs—Time for Filing—Rule of Court.

Under a rule of court, requiring that appellant, within 30 days after the filing of the transcript, file with the clerk his printed points and authorities, with proof of the service of one copy upon the attorneys for respondents who shall have appealed separately in the superior court, and providing for an extension of time for good cause shown, appellant state, showing by affidavit of the Deputy Attorney General in charge of a condemnation proceeding against it, that he had filed his affidavit for an extension of time to file briefs, setting forth that the appeals involved a question presented in another case pending before the Supreme Court of the United States, and that there was no attorney of record in such action on appeal; that he believed that if any attorney should appear, it might be stipulated that the hearing of the appeals would be continued until the decision of such pending action; that the firm of attorneys indorsing the complaint had discontinued practice, on which ground and the pressure of official business the time for filing had expired—presented a sufficient excuse, so that a motion to dismiss the appeal for failure to file briefs would be denied.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷771—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT — DEFAULT IN FILING BRIEF.

A large discretion is committed to the court in the exercise of its judgment as to whether a party should be relieved from a default in filing briefs within the time allowed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mono County; W. S. Wells, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Pacific Power Company against the State of California, John Doe, and Richard Roe, and by Mono County Irrigation Company against the same defendants. Judgments for plaintiff in each case, and defendants appeal. Motions to dismiss the appeal in each case denied.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John T. Nourse, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellants. Wm. O. Parker, of Bridgeport, and J. D. Murphy, of Berkeley, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. A motion has been made to dismiss the appeal in each of the above-entitled causes. The facts are identical, and the cases may be considered together. The motion is made upon the grounds:

"(1) That the said defendant and appellant is not a 'party aggrieved' by the judgment in this case within the provisions of section 938 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California; (2) that the said defendant and appellant has failed to comply with the provisions of rule II, subd. 4, of the rules of this court in that it has failed to file its printed points and authorities within the period prescribed."

[1] As to the first point, it may be said that the state of California was the only party against whom the action was brought, except certain fictitious parties, and it is the only party against whom a judgment was obtained, said judgment being:

"That the plaintiff is entitled to judgment in its favor herein as prayed for in its complaint herein, and that it be adjudged and decreed in and by said judgment that the corporation plaintiff pay as compensation and damages to the said defendant, the state of California, for the land herein sought to be condemned, the sum of $1,200," etc.

It is true that defendant in its answer had denied "that the defendant state of California claims to be or is the owner of the property sought to be condemned in said action, and particularly described in paragraph 4 of said complaint," and alleged "that by reason of the facts hereinbefore set forth, the state of California is improperly joined as a party in said action, and that the whole fee estate and interest in the land described in paragraph 4 of said complaint is in the United States of America, and not in the state of California," but the court was more generous toward the defendant than was demanded by its claims, and it was found that:

"It is not true that by reason of the facts, or any of the facts set forth in said answer, or by reason of any facts, the state of California is improperly joined as a party to this action; and it is not true that the whole fee, or any part of the fee, or any interest in the lands herein sought to be condemned, is in the United States of America and not in the state of California."

This was followed by a finding that the value of the land was $1,200, and this, by the judgment, as we have before set out. The court, therefore, having found that defendant was the owner of the land, and having decreed its condemnation, it would necessarily follow that appellant is an aggrieved party. It is said in Estate of Colton, 164 Cal. 5, 127 Pac. 645:

"Under our decisions, any person having an interest recognized by law in the subject-matter of the judgment, which interest is injuriously affected by the judgment, is a party aggrieved and entitled to be heard upon appeal."

[2, 3] As to the second point, the rule requires that:

"Thirty days after the filing of the transcript, the appellant shall file with the clerk his printed points and authorities with proof of the service of one copy thereof upon the attorney or attorneys of each respondent who shall have appealed separately in the superior court."

It is further provided, however, that the time may be extended for good cause shown. In this case, the time was extended, but the period thus enlarged had expired a few days before the motion to dismiss the appeal was given. Appellant, though, was ready, and was granted permission to file its opening brief at the time said motion came on for hearing.

To excuse its failure to file the brief in time, appellant filed the affidavit of John T. Nourse, Deputy Attorney General of the state, in which, among other things, he declared:

"That he had charge of the litigation involved in the above-entitled actions on behalf of the state of California, appellant therein; that on or about the 21st day of December, 1915, affiant filed in this court his affidavit in support of appellant's application for an extension of time to file its opening briefs in each of said cases, setting forth that the appeals in each of said cases involved the question presented in the case entitled Deseret Water, Oil & Irrigation Co. v. State of California, 243 U. S. 415, 37 Sup. Ct. 394, 61 L. Ed. —, then pending before the Supreme Court of the United States, and that there was no attorney of record in the said actions on appeal in this court; that affiant believed that if any attorney should appear of record in said action, a stipulation would be entered into continuing the hearing of said appeals until the determination of said Deseret Case; that the complaints in each of the above-entitled actions were indorsed by Parker & Parker, as attorneys for each of the plaintiffs; that all of the proceedings therein were conducted by Pat R. Parker who on the 2d day of January, 1915, became judge of the superior court in and for the County of Mono; * * * that on numerous occasions the said Pat R. Parker informed affiant that his father, William O. Parker, had long discontinued the practice of the law, that he was no longer associated with him, and that he (William O. Parker) was not associated with him in any of said actions; * * * that said William O. Parker is not the successor to Parker & Parker, and never has been, but said firm has long since been dissolved; * * * that said William O. Parker never has been at any time an attorney or counsel for any of the respondents in any of the above-entitled actions; * * * that all the extensions of time to file appellant's briefs in said actions were obtained from this court by the representatives of the Attorney General's office, located in the city of Sacramento, and affiant had assumed that the time of appellant to file its said briefs was being protected in that manner, and the representatives of said office assumed that affiant, intending to prepare the briefs in said actions, was protecting the time of appellant to file its briefs, and that by reason of these misunderstandings, and by reason of the press of official business of said office, including matters involving the recent primary election and preparation for the coming general election, the time to file said briefs was inadvertently allowed to expire."

It is further stated:

"That affiant was led to believe that another attorney would be substituted for said Parker & Parker, and that he would be notified of the same, so that he might obtain a stipulation continuing these cases, and that he received no such notice."

It has been often stated that courts in the determination of such motions as far as possible should lean toward a hearing of the case upon its merits. It may be said, also, that manifestly a large discretion is committed to the court in the exercise of its judgment as to whether a party should be relieved from such default. The rule itself is, of course, somewhat flexible, and may be set aside when justice requires it.

We have no reason to doubt the good faith of appellant; and, as we are impressed with the showing made to excuse the delay, and, believing that it is the better policy to consider the merits of the cause, the motion to dismiss the appeal in each of said cases is denied.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

PACIFIC POWER CO. v. STATE et al.

(Civ. 1463.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS 🔑51—SURVEYED LANDS—FOREST RESERVE—STATE'S TITLE.

The state's title to surveyed land is not divested by the subsequent creation of a United States Forest Reservation, in the boundaries in which it is included, and the land is not a part of such reservation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 138, 146; Dec. Dig. 🔑51.]

2. PUBLIC LANDS 🔑53—STATE LAND—LIEU LAND—INDEMNITY—STATUTE.

Rev. St. §§ 2275, 2276, as amended in 1891 (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, §§ 4860, 4861) providing that whenever school sections conveyed to the state are lost by inclusion within any reservation, other lands of equal acreage may be selected by the state in lieu of such land as may be lost, is strictly an indemnity grant in case the state never acquired title, but where land had been surveyed and afterwards included in the boundaries of a United States Forest Reservation, and the state's application to have other lands listed in lieu thereof was pending before the General Land Office, the state's title to the land, in the absence of any law of Congress authorizing an exchange, was not divested.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑46—LAND SUBJECT—STATUTE.

Pol. Code, § 3408b, prohibiting the sale of state lands lying within a national forest reservation, does not affect the power of a corporation entitled to exercise eminent domain to condemn such lands in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1240, subd. 2, amended by St. 1915, p. 711, declaring all lands of the state subject to condemnation, saving such lands alone as are not appropriated to some public use, and providing that surveyed and unsurveyed sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections owned by the state or the United States included within a national reserve shall not be condemned as against the United States or the state, where the state's title to land so included has not been thereby divested.

4. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑263—STATE LANDS—CONDEMNATION—JUDGMENT—AFFIRMANCE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1240, subd. 2, in force when an action to condemn land alleged to be owned by the state and situated within the boundaries of a subsequently created national forest reserve, provided that lands belonging to the state might be taken for public use, and as amended in May 21, 1915, effective August 8, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 711), provided that all sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, both surveyed and unsurveyed, owned by the state or the United States, then or hereafter included within a national reserve, should not be condemned as against the United States or the state. In a proceeding by a power company to condemn such land, there was a judgment for the petitioner filed and recorded May 29, 1915, sustaining its right to sue the state, though the final order of condemnation as provided in section 1253 had not been entered. Held, on appeal from the preliminary order or judgment of condemnation, that as the judgment was permitted by the statute in force when it was rendered, it would be affirmed.

5. JUDGMENT 🔑2 — VALIDITY — CHANGE IN LAW.

The validity of a judgment is to be determined by the laws in force at the time of its rendition, and is not affected by subsequent changes therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mono County; W. S. Wells, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Pacific Power Company against the State of California, John Doe, and Richard Roe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John T. Nourse, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellants. W. O. Parker, of Bridgeport, and J. D. Murphy, of Berkeley, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. [1, 2] The action was brought in the superior court of Mono county for the purpose of condemning certain lands alleged to be owned by the state and situated within the boundaries of a United States forest reserve, to wit, the Stanislaus Forest Reserve. The land is a portion of the southwest quarter of section 16, T. 2 N. R. 25 E., M. D. B. and M., and was included in said forest reserve by proclamation of September 7, 1906. All of the lands sought to be condemned were surveyed lands at the time of the creation of said forest reserve, and the state has applied to the United States for other lands in lieu of the entire southwest quarter of said section, but such lands have not been listed to the state. Appellant states in its reply brief that:

> "The case at bar is different from the Deseret Case in that the offer of the state was actually accepted by the United States, and other lands in lieu of the greater portion of the lands here under consideration were listed to the state prior to the commencement of this action."

In this statement appellant seems to be in error. The land described in the amended complaint is all located in the southwest quarter of said section, and, according to the records in the surveyor general's office, the state has offered to exchange said land for other lands, but the application is still pending in the General Land Office at Washington, D. C. It may be said, though, that under the decisions, the result would be the same in either case. The status of school lands included within a federal reservation received able and elaborate consideration in Hibberd v. Slack (C. C.) 84 Fed. 571, and Deseret, etc., Co. v. State of California, 167 Cal. 147, 138 Pac. 981. In the former, it is said:

> "In construing the act of February 28, 1891 ('An act to amend sections 2275 and 2276 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, providing for the selection of lands for educational purposes in lieu of those appropriated for other purposes'), there are certain well-established principles of law, applicable to school sections, which should be constantly borne in mind, as follows: First. Title to a school section, if unincumbered at date of survey, then vests absolutely in the state. Cooper v. Roberts, 18 How. 173 [15 L. Ed. 338]; Haydenfeldt v. Mining Co., 93 U. S. 634 [23 L. Ed. 995]. And this is the principle recognized and acted upon by the Department of the Interior. * * * After title has thus vested, the section is not subject to any further legislation by Congress. Therefore the school sections which were the bases of the selections of the lands sued for in the case at bar, although situated within the limits of forest reservations, are not parts of such reservations. Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. 513 [10 L. Ed. 264]; Railroad Co. v. Whitney, 132 U. S. 357 [10 Sup. Ct. 112, 33 L. Ed. 363]. Second. Until the surveys in the field of the school sections, to wit, 16 and 36, the United States has full power of disposition over them; and by the exercise of this power said sections may be lost to the state. Hence, and through various enactments of Congress, has arisen the law of indemnity, whose cardinal doctrine is compensation for loss. Thus, it has been said, 'the principle upon which indemnity is given to a state is for a loss. It is not given for that which the state has already received.' Poisal v. Fitzgerald, 15 Law Dec. Dep. Int. 19."

In the Deseret Case, in reference to said United States statute, it is declared through Mr. Justice Henshaw:

> "The federal grant was strictly an indemnity grant and nothing else. Such would appear manifest from a reading of the language of the federal statutes, and such is the decision of the Circuit Court of the United States in the carefully considered and elaborately reasoned case of Hibberd v. Slack, 84 Fed. 571, and the conclusion necessarily follows that a section such as this may not be exchanged with the United States under the indemnity grant provided for by section 2275 of the Revised Statutes of 1891."

In the Hibberd Case, it is to be observed, the matter of exchange had proceeded much farther than in the instant case. Therein the action was for ejectment, and, as stated in the opinion:

> "The complaint alleges that on the 26th day of May, 1893, the surveyor general of California, acting as general agent of said state, and under authority of the act of Congress of February 28, 1891, * * * selected said fractional quarter section, in lieu of certain sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of school lands, which had been included within the limits of forest reservations created by order of the President of the United States; * * * that this selection was accepted by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under his interpretation of the aforesaid act of Congress of February 28, 1891; that on the 14th day of February, 1895, one Anders Paterson purchased said land from said state, and thereafter, for a valuable consideration, sold and assigned his certificate of purchase to plaintiff, who is now the owner thereof; that on April 17, 1896, defendant, without authority of plaintiff, and against his will, took, and continues to hold, possession of said land, and excluded, and now excludes, plaintiff therefrom. The answer does not controvert the foregoing facts, but denies that said facts make plaintiff the owner of the land, or entitle him to the possession of the same. In the answer, the further defense is set up that two of the school sections, which were the basis of the selections of the lands sued for, were surveyed by the United States, before they were included within the forest reservations, and that the title to said sections thereupon became, and still remain, vested in the state of California."

A demurrer to said answer raised the question which the court determined in favor of defendant, holding that the state of California was not entitled to select other lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of school lands situated within the exterior boundaries of a public reservation where said sections were surveyed and became the property of the state prior to the date when the reservation was created. This conclusion was reached, notwithstanding, as we have seen, that the selection of the lieu lands was made by the surveyor general of the state, that the selection was approved by the federal authorities, and the land thus selected was sold for a valuable consideration to an innocent purchaser. It is based upon the theory that as to such surveyed school lands there exists no authority for exchange, that the attempted transfer was utterly void, and that of this infirmity in the title of the United States and of the state in and to the respective tracts a purchaser is charged with notice. However, it may be said as to this that the law contemplates in such cases that the purchase price of the scrip or land shall be refunded.

The Deseret Case, supra, it may be remarked, was entirely similar in its facts to the case at bar. Therein, as here, the action was for condemnation of school lands included within the exterior boundaries of a forest reservation. The tract had been surveyed prior to said inclusion, and an application was pending before the General Land Office of the United States to have other land listed to the state in lieu thereof. It was declared to be beyond the power or authority of the land department of the government "to give, to sell or exchange the public domain without authority from Congress," that Congress had not conferred such authority in reference to the land therein involved, and that:

> "The conclusion upon this branch of the consideration, therefore, necessarily must be that, while the state of California has by appropriate legislation offered to exchange such lands for other lands of the United States, there is no law of the United States authorizing such an exchange, and no act of the Congress of the United States taken in contemplation of any such exchange, present or future."

The main proposition, therefore, of appellant, as to the title of the United States in and to the involved portion of said section 16 much be resolved in favor of respondent.

[3] Another point made by the Attorney General is that section 3408b of the Political Code withdrew these lands from sale, and consequently from the operation of the eminent domain proceedings of the Code of Civil Procedure. The same position was taken in the Deseret Case, supra, and it was answered by the Supreme Court in this way:

> "A further argument upon the general subject is that the state has withdrawn such sections from sale, and that therefore the right of eminent domain may not be exercised regarding them. This, however, cannot be, in contemplation of the general law touching the right of eminent domain. Our statutes do not say that state lands reserved from sale, or state lands not offered for sale, shall not be subject to the right of eminent domain. They declare that all the lands of the state shall be subject to this right, saving such lands alone as are devoted to a public use. The state might to-day have no laws for the sale of its proprietary lands. But this would not affect the power to exercise the right of eminent domain as accorded by the statutes of the state."

Likewise, the contention that this land was devoted to another public use by virtue of its having been included within the boundaries of a national reservation and therefore exempt from the operation of the statute of eminent domain is answered in the negative by said Deseret Case, from which we need make no further quotation.

[4, 5] One other question remains to be considered. Subdivision 2 of section 1240 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it was when this suit was brought, provided that "lands belonging to this state" might be taken for public use. By an amendment passed in 1915 the following proviso was added:

> "Provided, that all sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, both surveyed and unsurveyed, owned by the state or the United States, which may now or may hereafter be included within the exterior boundaries of a national reservation, or of a reserve, or within the exterior boundaries of lands withdrawn from public entry, shall be and are hereby withheld from the operation of this title and shall not be condemned as against the state or the United States." St. 1915, p. 711.

It is the claim of appellant that:

> "This amendment is a clear withdrawal of the right to sue as against the state or the United States for the purpose of condemning these lands."

To this respondent answers:

> "It is difficult to understand how this amendment shall be said to have any effect upon this case or the judgment given below for the reason that the judgment herein was filed and recorded in Mono County, on May 29, 1915. The act amending section 1240, C. C. P., was approved May 21, 1915, but did not go into effect until August 8, 1915."

In the reply brief of appellant, the following statement appears:

> "The judgment in this case having been had under a judicial interpretation of the effect of the Thompson Act, which sustained the right to sue the state, and that judgment not having become final by reason of the appeal taken herein, the subsequent act of the state, expressly and definitely withdrawing the right to sue the state in such proceedings, demands a reversal of the judgment by this court because at this time, the right to sue the state having been denied, the right to enforce a judgment previously entered, but not yet effective, has been taken away."

In support of this contention, the following cases are cited: Messenger v. Kingsbury, 158 Cal. 611, 112 Pac. 65; Ayers v. Kingsbury, 25 Cal. App. 183, 143 Pac. 85; and Railroad Co. v. Alabama, 101 U. S. 832, 25 L. Ed. 973. In the first of these it was held that:

> "Since the enactment of section 3443a of the Political Code on March 25, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 774), further sales by the state of tidelands forming the shore or bed of navigable waters is forbidden. If such lands had theretofore been offered for sale, the Legislature, in passing section 3443a, manifested its intent to withdraw them from further sale under sections 3440 and 3443 of that Code."

The vital question was what effect said section 3443a had as to one who had made application to purchase such land before the section went into effect, but who had not paid the purchase price or any portion of it. The case was learnedly considered by Mr. Justice Sloss, the author of the opinion, and he declared:

> "The disposition of the public lands is a matter resting entirely within the control of the Legislature, and that body has the undoubted right to withdraw or reserve from further sale any part of the public domain. * * * Where a valid contract of sale has been entered into pursuant to law between the state and a purchaser, so that an equitable interest in the land is vested in the latter, the state will, of course be prevented by force of familiar constitutional provisions from destroying the right so vested. * * * But where there is no contract, and no vested right in the intending purchaser, the withdrawal of the land from sale, by repeal of the statute authorizing sales or otherwise, absolutely terminates the power of the officers of the government to take the steps necessary to transfer title."

The plaintiff not having made any payment, it was held that he had no vested right under the law that was repealed, and therefore the conclusion followed that it would be of no avail to compel the surveyor general to file his application since the amendment had operated to withdraw the privilege to purchase such lands. Ayers v. Kingsbury, supra, is to the same effect. The additional point was decided therein that the deposit of $20 required by the act of 1889 (Stats. 1889, page 434)—

> "was intended to be nothing more than a mere conditional deposit, and that the receipt to be given therefor does not become a part of the purchase price, and cannot be accepted as such, before the application to purchase has been approved."

In Railroad Co. v. Alabama, supra, certain statutes, authorizing suit to be brought against the state on its contract, were repealed. The proceedings in the case were begun while these laws were in force, but the repeal took place before the final hearing, and thereupon the suit was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The Supreme Court of the United States was called upon to determine whether the repealing statute was valid and constitutional so far as it affected the pending cause of action which accrued while the right to sue existed. Following the decision in a case from Tennessee, the court held that:

> "Under both the Tennessee and Alabama statutes the courts are made little else than auditing boards. If funds are not * * * provided to meet the judgment, the courts are not invested with power to supply them. In Alabama, a warrant for the payment may be secured, but the state may stop payment by withholding an appropriation. * * * In neither state has there been granted such a remedy for the enforcement of the contracts of the sovereignty as may not, under the Constitution of the United States, be taken away."

The Tennessee Case, therein referred to, is reported in 101 U. S. 337, 25 L. Ed. 960. In that decision it was held to be an elementary principle that a state cannot be sued in its own courts without its consent, and that:

> "The right to sue, which the state of Tennessee once gave its creditors, was not, in legal effect, a judicial remedy for the enforcement of its contracts, and * * * the obligations of its contracts were not impaired, within the meaning of the prohibitory clause of the Constitution of the United States, by taking away what was thus given."

It was said by the court:

> "Here the state has consented to be sued only for the purposes of adjudication. The power of the courts ended when the judgment was rendered. In effect, all that has been done is to give persons holding claims against the state the privilege of having them audited by the courts instead of some appropriate accounting officer. When a judgment has been rendered, the liability of the state has been judicially ascertained, but there the power of the court ends. The state is at liberty to determine for itself whether to pay the judgment or not. * * * Everything after the judgment depends on the will of the state. It is needless to say that there is no remedy to enforce a contract if performance is left to the will of him on whom the obligation to perform rests."

The foregoing as to the facts involved are manifestly quite dissimilar to the case before us. They have to do, however, with the question whether subsequent legislation is within the constitutional prohibition of the enactment of any law "impairing the obligation of contracts." The difficulty, of course is in making proper application of the principle to the particular case. A later decision of the United States Supreme Court (Pennoyer v. McConnaughy, 140 U. S. 1, 11 Sup. Ct. 699, 35 L. Ed. 363), holds that:

> "An application for land, under the Oregon Act of 1870, was not rendered void by state act of 1878, where the first payment for the land was made within the time required by the former act; by such payment the contract with the state became executed, so as to be protected by the United States Constitution against impairment by a state law." "In other words," it was said, "by such payment, this contract with the state became so far executed as to be embraced in the class of contracts protected by section 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that 'no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.'"

It is certainly a debatable question here whether plaintiff has acquired such vested right in the land in controversy as to be unaffected by the said amendment to section 1240. The record does not show that it has paid anything for the land, and it may be doubted whether it is in a position wherein it would be inequitable to apply said amendment. The final order of condemnation, as provided in section 1253 of said Code, has not been entered, and it may be that this contention of appellant could be successfully urged against the entry of such judgment or against its enforcement. But the question should not be determined without fuller argument and more deliberate consideration. This is an appeal from what is generally called the preliminary order of condemnation, and the rule seems well settled that:

> "The validity of a judgment is to be determined by the laws in force at the time of its rendition and is not affected by subsequent changes therein." 23 Cyc. 674.

In Anderson v. Hygeia Hotel Co., 92 Va. 687, 24 S. E. 269, it was said:

> "This is not a court of original, but appellate, jurisdiction, and the writ of error must be disposed of in accordance with the law as it existed at the time of the rendition of the judgment. This court must affirm it, if there is no error therein according to the law as it stood when the judgment was rendered, and, if erroneous, reverse it and enter such judgment as the circuit court 'ought to have entered.'"

In Kansas Pacific Ry. Co. v. Twombly, 100 U. S. 79, 25 L. Ed. 550, it is said:

> "Neither can we, as is asked, send the case back to the court below, with instructions to enter a judgment of nonsuit, because since the judgment below, and while this writ of error has been pending, the statute authorizing the action has been repealed. A writ of error to this court does not vacate the judgment below. That continues in force until reversed, which is only done when errors are found in the record on which it rests, and which were committed previous to its rendition. Here there are no such errors."

Therefore, the judgment was affirmed.

So here, under the decisions as we read them there was no error committed by the trial court, and the judgment was one which was at least permitted by the statute in force at the time said judgment was rendered. The conclusion follows that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

MONO IRR. CO. v. STATE et al. (Civ. 1462.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Mona County; W. S. Wells, Judge.

Condemnation proceeding by the Mono Irrigation Company against the State of California, John Doe, and Richard Roe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Judgment previously rendered in the Appellate District Court set aside, and judgment rendered in the superior court affirmed, and petition for rehearing denied.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John T. Nourse, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellants. Wm. O. Parker, of Bridgeport, and J. D. Murphy, of Berkeley, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In the opinion rendered by this court November 24, 1916, the above-entitled cause and two others, Nos. 1460 and 1461, involving the same plaintiff and defendants, were considered and treated together.

It was mistakenly assumed that this case, like the other two, related to unsurveyed land. It appears, however, that the land for which condemnation was sought herein was surveyed prior to the creation of the said forest reserve. This case ought therefore to have been grouped with Pacific Power Co. (a Corporation), Plaintiff and Respondent v. State of California, John Doe, and Richard Roe, Defendants and Appellants, 162 Pac. 643, decided at the same time.

For the reasons stated in the said latter opinion, the judgment rendered herein is set aside, and the judgment rendered in the superior court is affirmed. The petition for rehearing is denied.

J. I. CASE THRESHING MACH. CO. v. COPREN BROS. et al. (Civ. 1449.)

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES 🔑258 — FORECLOSURE UNDER POWER OF SALE—AGENCY OF MORTGAGEE.

Where personal property was sold pursuant to the mortgagor's written consent and authorization in the mortgage, the mortgagee may be said to have been acting as the mortgagor's agent in making the sale.

2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES 🔑255 — FORECLOSURE BY ACTION—STATUTE—"SECURED."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, allowing but one action for a debt secured by a mortgage, where property had been sold by plaintiff under the written authorization in a chattel mortgage, it having ceased to be security for any part of the balance due on the secured notes, they were not "secured" at the time suit for the balance was brought; the word "secured" being considered as used in the present tense, and referring to a debt that at the time suit was brought was secured by a mortgage subject to exceptions in individual cases.

3. SALES 🔑61 — VALIDITY OF CONTRACT — EXECUTION — ORDER SIGNED BY BUYER ONLY.

A contract for the purchase of an engine in the form of an order signed by the buyer only became an executed contract when it was accepted by the seller and the engine was delivered.

4. EVIDENCE 🔑441(9) — PAROL EVIDENCE VARYING WRITTEN AGREEMENT—STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, providing that an agreement in writing is to be considered as containing all its terms, and that there can be, between the parties and successors in interest, no evidence of the terms other than the contents of the writing, where a contract for sale of machinery purported to contain all representations and agreements made, and that employés of seller were not authorized to bind the company, evidence of an alleged parol warranty was not admissible.

5. PLEADINGS 🔑236(3) — AMENDMENT — DISCRETION OF COURT.

In an action for the balance due on secured notes after foreclosure of mortgage on machinery, the refusal of the court to permit defendants to amend their answer to allege that they did not read the contract of purchase was not an abuse of the discretion in the court to allow amendments to the pleadings during the trial.

6. SALES 🔑261(1) — CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—WARRANTY.

Where defendants ordered "one 30 horse power simple traction engine," on an order blank containing no warranties, except that machinery would be of good material, and equal or better than any other machine of equal size and proportions when properly handled, there was no warranty as to the horse power of the engine.

7. SALES 🔑355(1)—ACTION FOR PRICE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for balance due on notes secured by a mortgage on an engine, where the pleading did not allege a rescission or offer to rescind the contract for sale of the engine, which did not contain a warranty as to horse power, evidence as to the horse power the engine would develop was properly excluded.

8. CHATTEL MORTGAGES 🔑264 — FORECLOSURE SALE—ACTION FOR DEFICIENCY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for the balance due on secured notes after foreclosure and sale, where plaintiff did not sell at public sale pursuant to notice posted, the burden was on it to prove a sale at some other time.

9. CHATTEL MORTGAGES 🔑255—DEFICIENCY AND PERSONAL LIABILITY — NECESSITY OF SALE.

Where a chattel mortgage authorized the mortgagee to take possession of and sell the property on default in payment of the secured notes, until the property is sold under the terms of the mortgage, he has no cause of action against the mortgagor for personal judgment, and cannot give mortgagor credit for some amount and then bring action.

10. CHATTEL MORTGAGES 🔑264 — SALE UNDER POWER—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action to recover balance due on secured notes after foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged personal property, whether plaintiff sold property at public sale advertised held for the jury.

11. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1170(9)—REVERSAL—ERROR NOT PREJUDICIAL.

In action for the balance due on notes secured by a chattel mortgage containing a power of sale, reversal for error in refusing to instruct that plaintiff cannot recover if he did not sell the property at public auction in accordance with notices posted is not violative of Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that no judgment shall be set aside or new trial granted for error not prejudicial, since the section was not intended to abrogate or dispense with rules of procedure and evidence, and the error is not rendered harmless by the fact that defendants would not have bid at the sale if there had been one, as they were entitled to have the sale made as advertised to give other bidders an opportunity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sierra County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company against William J. Copren and C. A. Copren, partners, doing business under the firm name and style of Copren Bros., and as individuals. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

John V. Copren and W. I. Redding, of Downieville, for appellants. Dunn, White & Aiken, of Oakland, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. At the former hearing of this case the opinion was written by Judge John F. Ellison, sitting temporarily in this court. We now adopt it as correctly disposing of the questions raised by the appeal:

"Action to recover a judgment for money claimed to be due and unpaid upon three certain promissory notes. The complaint alleged that the notes were executed on July 5, 1912; that they were secured by a mortgage of even date on certain personal property; that the mortgage provided in the event of default in the payment of the notes the plaintiff could take possession of the mortgaged property and sell the same with or without notice, and, after deducting the expense of the sale, apply the balance on the notes secured by the mortgage; that the balance remaining unpaid on said notes after crediting the proceeds of such sale should at once become due and payable; that, acting under the terms and provisions of the mortgage, the plaintiff, upon default in the payment of the notes, and on June 22, 1914, took possession of and sold the mortgaged property for $500, and, after deducting $20, expenses, credited $480 on the notes; that there had been paid on one note before that time $74.45 which, with the credit of $480, left a balance of principal due of $684.30, and judgment was asked for this amount and interest as provided in the notes. The court, at the conclusion of the taking of the testimony, instructed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount sued for, and it did so. This appeal is from the judgment following such verdict. The defendants filed a general and special demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled.

[1, 2] "1. Their position on the general demurrer may be stated as follows: Section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt secured by a mortgage; that, upon default in payment of the notes, plaintiff had only one of two remedies; it could bring a foreclosure suit or it could proceed under the terms of the mortgage and sell the property; that when it adopted the latter course it elected to look to the property only for satisfaction of its debt; that a suit for a deficiency can only be maintained after the property has been sold under a judgment in a foreclosure suit.

"We do not think counsel's position is tenable. For purposes of demurrer, deeming all the allegations of the complaint to be true, it must be held that when this action was begun the debt was not secured by a mortgage. The property that was security for it had been sold by the plaintiff, and the defendants given credit therefor. It had been sold pursuant to defendants' written consent and authorization contained in the mortgage. In making the sale the plaintiff may be said to have been acting as the defendants' agent. One object of the passage of section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure was to compel one having a debt secured by a mortgage to exhaust his security and apply its value to the liquidation of the claim before proceeding to obtain a personal judgment as against his debtor. Many conditions may arise after a mortgage has been given rendering what was originally security for the debt valueless. In most cases, perhaps, it might be a correct statement of the law to say that the word 'secured,' as used in section 726, should be considered as used in the present tense, and that the section refers to a debt that at the time suit is brought is secured by a mortgage. The adoption of the above as a general rule of construction would be subject to exceptions in individual cases. Thus, perhaps, if one having a debt secured by a mortgage should cancel it of record, without the consent of the mortgagor, it might be held he could not bring a personal action. On the other hand, if such mortgage were canceled with the consent or at the request of the mortgagor, without any intention of canceling the indebtedness, or if the property, being personal, were all destroyed by fire, without fault of the mortgagee, in such cases the holder of the indebtedness would not be at all prevented by section 726 from bringing and maintaining a personal action for the amount due. So in this case, the property having been sold by the plaintiff acting under the written authorization of the defendants and having ceased to be security for any part of the balance due, the notes were not secured by a mortgage at the time the suit was brought, and section 726 has no application to the situation.

[3] "2. The defendants set up in their answer as a defense to the action certain oral representations alleged to have been made by the plaintiff before, at the time of, and after the notes were executed. The court excluded all evidence offered to sustain this defense and this ruling is assigned as error. To understand the ruling a somewhat fuller statement of the facts of the case is necessary.

"It appears that the plaintiff is engaged in the business of making and selling various kinds of machinery. On June 5, 1912, defendants signed one of the plaintiff's order blanks in and by which they ordered shipped to them at once 'one 30 horse power simple engine traction, wood burning, and fixtures' at the agreed price of $1,513.75 to be paid for $275 cash upon delivery, and the execution of three notes (being the notes in suit) secured by a mortgage on the property sold. The property was delivered to the defendants on July 5, 1912, the cash paid, and the notes and mortgages executed.

"The answer alleged that before and at the time of the purchase of the engine defendants informed plaintiff they desired to purchase an engine for the purpose of pulling four wagons, each loaded with four cords of green wood, along and over the 'Verdi and Dog Valley' grade in Sierra county, and thereupon plaintiff stated and expressly warranted that said 30 horse power engine had sufficient power to and would pull the four wagons loaded as above stated over said grade, and that said engine would develop 30 horse power; that, relying solely upon said representations and express warranties, defendants purchased the property and paid the money and gave the notes in question; that all of said statements, representations, and warranties were wholly untrue; that the engine never developed sufficient power to pull one loaded wagon over the grade, and failed to develop 30 horse power; that by reason of the above they were unable to use the engine for the purpose for which it was purchased, and it was of no use to them, and by reason of these facts the consideration of the notes wholly failed.

[4] "The contract for the purchase of the engine, while in the form of an order signed only by the defendants, became an executed contract when accepted by the plaintiff and the machinery delivered. It is complete in itself and expressly provides, over the signatures of the defendants, 'The undersigned hereby acknowledge that no promises, representations, or agreements have been made to or with me not herein contained,' and again, 'Salesmen, mechanics, and experts are not authorized to bind the company by any act, conduct, or statement.' The defendants, by the offered evidence, were attempting by parol to add a warranty to those contained in the written contract, and we think, in view of settled principles of law and the explicit language of the contract above quoted, the court correctly ruled that it could not be done.

"Section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: 'When the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing by the parties, it is to be considered as containing all those terms, and therefore there can be between the parties and their representatives, or successors in interest, no evidence of the terms of the agreement other than the contents of the writing.' Certain exceptions are added to the section that are not applicable to this case.

"In Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby, 153 Cal. 585, 96 Pac. 319, it is said: 'Where the written sale contains no warranty or expresses the warranty that is given by the vendor, parol evidence is inadmissible to prove the existence of the warranty in the former case or to extend it in the latter.'

"In Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 327, 330, 26 Pac. 830, 831 (23 Am. St. Rep. 469), it is said: 'The question whether a writing is upon its face a complete expression of the agreement of the parties is one of law for the court, and the rule which governs the court in its determination has been well stated as follows: "If it imports on its face to be a complete expression of the whole agreement—that is, contains such language as imports a complete legal obligation—it is to be presumed that the parties have introduced into it every material item and term; and parol evidence cannot be admitted to add another term to the agreement, although the writing contains nothing on the particular one to which the parol evidence is directed."'

"In United Iron Works v. Outer Harbor Dock & Wharf Co., 168 Cal. 81, 141 Pac. 917, it is said: 'Appellant undertook by parol evidence of the "surrounding circumstances" to show that there was such a warranty given even if it were not expressly embodied in the written contract. The objections to the admission of this evidence were sustained, and this is the first one of the asserted errors; the contention being that under section 1647 of the Civil Code and section 1860 of the Code of Civil Procedure such evidence was clearly admissible. In this, however, appellant errs. "These sections but enact the common-law rule. It is never within their contemplation that a contract reduced to writing and executed by the parties shall have anything added to it or taken away from it by such evidence of 'surrounding circumstances.' This rule of evidence is invoked and employed only in cases where upon the face of the contract itself there is doubt and the evidence is used to dispel that doubt, not by showing that the parties meant something other than what they said, but by showing what they meant by what they said"'—citing cases.

[5] "3. Permitting parties to file amendments to their pleadings during the progress of the trial is largely in the discretion of the court, and its action will not be disturbed unless the discretion appears to have been wrongly exercised. The refusal of the court to permit defendants to amend their answer by alleging that before signing the instrument they did not read it was not an abuse of discretion.

[6] "4. The defendants alleged in their answer and offered to prove that the engine would not develop 30 horse power. All this offered evidence was excluded by the trial court, and this is assigned as error. Was there a warranty that the engine had this capacity and power?

"This is somewhat a close question, but in view of the particular wording of the contract it must be held that the ruling was correct. The only reference in the entire contract to 30 horse power is in the part of the contract above quoted wherein defendants ordered 'one 30 horse power simple engine traction.' It sufficiently appears from the printed order blank that plaintiff was selling and perhaps manufacturing many different kinds of machines, such as grain separators, hay stackers, etc. Those on the blank not ordered by a purchaser had written in the blank the word 'none' to show definitely it was not ordered. In front of the particular machine ordered was written some word to designate that it was ordered and how many. In this case, in front of the words '30 horse power simple engine' was written the word 'one' to designate that that engine had been bought and that one was bought. The court held that the words 'one 30 horse power simple engine' were used to designate the machine bought and did not carry a warranty of the power of the engine.

"Closely following the part of the order above referred to is the following: 'Said machinery is furnished upon and subject to the following mutual and interdependent conditions, and none other, namely: It is warranted to be made of good material, and durable with good care, and to be capable of doing more and better work than any other machine made of equal size and proportions, working under the same conditions on the same job, if properly operated by competent persons, with sufficient steam or horse power, and the printed rules and directions of the manufacturers intelligently followed.'

[7] "The above is the only warranty written in the order blank. It would seem to have been carefully drawn for the purpose of expressly excluding all other warranties. It contains no warranty as to the horse power of the engine. The pleading did not allege any rescission or offer to rescind the contract, and we conclude the court did not err in excluding evidence as to the horse power the engine would develop.

[8] "5. The defendants requested the court to give the jury the following instruction: 'The court instructs the jury that, if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff elected to sell said engine at public auction at the time and place mentioned in the notices of sale posted by it, but did not so make said sale at public auction, then your verdict should be that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action.' The court refused to give the instruction, and this is assigned as error.

"The record shows that, acting under the terms of the mortgage, the plaintiff took possession of the mortgaged property and gave notice, by posting and by mailing to the defendants, that it would sell it at public auction at Johnson's barn in Sierraville, Sierra county, on June 22, 1914, at 2 o'clock p. m. The witness Bloodworth testified that, acting for the plaintiff, he sold the property at public auction at the time and place stated in the notices to one Fred Cook for $500. 'I accepted the bid and declared the machinery sold to' the plaintiff. This was the only testimony offered by the plaintiff on this point, and the witness gave no testimony of any other sale either public or private having been made. He also testified that $500 was all the property was worth. One of the defendants gave testimony to the effect that witness Bloodworth did not go to the Johnson barn until 3 o'clock, and that witness went with him and remained there until 4 o'clock; that up to that time no sale of the property had been made and it had not been offered for sale. Another defendant testified that he was in the immediate vicinity of the barn from 1:30 to 3 p. m.; that Bloodworth was not there; that he left the barn about that time and went up town and saw Bloodworth sitting on the hotel porch.

"If the jury had accepted the testimony of the defendants, then it would have been their duty to find that no sale of the property had been made. The plaintiff's witness did not pretend that a sale was made at any other time than at 2 o'clock p. m., and if the jury concluded his statement that he made it then was untrue, they would have been justified in finding that no sale had been made. If the plaintiff made a sale at some other time (as after 4 o'clock), or if at some time he made a private sale, the burden was his to prove it. The suggestion that there might have been a private sale is foreign to the issue. No such sale was either alleged or proved, and the asked instruction was applicable to the only testimony there was in the case, and did not have to cover other contingencies concerning which there was no evidence.

"6. It was claimed by respondent at the trial, and is now claimed, that as the defendants would not have bid on the property, and there were no other bidders, the defendants were not injured by what was not done, in view of the fact that they got a credit of $500. Counsel states his position as follows: 'Under these circumstances, it was manifest, in view of the credit which they had received, that they were not prejudiced, no matter what character of sale was held.' And section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution is also involved.

[9, 10] "We think the question of injury or no injury to the defendants is foreign to the discussion. The question of whether the property was sold or not cuts far deeper than error or injury. It goes to the foundation of the action and involves the question: Did the plaintiff at the time it brought this suit have any cause of action against the defendants for a personal judgment? It did if the property had been sold under the terms of the mortgage. If it had not been thus sold it did not, and this was a question for the jury to decide. Without first making a sale, the law would not permit plaintiff to give defendants credit for some amount, any amount it saw fit, and then bring suit for a personal judgment. Plaintiff realized that it was necessary to allege in its complaint a sale of the property in order to state a cause of action. It did so, and the allegation as to a sale was material to the statement of a cause of action and a finding on it favorable to plaintiff necessary to support a judgment. By refusing the offered instruction the court withdrew this vital issue from the jury."

[11] A rehearing was granted upon the earnest request of respondent that further consideration be given to certain facts from which it is claimed to conclusively appear that appellants were not prejudiced by the refusal of the court to give the instruction referred to in the foregoing opinion, and hence the judgment should not be reversed. These facts are that the mortgage under which the alleged sale was held provided that the mortgagee on default might take possession of the mortgaged chattels and sell the same at public or private sale, with or without notice at the mortgagees' option; that the mortgagees did not desire to bid; that they testified that the property was without value and that they would not have bid anything therefor; that, "had the property been offered for sale and the mortgagees had bid the same in, it would have been no more nor less than a private sale, no matter in what manner the transfer was effected"; and, finally, attention is called to an admission made by defendants' counsel at the trial in the discussion of the instruction that "there is no contention that the defendants were prejudiced by said sale." Upon this latter fact we quote from the record:

> "The Court: If there was any showing that there would have been other bidders and that the defendants were injured thereby—
> "Mr. Redding: There is no contention that the defendants were prejudiced by the said sale.
> "The Court: I can't see that it would make any difference, Mr. Redding. There is no injury to the defendants; of course, if the defendants wanted to bid, I could see where an injury might be suffered by them, but there is no contention of that character.
> "Mr. Redding: I wish to qualify that to the extent that there might have been other bidders.
> "The Court: Would it not devolve upon the defendants to show that the sale was unfair?"

Respondent cites several of the cases in which section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution has been held to justify the reviewing court in disregarding the error because the court was not of the opinion that the error complained of had resulted in a miscarriage of justice. See, for cases, note to the section in Treadwell's Annotated Constitution (Ed. 1916) p. 313. The section forbids the setting aside of a judgment or granting a new trial—

> "in any case, on the ground of misdirection of the jury, or of the admission or rejection of evidence, or for any error as to any matter of pleading, or for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

Speaking of this section, the Supreme Court said in Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 554, 147 Pac. 238, 243:

> "It is no longer the case that injury is presumed from error; the injury must appear affirmatively to the mind of the court after the examination required, or from the nature of the error itself."

The court also said:

> "Just what may be included in the phrase 'miscarriage of justice' must remain to be decided in each case as it is presented."

In People v. Tomsky, 20 Cal. App. 672, 683, 130 Pac. 184, 189, Mr. Justice Hart, speaking for the court, said:

> "The section is general in its language and terms, and, moreover, upon its face, very sweeping in its scope. It does not pretend to describe specifically the character of the errors coming within the purview of its language, or, by express language, to limit the right of the courts to determine and say that any error, whatever its nature, has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice. But it is, of course, very clear that the power vested in the courts by the section is not to be arbitrarily exercised either in the one direction or the other, but that the propriety or impropriety of the application of the provisions of the section must be determined, perhaps, in all cases, as much on the character of the record of the particular case as upon the character of the error itself."

Plaintiff's right of action, as was shown in the original opinion, depended, under the terms of the mortgage, upon there having been a sale either public or private. Plaintiff elected to proceed by a public sale and grounded its complaint on such sale. There was evidence tending to show that there was no public sale, and there was no evidence of a private sale. Had the court submitted the case to the jury, they would have been justified in finding that there was no sale at all; that the credit of $500 on the notes was arbitrarily made and in utter disregard of the terms of the mortgage. It is true that defendants would not have bid at the sale had there been a sale; it is true that in the opinion of plaintiff's agent the chattels were not worth more than $500; it is true that one of the defendants testified that the machine was worthless. Still defendants were entitled to have the sale made as advertised, since there may have been other bidders who would have given more than $500 for the property. Defendants' admissions must be considered in the light of their relations to the case. Their position was that, so far as they were concerned, the machine was a failure, and, for their uses, worthless. To have been bidders at the sale would have been inconsistent with the defense they were making. But, plaintiff having elected to enforce its rights by public sale, and having brought its action upon the assumption that there was such sale, there was an entire failure of proof. So also was there an entire failure of proof that any sale was made. We think it would be giving to section 4½ of article 6 unwarranted scope to permit its application to such a state of facts as we have here. To do so we must, in effect, say that it is not necessary to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or, having stated a cause of action, it need not be supported by sufficient evidence.

The section was not intended to abrogate or dispense with rules of procedure and evidence. It would, in our opinion, effect a miscarriage of justice to sustain the ruling of the trial court upon the record before us.

The judgment is reversed.

MILLER & LUX, Inc., v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 1970.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑362—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION—"CASUAL EMPLOYMENT."

One employed as foreman over a number of other carpenters in the erection of a 14-room building, involving several months of regular and daily recurring labor, is not "casually" employed within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279).

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑371—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT — "USUAL COURSE" OF TRADE, BUSINESS, ETC., OF AN EMPLOYER.

One employed as carpenter and foreman in charge of the construction of a cottage for employés upon one of the numerous properties of a large corporation, chartered, among other things, to construct buildings necessary to its business and whose business had for years included the construction, improvement, etc., of buildings on its properties, requiring the constant employment of carpenters thereon, was employed in the "usual course of the trade, business, profession, or occupation of his employer" within the Workmen's Compensation Act.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ⟹363—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—"FARM LABOR."

Such employé did not come within the express exclusion of section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, as one engaged in "farm labor," notwithstanding the building which he was engaged in constructing was upon a ranch property of his employer.

Petition for writ of review by Miller & Lux Incorporated, against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California and others to review an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Writ dismissed.

Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Chris M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of review. The facts of the case are undisputed. They show that Sidney Eligh entered the employ of the petitioner early in the month of August, 1915, as a carpenter and as the foreman in charge of the construction of a 14-room cottage upon one of the numerous properties of the petitioner known as the Button Willow ranch, located in Kern county, Cal., and containing about 100,000 acres of land; said building when completed was to be occupied by other employés of the petitioner upon this ranch. After having continued in this employment for a period of 57 days Eligh suffered an injury to one of his eyes during the course of his duties in and about the building, which injury formed the basis of his claim for compensation presented to the Industrial Accident Commission. Upon the hearing before the commission the applicant received an award for his said injuries. The petitioner herein seeks to review such award upon the ground chiefly that the applicant's employment was casual and not in the usual course of the trade, business, profession, or occupation of his employer.

The record discloses that Miller & Lux, Incorporated, is an institution which, both by its articles of incorporation and by a long course of business conduct, has been and is engaged in many and divers occupations. The purposes of this corporation as set forth in its articles are very comprehensive, embracing among other things the power to "construct such buildings, structures, and improvements as may be necessary or desirable in order to carry on the business of a wholesale and retail butcher; also to purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, hold, possess, use, improve, sell, mortgage, incumber, or otherwise dispose of every kind of property." The proofs before the commission showed that the petitioner herein was and for many years had been engaged in a considerable number of diversified lines of business permitted under the enumeration of its corporate purposes and powers, including the construction, improvement, and repair of buildings of various kinds upon its numerous properties, and requiring the constant employment of carpenters upon one or other of its ranches. In the particular work of which the injured applicant was engaged to be the foreman six or seven other carpenters were also employed, the work of construction having occupied nearly two months between the date of the applicant's employment and his injury. Upon proof of these facts the commission made its findings to the effect that the applicant's injury arose out of and happened in the course of his employment in the erection of a cottage for employés upon the premises of the employer, the business or occupation of whom being that of wholesale and retail butcher, wholesale and retail merchandizing, farming, and horticulture and real estate dealing, and that the erection and construction of cottages for its employés was in the usual course of its said business or occupation; that at the time of said injury applicant was not engaged in any of the occupations or employments excepted by section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act from the provisions of said act. These findings the petitioner herein assails as unsupported by any sufficient evidence, and upon several specific grounds.

[1, 2] The petitioner's first contention is that the applicant's employment was casual and not in the usual course of the trade, business, profession, or occupation of his employer. It is to be noted that in order to sustain this contention we must find the proofs entirely lacking in respect to both of its elements. The applicant's employment at the time of his injury must have been "casual," and must also have been not in the usual course of the trade, business, profession, or occupation of his employer. Without further reviewing or analyzing the proofs before the commission, we are satisfied that they sufficiently show that the applicant's employment was neither casual nor out of the usual course of the several extensive and diversified lines of business or occupation in which the petitioner at the time of applicant's injury was engaged. The cases collected with much industry and cited by counsel for the petitioner will, when analyzed, show that the rule depended in each case upon its particular state of facts; and that as to these facts they may each be easily differentiated from the case at bar. To hold that the applicant's employment to act as foreman over a number of other carpenters in the erection of a 14-room building, involving an engagement of several months of regular and daily recurring labor, to be "casual" would in our opinion restrict the operation of the statute beyond its reasonable and liberal interpretation; and also to hold that the applicant's employment as a carpenter to do work upon one of the petitioner's extensive properties where, in order to the maintenance of its many and diversified activities, buildings were being constantly erected or improved, and where in direct connection with the particular property upon which the applicant was employed, other carpenters were kept constantly and regularly engaged, would not constitute an employment in the usual course of the trade, business, profession, or occupation of his employer, would be to do violence both to the record herein and to the spirit and purpose of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. We think, therefore, that the petitioner's contention in both of the above respects cannot be sustained.

[3] The petitioner makes the further contention that because it was, in the conduct of the ranch upon which the applicant received his injury, essentially a farmer, the applicant must be held to come within the express exclusion of section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act as being one engaged in farm labor. We are unable to follow the refinement of the petitioner's reasoning so far as to hold that because the operations of the petitioner are so diversified and extensive as to require regular employment of carpenters in the construction, improvement, and repair of buildings upon the ranch properties, that such artisans when so employed are to be regarded as engaged in farm labor. Such a construction would lead us entirely away from the evident objects of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

We are of the opinion that the writ should be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

R. G. Peeples was convicted, and appeals. Affirmed.

William F. Herron and George Damon, both of San Francisco, and Allen C. Cunah, of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was charged by information with the crime of grand larceny; it being alleged that he stole an automobile of the value of $1,200. The appeal is from the judgment of conviction, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The only serious point in the case is as to certain conduct of the district attorney during the trial, claimed by the appellant to amount to serious misconduct, and to have gravely prejudiced him in the minds of the jury. In his opening statement the district attorney stated that he would prove that certain parts of the automobile in question had been changed, and that the parts substituted for them had been taken from another automobile, which also had been stolen. Repeatedly during the trial the district attorney, in questions propounded by him to witnesses, incorporated therein references to other stolen automobiles. If he desired to show—as doubtless he did—that parts and accessories of other automobiles had been substituted for parts of this automobile, for whatever material bearing such testimony would have on the case, he, of course, was warranted in doing so; but we can perceive no good reason —indeed, no excuse—for referring to the other automobiles as having been feloniously taken from their owners. Moreover, after the first reference to "other automobiles which were stolen," when the court, upon objection by counsel for the defendant, instructed the jury that such reference in the terms employed was improper, it was the plain duty of the district attorney to refrain from again offending in that regard. This he did not do.

[2, 3] In his closing address to the jury, referring to a portion of the argument of defendant's counsel, wherein the latter dwelt at length upon the hardship of taking his client from the bosom of his family and sending him to the penitentiary, the district attorney made a remark to the effect:

> "I will make the same agreement that I did the other day. If the defendant is convicted, I will consent to his case being referred to the probation officer to look up his past record, and to see if he is entitled to probation."

This was a statement that the district attorney had no right to make. It is possible it was made, as claimed by the defendant, for the purpose of facilitating a conviction of the defendant, by reason of the jury supposing that leniency would be subsequently extended to him. However, it is a matter of general knowledge that a person convicted of crime is entitled to apply for probation, which it is in the court's discretion to grant, irrespective of the attitude of the district attorney in reference thereto. In this case the counsel for the defendant immediately assigned the remark quoted as misconduct, whereupon the district attorney withdrew it, and asked the jury to disregard it, saying in part:

> "I withdraw that statement. The district attorney desires at this time to withdraw anything he has said with reference to the probation officer. * * * Remember, gentlemen, that you are here under your solemn oaths as jurors to be guided by the evidence and the law, and the question of what it to be done with this defendant, if convicted, is matter of no concern of yours."

This statement by the prosecuting officer was equivalent to an admonition by the court to the jury to disregard the remark to which exception had been taken; and the court, moreover, in each of the instances referred to, when objection was made, instructed the jury to so disregard them.

[4] Complaints of misconduct on the part of prosecuting officers in the trial of causes are quite frequent. It is to be regretted that these officers in the heat of contest so often imperil judgments of conviction by their verbal excesses. In the present case, however, a careful examination of the record discloses that the evidence abundantly supports the verdict, and it is clear that the defendant was guilty of the offense charged. In view of the fact that the jury was admonished in each instance to disregard in their deliberations the statements of which complaint was made, we will assume that the instructions of the court were followed, and that no prejudice to the defendant resulted.

The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to grant defendant's motion for a continuance of the trial of the case; and in our opinion the instructions of the court to the jury fully and fairly covered the law applicable to the facts of the case.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

WEBSTER v. SAN JOAQUIN FRUIT & VEGETABLE GROWERS' PROTECTIVE ASS'N et al. (Civ. 1549.)

ASSOCIATIONS 🔑19—LIABILITY OF MEMBERS.

While, as between the members of an unincorporated association, each is bound to pay only his numerical proportion of the indebtedness of the concern, as against creditors, each member of such an association is individually liable for the entire debt, provided that it is of such a nature and has been so contracted as to be binding on the association as a whole; such an association being in legal effect a mere partnership, so far as the liability of its members to third persons is concerned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Associations, Cent. Dig. § 29; Dec. Dig. 🔑19.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by C. A. Webster against the San Joaquin Fruit & Vegetable Growers' Protective Association, a copartnership, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, G. B. Gotello and Frank Lagomarsino, defendants against whom an individual judgment was rendered, appeal. Judgment affirmed.

Snyder & Snyder and H. Stanley Crane, all of Stockton, for appellants. George F. Buck and Gordon A. Stewart, both of Stockton, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This action was brought to recover the sum of $1,798.05 for goods, wares, and merchandise purchased by the association for use in its business, and plaintiff had the judgment. The appeal is by G. B. Gotello and Frank Lagomarsino, who were members of the association and against whom an individual judgment was rendered. It is stated by appellants that:

> "There was no dispute as to the amount of the demand for plaintiff, and so the question involved on this appeal is simply whether the appellants can be held individually responsible for the claim of plaintiff."

The criticism of appellants is addressed to the consideration that the court found a partnership existed, whereas, so it is claimed, the evidence is insufficient to show such a relation among the parties composing the association. But appellants are in error as to such finding. It is true the association is designated a partnership, but the finding is:

> "That the following named persons at all times herein mentioned were associated in business and transacted such business under a common name, to wit, the name of San Joaquin Fruit and Vegetable Growers' Protective Association, and that said persons at all of said times were associates using such common name, and that said goods, wares, and merchandise referred to herein were purchased for the use of such business and were used in such business aforesaid."

Then follow the names of the nineteen persons, including appellants, composing the association.

There is no doubt the evidence amply supports said finding, and therefore the case is brought within the rule announced in volume 5, Corpus Juris, 1362, 1363, as follows:

> "While as between the members of an unincorporated association, each is bound to pay only his numerical proportion of the indebtedness of the concern, yet as against the creditors, each member is individually liable for the entire debt, provided, of course, the debt is of such a nature and has been so contracted as to be binding on the association as a whole. * * * An unincorporated association organized for business or profit is in legal effect a mere partnership so far as the liability of its members to third persons is concerned; and accordingly each member is individually liable as a partner for a debt contracted by the association."

It may be said also that, at least as far as appellants and some of the other members of the association are concerned, there is sufficient evidence that there existed a partnership within the contemplation of the Code definition. This is conclusively set forth in respondent's brief, but we deem it unnecessary to do more than to mention it.

The truth is this appeal is nearly, if not quite, frivolous. However, no damages are asked, and as what may seem to the court to be frivolous is often quite decorous in the eyes of counsel, we content ourselves with affirming the judgment; and it is so ordered.

1. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF 🔑51 — DUTY OF TRIAL COURT.

Where the statement in proposed bill of exceptions does not conform to the record, but the trial judge can amend it, or cause it to be amended, so as to make a fair statement, without undue labor, he should do so, and it is not a proper exercise of his discretion to require a transcription of the full reporter's notes as a condition for settling the statement.

2. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF 🔑53(7)—MANDAMUS TO COMPEL SETTLEMENT — OBJECTIONS NOT RULED ON IN TRIAL COURT.

In mandamus to compel a trial judge to settle bill of exceptions, although the trial judge, in refusing to settle the bill, did not rule upon appellee's objections that the bill was proposed too late, such objections will be considered in the mandamus proceedings, where they were insisted upon by appellee and not waived by him at any time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. § 88; Dec. Dig. 🔑53(7).]

3. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF 🔑39(1)—TIME FOR PRESENTATION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 650, limiting time for presenting proposed bill of exceptions, where motion for new trial is made, to ten days after notice of decision thereof, a party whose motion for new trial has been denied is entitled to have served upon him notice of such ruling, but such notice may be waived.

4. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF 🔑39(1)—TIME FOR PRESENTATION—WAIVER OF NOTICE OF RULING.

In order to deprive an appellant of his right to written notice of decision on his motion for new trial in order to limit time for his presentation of bill of exceptions, there must be facts of record clearly indicating a waiver of such notice.

5. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF 🔑39(1)—TIME FOR PRESENTATION — WAIVER OF WRITTEN NOTICE OF DENIAL OF NEW TRIAL.

After denial of appellants' motion for new trial, their application, pursuant to notice served and filed in the trial court, to set aside the order denying their motion for new trial, constituted a definite waiver of notice of entry of the order denying new trial, so that the ten days limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 650, for presenting bill of exceptions began to run from the time of entry of such order.

6. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF 🔑53(5) — SETTLEMENT — COMPELLING PERFORMANCE OF USELESS ACT.

Petition for mandamus to require trial judge to settle bill of exceptions will be denied, where it would show on its face that it was not presented in time, so that it would be necessarily ignored on appeal, since to grant the writ would be to require the trial court to perform a useless act.

Petition for writ of mandate by Louise N. Fighiera and another against Hon. H. T. De Whirst, Judge. Petition denied.

A. C. Vaughan, of Los Angeles, for petitioners. H. T. Dewhirst, of Redlands, in pro. per.

CONREY, P. J. This is a proceeding in mandamus to require the respondent as judge of the superior court in and for the county of San Bernardino to settle a bill of exceptions in an action wherein the petitioners were plaintiffs and one William F. Radis was defendant. After the entry of judgment in that action the plaintiffs in due time served and filed their notice of intention to move for a new trial, and later served and filed notice that said motion would be made on the 19th day of June, at 2 o'clock p. m. At that time, the attorney for plaintiffs not appearing and the attorney for defendant being present, the motion was denied. Thereafter, on July 27, 1916, the plaintiffs served on the defendant a proposed bill of exceptions. On August 2d the defendant served upon plaintiffs numerous amendments to the proposed bill of exceptions, specifying, however, together therewith his objections to the signing, settlement, and allowance of the bill, and insisting that his proposed amendments were to be considered only in the event that the court should have first overruled said prior objections. These objections set forth, in addition to the facts above noted, certain other facts, including the claimed fact that the plaintiffs had actual notice of the denial of their motion for a new trial on the date thereof, to wit: June 19, 1916. It is thus made to appear (said the defendant) that since no extension of time had been granted, the proposed bill of exceptions was served and filed after expiration of the time allowed by law.

[1] The proposed bill and amendments having been delivered to the clerk and by him to the judge, the court designated August 28, 1916, as the time for settling the bill of exceptions, and the attorneys for the respective parties were notified thereof. At the time appointed those attorneys appeared before the judge and the attorney for defendant presented his objections, including those above noted, to the settlement of any bill of exceptions. The record does not show any definite ruling by the court upon those objections, but the hearing on that day resulted in a minute order by the court in that case as follows:

> "This being the time heretofore continued to for further hearing on settlement of bill of exceptions, all parties present by and with their respective counsel. Argument is heard and the court at this time disallows the bill of exceptions for the reason that same does not conform to the record."

The petition for the writ in this proceeding and the respondent's answer thereto, as well as the briefs of counsel, indicate that a controversy arose between the plaintiffs' attorney and the judge respecting the correctness of the bill as proposed by plaintiffs' attorney, and that the judge was insisting that a better and more correct bill be proposed before he would make any order settling the same. Without entering into a discussion, which would necessarily be of considerable length, as to the merits of this controversy, it will be sufficient to say that the situation was not materially different from that shown in Vatcher v. Wilbur, 144 Cal. 536, 78 Pac. 14. The following statement made in that case is applicable here:

> "The respondent as judge of said court was not required to sign the proposed statement as it was presented. It was his duty merely to settle it, and this implied that he should amend it, or cause it to be amended, so as to make a fair statement, where it can be done with no more labor than was here required. We think, therefore, under the circumstances of this case, it was not a proper exercise of the discretion vested in the respondent judge to require a transcription of the full reporter's notes as a condition for settling said statement."

[2] Although at that time the judge perhaps did not rule favorably to the defendant upon his objections that the bill was proposed too late, those objections will nevertheless be considered at this time, since they were insisted upon by the defendant's attorney and were not waived by him at any time. And in respondent's answer to the petition in this proceeding he states that his present reasons for refusing to act upon the proposed bill of exceptions are not only because the petitioners have refused to amend the same as directed by him, but also because the proposed statement or a copy thereof was not drafted or served on said defendant within ten days after notice of respondent's decision denying the petitioners' motion for a new trial.

It is not claimed by the respondent that any formal notice of the order denying the motion for a new trial was served upon the plaintiffs or their attorney. The answer of respondent herein shows, and after hearing the argument we are assuming it to be admitted by plaintiffs, that on the 3d day of July, 1916, pursuant to notice theretofore served and filed by plaintiffs' attorney, the plaintiffs by their said attorney applied to the superior court to set aside the order of June 19th denying the motion for a new trial. The motion of July 3d seems to have been based upon excusable failure of plaintiffs' attorney to be present at the time set for presenting his motion for a new trial. For in connection with said motion of July 3d, plaintiffs' attorney served and filed an affidavit of the attorney, Mr. Vaughan, in which he set forth the accidental reasons which prevented his presence in the court at San Bernardino until 12 minutes after 2 o'clock on the 19th day of June. In that affidavit he stated that counsel for defendant had left the courtroom as affiant entered that room; "that the judge who tried the case was upon the bench, and upon entering the courtroom affiant was advised that the judge had denied the motion for a new trial because counsel for the plaintiffs herein was not present; upon receiving such information affiant explained to the court that he was delayed," etc. On July 3, 1916, said motion to set aside the order of June 19th was denied.

[3, 4] The Code of Civil Procedure, § 650, provides:

> "When a party desires to have exceptions taken at a trial settled in a bill of exceptions, he may, * * * if proceedings on motion for a new trial be pending, within ten days after notice of decision denying said motion, or other determination thereof, or such further time as the court in which the action is pending, or a judge thereof, may allow, prepare the draft of a bill, and serve the same, or a copy thereof, upon the adverse party. * * *"

Under the terms of the statute a party whose motion for a new trial has been denied by the court is entitled to have served upon him notice of such ruling of the court; but such notice may be waived.

> "The rule is that in order to deprive an appellant of his right to written notice of the entry of an order or judgment there must be facts of record clearly indicating a waiver of such notice." Hughes Mfg., etc., Co. v. Elliott, 167 Cal. 494, 140 Pac. 17.

Again it was said, referring to a case where written notice of decision was required by the Code:

> "The rule would therefore seem to be that written notice of filing of decision is in all cases required, unless waived by facts appearing in the records, files, or minutes of the court; and it follows that actual notice or knowledge, other than by written notice, is insufficient in any case unless it appears from facts thus evidenced, that written notice was waived." Mallory v. See, 129 Cal. 359, 61 Pac. 1123.

In the case last cited it was held that by the act evidenced upon the record of obtaining an order for stay of execution, appellant had waived written notice of decision.

[5, 6] In the case to which the present proceedings refer plaintiffs on July 3, 1916, applied to the superior court for affirmative relief with respect to the order of June 19th. At that time, if not before, their conduct constituted a definite waiver of notice of the entry of the order which they were asking the court to set aside. This being so, in the absence of any order extending the time for serving a proposed bill of exceptions, the time therefor expired at least two weeks prior to July 27th, when the proposed bill was actually served. Any bill of exceptions settled by the judge should include a showing of these facts in order to preserve the objections of the defendant to the settlement of the bill. Upon such a record, we are of opinion that such a bill of exceptions would necessarily be ignored in determining the merits of the appeal. This being so, to grant the writ demanded by petitioners herein would be to require the court to perform a useless act.

The petition for peremptory writ of mandate herein is denied.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 1, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 29, 1917.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑290—STREET IMPROVEMENTS — RESOLUTION OF INTENTION — DESCRIPTION OF WORK — AMENDMENT OF STATUTE AFTER JUDICIAL CONSTRUCTION.

That after Street Improvement Act March 18, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 148) § 3, providing that before ordering the work the city council shall pass a resolution "describing the work," had been decided to be satisfied, in case of pavements, by brief description and reference in the resolution to plans and specifications on file, it was amended by St. 1913, p. 403, to provide that when the work consists of certain enumerated improvements (among which pavements are not included), a brief description thereof in the resolution, with reference to plans and specifications on file, shall be sufficient, does not change the law as judicially declared as to pavements.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑293(1) — STREET IMPROVEMENTS—RESOLUTION OF INTENTION—ASSESSMENT DISTRICT.

Under Street Improvement Act March 18, 1885, § 3, as amended by St. 1913, p. 403, providing that, whenever the contemplated work in the opinion of the city council is of more than local or ordinary public benefit, the city council may make the expense chargeable on a district, which the council shall, in its resolution of intention, declare to be assessed, it is enough for the resolution to declare that said contemplated work is, in the council's opinion, of more than local or ordinary public benefit, without declaring that the lots and lands within the boundaries of the district fixed by it will be specially benefited.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑68(4)—LEGISLATIVE QUESTIONS — STREET IMPROVEMENTS — DETERMINATION OF BENEFITS.

The determination by the city council, to which Street Improvement Act, March 18, 1885, § 3, as amended by St. 1913, p. 403, intrusts the matter, that the property within an assessment district fixed by it will be specially benefited by the street improvement, is conclusive in the absence of fraud or its equivalent.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑323(3) — STREET IMPROVEMENT—ACTION TO ENJOIN—COMPLAINT—BENEFITS.

Allegation in a complaint to enjoin the making of contract for a street improvement that plaintiff's property within the assessment district fixed by the city council will not be benefited by the improvement is of no effect; as no evidence in support thereof would be admissible.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑293(1) — STREET IMPROVEMENTS — NUMEROUS KINDS OF IMPROVEMENTS.

That a proposed improvement of streets embraces numerous kinds of improvement is no ground for complaint, being authorized by Street Improvement Act March 18, 1885, § 3, as amended by St. 1913, p. 403, and St. 1911, p. 632, § 7, subd. 13, as it cannot be assumed that the assessment board will apportion to any land within the assessment district any part of the cost of any improvements from which such land receives no benefit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Lillian Beale, executrix of John E. Beale, deceased, and others, against the City of Santa Barbara and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

B. F. Thomas, of Santa Barbara, for appellants. James B. Rickard and Arthur M. Ellis, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. In this action plaintiffs sought to have certain proceedings of the city council of Santa Barbara for doing the street work described in the resolution of intention adopted by said city council set aside and annulled, and to enjoin the superintendent of streets of said city from entering into a contract for the doing of the same. The cause of action is based upon the alleged insufficiency of the resolution of intention set out in the complaint, under which it is claimed the city council acquired no jurisdiction to do the work, and the alleged fact that plaintiffs' property would not be specially benefited by the improvements. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, without leave to amend and thereupon a judgment of dismissal of the action was entered, from which the plaintiffs appeal.

The resolution adopted, and which included the pavement of a number of streets and the construction of certain sewers, curbs, culverts, and gutters described therein, was pursuant to the provisions of "An act to provide for work upon streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places and sidewalks, and for the construction of sewers within municipalities," approved March 18, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 147) and acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, and pursuant to "An act to provide a system of street improvement bonds to represent certain assessments for the cost of street work and improvement within municipalities, and also for the payment of such bonds," approved February 27, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 33), and acts amendatory thereof, and declared the intention of the city council—

"to order the following street work to be done in said city according to the plans and profiles therefor now on file in the office of the city engineer of said city, and being plans numbered A-33-1 and A-23-3 and specifications therefor now on file in the office of the city clerk of said city, and being entitled, 'Specifications for the Improvements of the Coast Highway, Salinas Street, Cacique Street, Milpas Street, and Haley Street,' which specifications were adopted by the council of said city on the 4th day of September, 1913, to which plan and specifications reference is hereby had, and they are made a part hereof, to wit: [Here followed a more complete description of the improvement.]"

The language used as to the Coast highway, with reference to the pavement thereof, which in substance is the same as that used in describing the pavement of each of said streets, is as follows:

"To construct a pavement (consisting of a one and one-half inch asphalt wearing surface and a cement concrete base) upon the central 24 feet of the roadway of the Coast highway from the termination of Salinas and Punta Gorda streets and being shown as station 0 plus 00 on plan A-33-1 to the westerly line of the pavement now existing at Booth's Point road and Hot Spring road, and being shown as station 39 plus 21 on said plan, together with certain pavement and certain wall opposite the termination of Ocean View avenue shown on said plan and slight modification of width near station 28 plus 04 as shown on said plan, and at the intersection of Booth's Point road and Hot Springs road, as shown on said plan, and in accordance with specifications No. 27; also to construct a shoulder one foot in width (consisting of asphalt wearing surface and cement concrete base) on both sides of said pavement; also to construct across or in such portion of the Coast highway as shown on said plan four reinforced concrete culverts or drains and one vitrified pipe drain, all of said work to be done in accordance with plan No. A-33-1 now on file in the office of the city engineer of said city, and also in accordance with the specifications therefor hereinabove referred to and now on file in the office of the city clerk of said city, to which plan and specifications reference is hereby made for further particulars."

As to some of the streets the resolution included the paving of intersecting streets between certain defined points, and in one instance described the work as "including certain pavements to be constructed opposite the termination of Rose avenue," all in accordance with plans and specifications referred to as part of the resolution.

As to the several sewers the construction of which the resolution contemplated, a description of one is sufficiently illustrative of all. The declared intention was—

"to construct a six-inch main sewer (consisting of a six-inch vitrified, salt-glazed sewer pipe) in Milpas street from the manhole now constructed in the intersection of Haley and Milpas streets to the lamphole to be constructed in Milpas street, said lamphole to be distant 394 feet southeasterly from said manhole together with the construction of said lamphole, all in accordance with specifications No. 28 and plan A-23-3."

The resolution further declared:

"That said contemplated work of improvement is in the opinion of said council of more than local or ordinary public benefit, and said council does hereby find, determine, and declare that an assessment district shall be formed to pay for the cost and expenses of said improvement; and the exterior boundaries of said district to be benefited by said improvement and to be assessed to pay the cost and expenses thereof, * * * is in general terms described as follows, to wit: [Followed by a general description by metes and bounds of the proposed district.]"

Reference is made to a plat prepared by the city engineer, approved by the city council, and on file in the office of the city engineer, the boundary line of which district is indicated by green tinting, showing the extent of the territory to be included in the assessment district, a copy of which map is attached to the complaint as part thereof. It was further provided that serial bonds should be issued to represent each assessment of $25 or over for the cost of said improvement, and a newspaper was designated wherein the city clerk was directed to publish the resolution as provided by law, and said clerk was also directed to mail, postage prepaid, to each property owner whose property was subject to assessment for the cost and expenses of said improvement, at his last known address, as shown by the tax rolls of said city, or to the general delivery where not so shown, a postal card containing a notice of the passage of the resolution of intention, all as required by law. The complaint further alleged that certain lots and lands within the boundaries of said proposed district were severally owned by plaintiffs, and that neither the construction of said street work nor said sewers would in any way or manner be of any benefit to the tracts of land so owned by them and each of them, for the alleged reasons that in some cases their lands were situated a long distance from the improvement contemplated in said resolution, and that other improved streets more accessible furnished them a means of egress and ingress thereto, together with other allegations as to the topography of their lands, the location and use thereof, which it is claimed show that their lands would not be benefited by the proposed improvement.

The foregoing references to the complaint are sufficient to illustrate all the points made by appellants which merit consideration.

[1] In our opinion, the resolution of intention upon which authority for all subsequent acts in proceedings for improving the streets must be based is not subject to any of the objections urged thereto by appellants. Section 3 of the act, the constitutionality of which has been repeatedly upheld, provides, among other things, that before ordering the work the city council shall pass a resolution "describing the work," and that whenever the construction of certain enumerated improvements (among which pavements are not included) constitutes the work mentioned in the resolution, a brief description thereof in the resolution, reference being had to plans and specifications on file, shall be sufficient. As to the work of paving the street mentioned in the resolution, it was described as the construction of "a pavement (consisting of a 1½-inch asphalt wearing surface and a cement concrete base)" to be constructed in accordance with plans and specifications on file, to which reference is made for further particulars, and which plans and specifications are made part of the resolution. The sufficiency of the plans and specifications and the fact that they were on file in the proper office is conceded. Appellants insist, however, that as to the work of paving, the resolution fails to describe the work, in that it does not specify the thickness of the concrete base, to which might be added the further objection that it likewise fails to specify the kind of sand, quality of cement, character of rock, and the proportions of the mixture, together with other details of construction, all of which, since not denied, presumably were embodied in elaborate plans and specifications. In the case of McQuiddy v. Worswick Street Paving Co., 160 Cal. 11, 116 Pac. 67, the resolution provided for the paving of a street "with asphaltic pavement on an asphalt concrete foundation, * * * all in accordance with the plans and specifications on file in the office of the city clerk," and in an attack made upon the sufficiency of the resolution it was upheld, the court holding that the language of the resolution, in connection with the specifications to which reference was made, constituted a sufficient compliance with the provisions of the statute. To the same effect is Richmond Construction Co. v. Growney, 29 Cal. App. 427, 155 Pac. 1008, where a part of the work contemplated in the resolution was the grading of the street. In the case of Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81, the work provided for was that of grading, graveling, and guttering in accordance with plans, profiles, and specifications on file in the office of the city engineer, the contention there being, as here, that the resolution did not sufficiently describe the work; nevertheless, upon the maxim that "that is certain which can be made certain," it was held to constitute a substantial compliance with the provisions of the act. Appellants contend, however, that these decisions are not determinative of the question, for the reason that they were rendered prior to the amendment of section 3 (Stats. 1913, p. 403); the amendment constituting that portion of the section which enumerates certain kinds of improvements as to which it is provided a "brief description" of the same with a reference to the plans and specifications shall be sufficient. As we have seen, this amendment does not embrace pavements. Nevertheless, since the court had theretofore decided that the reference to specifications for details of the work, where it consisted of paving, might be made, the amendment is nothing more than a legislative declaration of that which had been judicially declared, as to work other than pavement, and since it does not purport to change the provisions of the act relating to pavements under which the court had held such description sufficient, it cannot be construed as changing the law with reference thereto. Moreover, the proposed improvement, as expressed in the resolution, described it as the pavement of the street and specified the material to be used in the construction thereof. This was sufficient in characterizing the work as distinguished from other improvements. While the resolution might properly have stated the thickness of the concrete base, the failure of which alone constitutes appellants' objection thereto, its failure so to do does not affect the validity thereof. In connection with the plans and specifications to which reference is made, it constitutes a sufficient description of that part of the work described as pavement embraced in the resolution.

[2-4] It is next contended that the resolution is insufficient by reason of its failure to declare that the lots and lands within the exterior boundaries of the district will be specially benefited by the improvement. The provision of the act is that:

> "Whenever the contemplated work or improvement in the opinion of the city council is of more than local or ordinary public benefit, * * * the city council may make the expense of such work or improvement chargeable upon a district, which said council shall, in its resolution of intention, declare to be assessed to pay the costs and expenses thereof."

The declaration in the resolution is in strict accord with this provision, it being declared:

> "That said contemplated work of improvement is in the opinion of said council of more than local or ordinary public benefit, and said council does hereby find, determine and declare that an assessment district shall be formed to pay for the cost and expenses of said improvement; and the exterior boundaries of said district to be benefited by said improvement and to be assessed to pay the costs and expenses thereof" is as follows.

In the case of Haughawout v. Raymond, 148 Cal. 311, 83 Pac. 53, a like attack was made upon the resolution of intention, wherein the declaration was as follows:

> "The district to be benefited and to be assessed to pay the total cost of said work is hereby declared to be all those certain lots and parcels of land lying in the city of Los Angeles and particularly described as follows, to wit"

—and wherein it was held the contention did not merit any consideration. Not only is the finding sufficient as a basis for establishing the assessment district, but it is likewise sufficent as a determination by the city council, to whom a determination of the question is delegated by the Legislature, to show that the lots and lands within the exterior boundaries of the district will be specially benefited by the improvement. Whether the property will be specially benefited thereby is a question of fact to be determined by the legislative branch of the municipality, and in the absence of fraud, or arbitrarily and in total disregard of the exercise of judicial discretion vested in the assessment board, equivalent to fraud, as was the case in Spring Street Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 170 Cal. 24, 148 Pac. 217, such determination must be deemed conclusive. Walston v. Nevin, 128 U. S. 582, 9 Sup. Ct. 192, 32 L. Ed. 544; Litchfield v. Vernon, 41 N. Y. 123; Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 691, 76 Pac. 661; Remillard v. Blake & B. Co., 169 Cal. 277, 146 Pac. 634, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 451. The position of counsel for appellants, as announced at the hearing, was to the effect that whenever a city council declares its intention to make street improvements, and likewise its intention to establish an assessment district upon which to apportion the cost of such improvement, any dissatisfied property owner therein, upon a claim that his property will not be benefited, may demand a hearing in court, and thus obstruct the proposed improvement until a determination of such question by the court. As stated in Paulson v. City of Portland, 16 Or. 450, 19 Pac. 450, 1 L. R. A. 673, such a course would hardly be practicable, and would result in substituting in place of the judgment of the common council, who are selected on account of their supposed fitness for that duty, the opinion of a multitude of witnesses, many of whom would be personally interested in the controversy. Says Hamilton on Special Assessments, § 515:

> "The determination of the assessing board as to what property is benefited and the extent of such benefit, when made in accordance with statutory requirements, is conclusive, in the absence of fraud or mistake."

Of course, the theory upon which the district is established, upon which the cost of the work shall be apportioned, is that it will derive special benefits from the improvement. But some one must determine that question, and, as stated, the Legislature has seen fit to delegate such power to the city council. From this conclusion it follows that the allegations of the complaint to the effect that plaintiffs' property will not be benefited by the proposed improvement cannot be considered in aid of the statement of a cause of action, since as to such question no evidence in support thereof would be admissible upon the trial. Cake v. City of Los Angeles, 164 Cal. 705, 130 Pac. 723; Duncan v. Ramish, supra.

[5] Section 3 of the act provides that the resolution of intention shall be posted conspicuously for two days on or near the chamber door of said council and published by two insertions in one or more daily, semiweekly, or weekly newspapers published and circulated in said city and designated by said council for that purpose. It also provides that the street superintendent shall post along the streets upon which the improvement is to be made, at not more than 300 feet apart, notices of the passage of said resolution, and requires street superintendents to cause a notice similar in substance to be published by two insertions in one or more daily newspapers, and likewise provides that the city clerk shall, upon the passage of the resolution of intention, mail, postage prepaid, to each property owner whose property is to be assessed for the cost of the improvement, a notice in the form prescribed. The act then provides that the failure of the city clerk to mail said postal cards, or the failure of the superintendent of streets to post the notices of street work along the line of the improvement, shall in no wise affect the validity of the proceedings or prevent the city council from acquiring jurisdiction to order the work.

> "This," says counsel for appellants, in attacking the provision upon the ground that it authorizes the taking of property without due process of law, "is rank 'progress' towards injustice and anarchy. What lawyer, what judge, can lend his judgment to support such a law? We will do the lower court the justice to say we did not study or present all of the communistic phases of the act when the demurrer was argued."

Unfortunately this court, since the question is thus presented, cannot escape, as did the trial court, the animadversions of appellants' counsel. We are, nevertheless, constrained to "lend our judgment" in support of the fact that the publication of the resolution and the posting thereof by the city clerk, together with the publication of the notice of street work, even in the absence of the posting of notices along the line of the street and the sending out of the postal cards (which, however, is conceded to have been done), constitutes a sufficient notice, provided the affidavits of the posting of said notices and the mailing of said postal cards, as required, be filed showing the performance of such duty. The complaint contains no denial thereof. Clearly the publication and posting of the resolution, together with the publication of notice of street work, should be held sufficient notice of the proposed improvement of the streets by the city council. As determined by the Legislature, these acts were not only essential, but ample for the purpose intended; indeed, the requirement is in excess of that usual in cases of constructive notice. See: Reclamation District v. Hagar, 66 Cal. 55, 4 Pac. 945; Fallbrook Irrigation Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 115, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369. The posting of notices of street work by the superintendent of streets and the mailing of postal cards were nonessentials, and the requirement might have been omitted altogether without affecting the validity of the provision as to notice. This being true, the legislative enactment that a failure to comply with the provision so declared, and in fact a nonessential, constitutes no ground for complaint on the part of appellants. There is nothing in Brookes v. City of Oakland, 160 Cal. 423, 117 Pac. 433, sustaining appellants' contention.

[6, 7] Since not required by the act, no cause for complaint arises from the fact that the intersecting streets, some of which it was proposed to improve, were not delineated upon the map showing the boundaries of the district. Nor is there any merit in the contention that the proposed improvement embraces numerous kinds of improvements (section 2, Vrooman Act, Stats. 1913, p. 402; section 7, subd. 13, Stats. 1911, p. 632), some of which may not benefit plaintiffs' property. We cannot indulge in the presumption that the assessment board will apportion any part of the cost of constructing a sewer upon lands that receive no benefit therefrom. On the other hand, a benefit might result from other improvements described in the resolution for which the land so exempted from the cost of sewer construction should pay in proportion to the benefits received.

[8] Appellants' next point is that the court erred in refusing to permit them to amend their complaint by inserting an allegation to the effect that a member of the city council who voted in favor of the adoption of the resolution of intention and whose vote was necessary to constitute a majority in favor of the passage thereof was an owner of property within the proposed district. The denial of the motion to so amend the complaint was based upon the ground that the subject of the amendment was immaterial. The ruling of the court is supported by the cases of United Real Estate, etc., Co. v. Barnes, 159 Cal. 244, 113 Pac. 167, and Corliss v. Village of Highland Park, 132 Mich. 152, 93 N. W. 254, 610, 95 N. W. 416. There is no statutory provision, as in the case of Capron v. Hitchcock, 98 Cal. 428, 33 Pac. 431, cited by appellants, disqualifying a member of the city council from voting upon the adoption of a resolution of intention because of his ownership of lands in the district which will be subject to assessment for the cost of the improvement.

> "In the absence of specific statute, the fact that a member of a common council owns land which is subject to assessment does not disqualify him from acting."

We do not deem other points urged by appellants of sufficient importance to merit further discussion. Suffice it to say that we agree with the learned trial judge that the complaint fails to state a cause of action; and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

HELD v. BEACH-ROBINSON CO.

(Civ. 1851.)

1. ASSIGNMENTS 🔑50(1) — ASSIGNMENT OF AMOUNT DUE ON CONTRACT.

Where one advanced money to a subcontractor on promise of a main contractor that it would repay him from the amount payable to the subcontractor upon orders from the subcontractor, and, such orders from the subcontractor being procured, the main contractor also promised in writing to pay such sums out of the amount due as soon as received, and the orders and written promise were ambiguous as to whether such payments were to be made out of a particular portion of the fund payable to the subcontractor and testimony thereon was conflicting, the trial court was entitled to resolve the conflict in favor of the person advancing the money.

2. ASSIGNMENTS 🔑55—CONSIDERATION.

The acceptance of the orders of the subcontractor by the main contractor was sufficient consideration for the latter's subsequent written promise to pay such sums, under Civ. Code, § 1606, as to effect as consideration of a legal or moral obligation.

3. ASSIGNMENTS 🔑52—EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENTS—ORDER ON PARTICULAR FUND.

The orders and the written promise were to be read together, and, so read, could be construed as constituting an unqualified and equitable assignment of the aggregate amount called for out of an existing fund.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Adolphus E. Graupner and Bernard J. Flood, Judges.

Action by Ernest Held against the Beach-Robinson Company. From judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robinson & Sizer and Robinson, Gillis & Sizer, all of Oakland, for appellant. L. T. Jacks, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The facts of the case are substantially these: The defendant in the month of September, 1913, had been awarded a contract to remodel Grace Cathedral Church, and in the month of November of that year sublet the portion of its contract having to do with inside cabinet work to the Bank Equipment Company for the sum of $4,400. The plaintiff for some years prior to this time had been engaged in the business of doing artistic woodwork, but had disposed of his business to a successor, which in turn transferred it to the Bank Equipment Company. Plaintiff was friendly to this latter institution, and evidently desired that it should succeed in the fulfillment of this particular subcontract, but a little more than a month after work upon it had begun plaintiff learned from the president of the Bank Equipment Company that it was being hard pressed for money and in danger of attachment for a bill of $150. The plaintiff went to Mr. Beach, of the Beach-Robinson Company, and explained the situation, whereupon the latter stated that, if the plaintiff would advance the money to the Bank Equipment Company to meet its immediate need, and if the said company would give the plaintiff an order for the amount, "he [meaning, of course, the defendant] would stay good for it." The plaintiff took this course, and procured an order for $150, to be paid "out of the money due us under our contract with you." This order the Beach-Robinson Company accepted; and not long after, and under a similar state of facts, accepted another order of the Bank Equipment Company in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $630, payable 35 days after the completion of the defendant's contract with the Grace Cathedral corporation. Within a day or two after the signing of this second order the plaintiff, apparently desiring a more formal writing covering both advances to the Bank Equipment Company, secured from the defendant the following paper:

> "San Francisco, 1914, January 19.
> "Ernest Held, Esq.—Dear Sir: We promise to pay you $630 and $150, equal to $780, out of the Grace Cathedral fund as soon as we receive it from the Grace Cathedral Association, which we expect will be about February 26, 1914. Respectfully yours, The Beach-Robinson Company, per R. E. Beach, Sec."

At the time of the execution of this writing Mr. Beach said to plaintiff: "Everything is all right. We will protect you." On the date of the acceptance of these orders and of the execution of the above writing there was, according to the undisputed evidence of the architect, and also according to the figures which Mr. Beach himself gave to the plaintiff, at that time approximately $1,300 in the Grace Cathedral fund belonging to the Bank Equipment Company, and then payable or thereafter to become due to it under its contract with the defendant. Within a day or two after the execution of the above paper the defendant informed the Bank Equipment Company in writing of the acceptance of these orders, and charged the Grace Cathedral fund on its books with the amount thereof. The defendant did not, however, inform either the Grace Cathedral corporation or the architect in charge of the work of the existence of the plaintiff's accepted orders or its written promise to him, but, on the contrary, the evidence shows that the above fund in existence at the time of the acceptance of said orders was thereafter depleted by payments made upon other orders of the defendant upon it, or by payments directly to the Bank Equipment Company, so that only the sum of $168 remained payable to the latter from the Grace Cathedral fund when the time for making the final payment upon the contract arrived. The evidence showed that some time after the acceptance of plaintiff's orders, and after its written promise to pay their aggregate sum to him, the defendant paid over to the Bank Equipment Company the sum of $216.70 upon its contract and out of the Cathedral fund, regardless of the existence of these outstanding obligations.

[1] The appellant makes two main contentions upon this appeal. The first is that the obligations assumed by it through its two accepted orders and its written promise were to be satisfied out of the final payment upon the subcontract of the Bank Equipment Company due 35 days after the completion of the work, and that as to this balance it was depleted by lien claimants, whose rights to this particular portion of the fund were superior to that of the plaintiff. The trial court refused its assent to this construction of the writings in question; and we think it did not err in so doing. The writings themselves did not thus limit the defendant's obligations and promise; and if it can be said that they are uncertain in that regard, the testimony of the parties is conflicting as to the fund out of which the plaintiff was to be paid, and the trial court—as it was entitled to do—resolved that conflict in the plaintiff's favor.

The appellant's next contention is that the fund against which these orders were drawn was depleted without any fault on its part through the direct payment by the architect of other claims against the Bank Equipment Company of which the defendant had no knowledge. The record does not bear out this contention, but, on the contrary, shows not only that the architect paid none of such claims without the defendant's written order, but also that the defendant itself on a date subsequent to the dates of the plaintiff's orders paid to the Bank Equipment Company the sum of $216.70, regardless of the plaintiff's outstanding claim.

[2, 3] In respect to the appellant's final contention that the two orders accepted by the defendant did not amount to an equitable assignment of the sums they called for out of an existing fund, and that, as to its written promise of a day or two later, it was without consideration, we are of the opinion that the existence of the obligations assumed in the acceptance of these orders was a sufficient consideration for the defendant's written promise under section 1606 of the Civil Code, and that these several documents are to be read together, and, so read, are susceptible of the interpretation placed upon them by the trial court as constituting an unqualified and equitable assignment of the aggregate amount called for out of an existing fund. Pierce v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 121; Holder Lumber Co. v. Scarborough, 28 Cal. App. 152, 151 Pac. 674. The case of Lynip v. Alturas, 24 Cal. App. 426, 141 Pac. 835, relied upon by appellant, is clearly distinguishable from the case at bar, since in that case the liability of the defendant was necessarily contingent upon the completion and acceptance of the building, while the proofs showed that the building was abandoned by the contractor before the payments on which the order was drawn became due.

Judgment and order affirmed.

1. Sales 🔑261(2) — "Warranty" — Requisites.

Any affirmation, made at the time of the sale or exchange of personal property, as to the character and condition of the thing sold, will be treated as a warranty, if it is so intended, and if the other party acquired the property on the faith of such affirmation, although the word "warranty," or any form of affirmative words of warranty, be not employed.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Warranty.]

2. Sales 435(3) — Breach of Warranty — Pleading.

In an action for rescission of the sale of an automobile, an allegation that defendants falsely represented to the plaintiff as a fact that the automobile was then and there a 1912 model Pope-Hartford 50 horse power car, whereas in fact it was a 1911 model of that make, and that plaintiff wholly relied upon the representation, constituted an allegation of an express warranty as to the quality and character of the automobile.

3. Sales 🔑38(7)—Representations—Right to Rely Thereon.

Whenever, on a sale, a positive representation of a material fact is made, the party receiving it is entitled to rely and act upon it, and is not bound to verify it by an independent investigation, although he has an opportunity to do so.

4. Sales 🔑261(4) — Warranties — Requisites.

A positive representation, by the agent of the seller of an automobile, as of a material fact, for the purpose of inducing the buyer to make the purchase, that the car was a 1912 model, constituted, when acted upon, an express warranty.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by James Morris against the Fiat Motor Sales Company of California and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. W. McKnight, of San Francisco, for appellants. F. L. Berry, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. From the evidence in this case it appears that in the month of March, 1913, the plaintiff purchased from the defendants a second-hand automobile, styled Pope-Hartford, through the efforts of one Shaw, who was employed by the defendants as a mechanic and demonstrator, but who, under the evidence in this case, must be regarded as the agent of the defendants in the sale of the car in question. During the negotiations for the same Shaw represented to the plaintiff, among other things, that the car was a "1912 model." Within a month after the purchase the plaintiff discovered that the car was not of the manufacturer's model of 1912, but of 1911, and was consequently of less value, whereupon he immediately offered to redeliver the car to the defendants, and demanded the return of the purchase price. This offer and demand being refused, he commenced this action for rescission of the contract. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and this appeal is by the defendants from that judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] It is true, as claimed by defendants, that an express warranty, to be available, must be alleged in the complaint; but this does not mean that, in order to create an express warranty of an article of personal property, the word "warranty" should be employed, or any form of affirmative words of warranty. Any affirmation made at the time of the sale or exchange, as to the character or condition of the thing sold, will be treated as a warranty, if it is so intended, and if the other party acquired the property on the faith of such affirmation. Coats v. Hord, 29 Cal. App. 115, 154 Pac. 491; Luitweiler, etc., v. Ukiah, etc., Co., 16 Cal. App. 198, 207, 116 Pac. 707, 712; Pepper v. Vedova, 26 Cal. App. 406, 147 Pac. 105; 35 Cyc. 381.

[2] In the present case the complaint alleges that the defendants falsely represented to the plaintiff as a fact that the automobile was then and there a 1912 model Pope-Hartford 50 horse power car, whereas in truth and in fact it was a 1911 model of that make; that plaintiff wholly relied upon said representation in making the purchase. This, we think, constituted an allegation of an express warranty as to the quality and character of the automobile. Bergeler v. Michael, 84 Wis. 627, 54 N. W. 995; 35 Cyc. 448; Barry v. Danielson, 78 Wash. 453, 139 Pac. 223; 30 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 136, 138.

[3] Neither do we agree with the defendants' contention that under the circumstances of the case, plaintiff having had an opportunity to investigate and learn whether or not the representation of the defendants was true, he had no right to place reliance upon their statements. Whenever a positive representation of a material fact is made, the party receiving it is in general entitled to rely and act upon it, and is not bound to verify it by an independent investigation. 30 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 146; Maxon-Nowlin v. Norswing, 166 Cal. 509, 137 Pac. 240; Dow v. Swain, 125 Cal. 674, 58 Pac. 271; Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 895. "Where there is an express warranty, the buyer is under no obligation to inspect or examine the goods purchased, but may rely on the warranty." 35 Cyc. 378.

[4] In the case at bar the automobile company and its representative who conducted the sale were engaged in the business of selling automobiles; the plaintiff, it appears, knew little or nothing about such vehicles, but he was acquainted with the sales agent and had confidence in him. During the negotiations the agent made a positive representation of a material fact, and not of a mere matter of opinion or judgment, for the purpose—as the trial court with reason held—of inducing the plaintiff to make the purchase, and which representation was accepted and relied on by him. Such a representation constituted an express warranty. 35 Cyc. 381.

Defendants also assert that the plaintiff sustained no injury by reason of the misrepresentation. It was conceded at the trial that, other things being equal, a 1912 model Pope-Hartford 50 horse power automobile was worth at least $200 more than a 1911 model of the same make.

Two other points are discussed in the briefs, but they are wholly without merit, and require no detailed discussion.

TIDEWATER SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. HARNEY. (Civ. 1531.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 5, 1916. On Petition for Rehearing, Jan. 4, 1917.)

1. Evidence 🔑419(15) — Parol Evidence Affecting Writing.

In an action on a note given in payment of a subscription to corporate stock, the company agreeing to buy back the stock at the end of 10 months at the price paid if defendant was not satisfied that such collateral agreement was the controlling consideration for the note could properly be shown by parol.

2. Corporations 🔑82 — Subscription to Stock—Rescission.

Where defendant subscribed to corporate stock, giving a note for the price, the company to buy it back at the same price in 10 months if defendant was not satisfied, by exercising her privilege of rescission she terminated her conditional obligation on the note, it making no difference, since no third party was interested, that her promise to pay took the form of a note.

3. Corporations 🔑82 — Subscription to Stock—Rescission — Intention — Lack of Form and Precision.

The court is not precluded from giving effect to the intention of the parties by reason of the fact that its expression is lacking somewhat in technical form or precision.

4. Corporations 🔑399(7)—Representation by Agent — Subscription to Stock — Ostensible Authority.

A corporation's agent authorized to sell its stock and having the blank subscription book had ostensible authority to make an agreement with a subscriber that if she was not satisfied with the stock in 10 months, the company would buy it back at the price paid.

5. Principal and Agent 🔑123(1), 173(1)—Authority and Ratification—Evidence.

The authority of an agent and ratification of his acts by his principal may be shown by circumstances.

6. Corporations 🔑432(12)—Acts of Agent—Ratification—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In a corporation's action on a note given for a subscription to stock, evidence held to show, either that the company's agent was authorized to contract on its behalf, that if defendant was not satisfied with her stock in 10 months the company would buy it back, or else that the company ratified the agent's act in making such contract.

7. Corporations 🔑423—Fraud of Agent—Responsibility of Corporation.

A corporation was liable for the fraud of its agent in inducing parties to subscribe to stock and failing to indorse on the original subscription in the hands of the company the agreement that it would buy back the stock in 10 months if the subscriber was not satisfied, which he had indorsed on the subscriber's duplicate subscription, since it was manifestly the duty of the agent to file the original of the agreement of the parties with the corporation, while the rule that a principal is liable to third persons for the wrongful acts of his agent applies to acts of omission as well as to acts of commission.

8. Corporations 🔑82 — Fraud of Agent — Negligence of Plaintiff.

Where a company's agent to induce parties to subscribe to its stock agreed on behalf of the company that it would repurchase stock subscribed for in 10 months if the subscriber was not satisfied, the subscriber was not chargeable with negligence in failing to discover the agent's omission to indorse such agreement on the so-called "original" subscription in the hands of the company.

9. Bills and Notes 🔑353—Innocent Purchaser.

Where plaintiff corporation became the owner of a note by virtue of the consolidation of the holder corporation and plaintiff, the latter cannot be said to be an innocent purchaser or indorsee of the note for value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 814, 898–903½, 906, 907; Dec. Dig. 🔑353.]

10. Bills and Notes 🔑497(5) — Innocent Holder—Burden of Proof.

Where fraud or illegality in the inception of a note is shown by the maker, the burden of proof is cast upon the indorsee to show that he is an innocent holder.

11. Corporations 🔑428(7)—Notice to Officer.

The knowledge of the president of a corporation of the infirmity of a note held by a company with which the first consolidated was sufficient to charge his corporation with notice.

12. Corporations 🔑90(1)—Stock Subscription — Fraud as Defense — Independent Action.

In a company's action on a note given for a subscription to stock, defendant could set up that the contract she made with the company's agent was that it should repurchase her stock if she was not satisfied therewith in 10 months, thereby showing failure of consideration by reason of the company's refusal to keep the agreement which was the sole inducement for her promise, and it was not necessary that she resort to an independent action for damages to enforce her claim; since a party defrauded may obtain relief by cancellation or rescission, by action to recover a pecuniary compensation for injuries sustained, or by setting the fraud up to defeat an action brought to enforce an apparent obligation or liability, while she could not sue for failure to repurchase stock which she did not own and never had in possession.

13. Corporations 🔑82—Subscription Contract—Construction.

Where a corporation's agent soliciting subscriptions to its stock indorsed on the back of a subscriber's duplicate certificate the company's agreement that it would repurchase the stock in 10 months if the subscriber was not satisfied, the court could construe the agreement as one for the cancellation of the subscriber's liability on the note she gave for the stock, and to carry out the contract it was not requisite that the subscriber pay the company for the stock, receive it, then immediately return the shares and receive her money again.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by the Tidewater Southern Railway Company, a corporation, against Minnie S. Harney. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Meredith, Landis & Chester, of Sacramento, for appellant. A. H. Ashley, of Stockton, and G. M. Steele, of Lodi, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. On July 25, 1911, respondent subscribed in writing for 500 shares of the common stock of the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company, for which she agreed to pay $500. At that time the railroad company was actively engaged in soliciting subscriptions for stock. The subscriptions were made out in triplicate. One marked "original" was retained by the company, one marked "duplicate" was given to the subscriber, and the other marked "triplicate" was retained by the agent. At the time of this subscription defendant executed her note for five hundred dollars for said stock. The duplicate subscription, retained by respondent, had written on the back thereof the following:

> "July 25–11. Ten months from date, if holder of contract wishes, we agree to take said stock off purchasers hands at the purchase price of $1.00 per share. Tidewater & Southern R. R. Co., by R. U. Morey, Sec. Dept."

This was not written upon the original subscription retained by the company.

On March 11, 1912, the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company consolidated with the Tidewater & Southern Transit Company, and the plaintiff corporation was thereby organized succeeding to all the property rights of each. The action was brought upon said promissory note, and the defendant attacked the consideration for the note, claiming that the sale was conditional and that by the fraud of plaintiff's agent, the true consideration did not appear upon the "original" subscription. The defense is elaborately set out in the answer, and the findings and judgment were in accordance therewith.

The case in its main features is quite similar to Tidewater Southern Railway Company v. Vance, 23 Cal. App. Dec. 447 [also reported in 160 Pac. 1097], and is substantially covered by that decision. It is held therein, as stated in the syllabus:

> "An agreement, made by a fully organized corporation with a subscriber for certain shares of its capital stock, that the subscriber should have the right at any time within ten months to cancel his subscription and to recall his promissory note given therefor, is enforceable against the corporation, in the absence of any showing that any later subscriber had been defrauded by his reliance upon such subscription, or that any subsequent creditor had relied upon such subscription in dealing with the corporation."

The principles governing the transaction are set forth clearly and succinctly in said opinion written by Mr. Justice Richards, and it may be said that the Supreme Court denied the petition for a hearing by that court. The following statement in said opinion is applicable here:

> "The Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company had been fully organized before the respondent's subscription to its stock was made, and it does not appear that there was any later subscriber who could have been defrauded by his reliance upon the respondent's subscription; nor does it appear that there was any subsequent creditor of said corporation who could or did rely thereon in dealing with said corporation; nor is it shown that there was any secrecy contemplated or connived at by the respondent in the making of the collateral agreement by which he was permitted, within ten months thereafter, to cancel his subscription by recalling his note; nor that he had any knowledge of the fact that the authorized agent of the corporation failed to also indorse such agreement upon the original subscription which said agent retained on behalf of the corporation. Whatever secrecy there was in respect to this agreement was imparted entirely by the corporation itself through the act or neglect of its authorized agent; and, this being so, and no rights of subsequent subscribers or creditors being involved in the case, it would be a manifest fraud upon the defendant to permit the corporation to take advantage of its own wrong by repudiating its agreement while enforcing the defendant's note, which was evidently given only because of the reservation in said agreement permitting its recall."

[1] That this collateral agreement was the controlling consideration for the note could properly be shown by parol. Muir v. Hamilton, 152 Cal. 636, 93 Pac. 857. As to the fact itself, respondent was positive in her statements and she was corroborated by other evidence. She testified that:

> She signed the agreement at her home in the country. "On the day we signed up Mr. Morey and Mr. Avery came to see us in regard to the subscription agreement. Agents had been to see us on previous days. I don't remember just how many days, but I guess they came for more than one week in regard to this. My brother and sister were present when I signed. We didn't want to take the stock. He (Mr. Morey) said if we would take it he would give us this contract; that we could turn it back in ten months' time if we were not satisfied with it. He said he would give us our note back. I have never had experience whatever in the matter of purchasing stock. I resided on the ranch all my life up until last year. * * * I relied upon his statements. I would not have signed it if I didn't believe in it, * * * if he had not made this representation."

She testified, further, that the agent wrote the contract on the back of what she supposed was the original and gave her the duplicate, and said that the same contract would be on all of said applications, that the original would be turned in at the office, and that he would keep the "triplicate," and that she discovered for the first time when she came into court that there was no such writing on the back of the original.

[2, 3] Not only does she thus exhibit the true consideration for the note, but she displays the palpable effort of the agent to defraud her. By failing to indorse said agreement on the said "original" he thought to hold her to the absolute terms of the promise to pay the money. This feature of the case, though, might probably be eliminated from further attention as the rights of creditors or other subscribers are not involved. The decision, indeed, may rest upon the proposition that a vital element in the consideration for the note was this promise in effect to return the note and cancel the obligation within ten months if desired by respondent, and the failure of such consideration by reason of the refusal of appellant to comply with such agreement.

Or the transaction may be viewed as presenting this legal aspect: There was an agreement to deliver to respondent a certain number of shares of stock, provided the sum of $500 was paid in accordance with the terms of the note. Respondent had, however, the option to pay said sum or, within ten months, to cancel said agreement and be relieved from further liability. She exercised said privilege of rescission, and therefore her conditional obligation was terminated. The transaction must be considered, of course, in its entirety, and the effect is the same as though the contract were fully expressed in one instrument. It can make no difference, since no innocent third person is interested, that the promise to pay the money took the form of a promissory note. Nor are we precluded from giving effect to the intention of the parties by reason of the fact that its expression is lacking somewhat in technical form or precision. In fact, whatever deficiency may exist in that respect was caused by the agent of the corporation, who was moved by a sinister purpose to take any advantage of the confidence of respondent, and she should have the benefit of any intendment that may be reasonably indulged.

Two or three other questions raised by appellant are entitled to some consideration.

[4] We are satisfied that appellant should not be permitted to deny the authority of the agent to enter into such conditional contract. The agents were authorized to sell stock; they had the blank subscription book. In the sale of the stock they represented, therefore, the corporation. The purchaser was not warned nor put upon inquiry as to any limitation to the authority of the agent in receiving subscriptions. The purchaser had the right to assume that the salesman was authorized by the corporation to do those legal acts which the nature of his employment seemed to warrant. The agent, in other words, was ostensibly clothed with unlimited authority, and upon familiar principles appellant should not be heard to disavow and repudiate the contract made by him.

Again, it appears that before the expiration of the ten months, respondent, in company with her brother and sister, called upon Mr. Bearce, the president of the corporation, and demanded the cancellation of their subscriptions. Mr. Bearce's declarations and conduct at that time were indicative of his knowledge of the whole transaction and of his ratification on behalf of the corporation of the terms of the contract made by respondent. He asserted no claim that the corporation had no knowledge of the conditional agreement, or that the sales agent had no authority to sell stock on such terms. He did not disavow liability on behalf of the corporation, nor did he manifest any inclination to disregard or repudiate the actual agreement that was made. To the contrary, he declared that he intended to cancel the notes, including those of respondent's brother and sister which were given on similar conditions. In fact, an entry was made by the auditor in the bills receivable account of the corporation that respondent's note was canceled. This was undoubtedly at the direction of the president, as he said to respondent:

> "He thought the note had been canceled until the time that the Railroad Commission took hold of it. He said there had been an entry of cancellation made, and he called some one of the young ladies to find out when he had been there and he had canceled it, and she told him the date."

Mr. Bearce himself testified:

> "When they came in, oh, I told the defendant that we would cancel the subscription and as far as I was concerned that was my intention to do it. Then when they commenced to come in, we got the attorneys, Meredith, Landis & Chester, and they told us we could not cancel them."

And in answer to the question, "Why did you cancel them?" he said: "Because that agreement, as far as I knew, was a bona fide agreement."

[5, 6] The authority of the agent and the ratification of his acts by the principal may be shown, of course, by circumstances, and it is fair to assert that a review of the whole situation leads rationally to the conclusion that, in legal contemplation, the act of Morey in the premises was the act of appellant.

[7] Moreover, if we regard the fraudulent feature of the transaction, we reach the same conclusion. It was the duty of the agent to make the proper indorsement on the "original" subscription. If he had done so, the corporation would have had, through that channel, actual knowledge of the entire contract. But by the fraud of the agent the said indorsement was not made, and, as far as respondent is concerned, the case must be viewed then as though said indorsement had been made and acquiesced in by appellant; for the act of the agent under the circumstances is the act of the principal, and the latter must suffer the consequences of the agent's failure to do as he agreed. This particular phase of the case is discussed with great learning by Mr. Justice Lorigan in Otis Elevator Co. v. First National Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 124 Pac. 704, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529, wherein is an elaborate exposition of the doctrine that:

> "A principal is liable to third parties, not only for the negligence of its agents in the transaction of the business of the agency, but likewise for the frauds, torts, or other wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as part of the transaction of such business."

The fraud perpetrated therein by the agent consisted in presenting a check for payment which had been raised to a much larger amount than it originally called for. He was the agent of a depositor, and for a period of several years had been intrusted by his principal with the duty of filling out in his own handwriting the body of checks payable to "cash" or "bearer," and after the same were signed he presented them to and had them cashed at the depository bank. It was held that he was acting within the scope of his employment when he presented the "raised" check. The principle applies, of course, to acts of omission as well as to acts of commission. It was manifestly the duty of the agent herein to file the original of the actual agreement of the parties with the corporation. He was acting directly within the scope of his authority when he secured the contract and filed it with the principal, and his fraudulent omission of a material part of the subscription must be regarded in the same light as would be a fraudulent addition of a material term. The result is that the status of the parties was fixed as though the agent had done his duty, and appellant is deemed to have ratified the conditional contract.

[8] Nor will it do to say that respondent is chargeable with negligence in failing to discover the omission and to insist that the agent make the proper indorsement. She had a right to rely upon his promise and representations. There may be some antiquated authorities requiring a person to assume that every one with whom he has a business transaction is a rogue and to act accordingly, but the more reasonable theory is that he can act upon the presumption that there exists no intention to cheat or defraud him. The modern generally accepted doctrine is:

> "That a man may act upon a positive representation of fact, notwithstanding the fact that the means of knowledge were specially open to him. If the representation were of a character to induce action, and did induce it, that is enough. It matters not that a person misled may be said, in some loose sense, to have been negligent. (In reality negligence is beside the case where the misrepresentation was calculated to mislead and did mislead); for it is not just that a man who has deceived another should be permitted to say to him, 'You ought not to have believed or trusted me,' or, 'You were yourself guilty of negligence.'" Bigelow on Fraud, vol. 1, 523–524.

And as to subscriptions the rule is stated in 10 Cyc. p. 424 (d) and (f), as follows:

> "There are common-law authorities to the effect that one who has been drawn by fraudulent representations into making a subscription for stock of a corporation cannot set up the fact that the fraud was practiced upon him and that it induced him to enter into the contract, by way of defense to an action for the subscription, unless he shows that he used due diligence before signing the contract to discover whether or not the representations were true; but the rule of equity is that where there has been a fraudulent misrepresentation or a willful concealment of facts by means of which a person has been induced to enter into a contract to subscribe, in the absence of circumstances tending to excite suspicion in the mind of a reasonable man, he may rightfully rely upon the statements to which the other party to the contract or the agent of such other party has deliberately pledged his faith."

Said rule applies here, as there were no circumstances that would excite the suspicion of a reasonable person. It cannot be claimed that plaintiff is in a better position as to the note than would be the original payee.

[9] As we have seen, plaintiff became the owner by virtue of the consolidation of the two corporations. It cannot be said to be an innocent purchaser or indorsee of the note for value.

[10] If it may be assumed that plaintiff can be placed in the category of indorsee before maturity, then the rule of the modern authorities will apply that:

> "Where fraud or illegality in the inception of the note is shown by the maker, the burden of proof is then cast upon the indorsee to show that he is an innocent holder." Jordan v. Grover, 99 Cal. 194, 33 Pac. 889; Union Collection Company v. Buckman, 150 Cal. 159, 88 Pac. 708, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 568, 119 Am. St. Rep. 164, 11 Ann. Cas. 609.

[11] There is no such evidence. The inference is rather that plaintiff had knowledge of the consideration for said note at the time it succeeded to its ownership. There is evidence that Mr. Bearce understood the situation when he became president of the new corporation at the time it was formed. His knowledge would be sufficient to charge the corporation with notice.

[12] Nor do we think there is any merit in the contention that respondent should have resorted to an independent action for damages to enforce her claims under the contract. As before indicated, the consideration for the note was involved, and of course that can be set up as a defense to an action on said note. Or if we view the element of fraud to which we have adverted, attention may be directed to the established and permissible procedure as set forth in Field v. Austin, 131 Cal. 382, 63 Pac. 692, and other cases, recognizing three methods by which a party defrauded may obtain relief as follows: (1) Cancellation or rescission, whereby the defrauded party procures an instrument to be set aside and himself to be restored to his original position; (2) affirmative relief by an action to recover a pecuniary compensation for the injury sustained by the fraud of the defendant where no cancellation is necessary as the basis of such recovery; and (3) defensive relief, whereby the fraud is set up by way of defense to defeat an action brought to enforce an apparent obligation or liability.

After an examination of the entire record and such consideration as we could give to the suggestions of counsel, we are persuaded that it would be wrong to interfere with the judgment of the lower court, and it is therefore affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

BURNETT, J. [13] In view of appellant's petition for rehearing a few words may be added to the former opinion. We may concede the rule concerning parol testimony to be as stated by appellant. It is a mistake, however, to assume that we have added, or attempted to add, anything to the written agreement of the parties. We have simply held—what must be apparent—that under the circumstances of this case the agreement was in effect to cancel respondent's obligation if she exercised her option within ten months. As to this it may be declared that the contract was so treated and interpreted by respondent and by the president of appellant; it was so represented by the agent and so understood by Miss Harney at the time of its execution, and it cannot be doubted that a cancellation of respondent's obligation by appellant would have been essentially a compliance with the corporation's agreement

This necessarily follows from the fact that the contract was executory and respondent promised to pay the same amount for the same number of shares of stock as appellant. The stock was never delivered to respondent, and she made no payment therefor, but simply gave her promissory note. Suppose appellant had kept its promise, what would have occurred? It would have delivered to respondent the contract and promissory note and whatever was necessary to evidence a satisfaction or cancellation of respondent's obligation. But, according to appellant's theory, to carry out its contract this proceeding would be required: Respondent would pay appellant the sum of $500 and receive the 500 shares, and then she would immediately return the shares and receive the money again. Such circuity of action would not be required. Its equivalent would be indubitably the cancellation of respondent's obligation and the return of the note. So it seems perfectly plain that the court below, as well as the parties to the action, had a right to construe the agreement as one for the cancellation of respondent's liability. We have not varied nor added to the terms of the agreement, but have sought to give it effect according to its plain meaning and intent.

We think, also, that appellant is mistaken in the suggestion that the main contention of respondent is that "she was deprived of a most important consideration in that the collateral agreement was not embodied in the original, and hence she could not take advantage of its provisions." That was only one of the series of fraudulent acts perpetrated by the corporation through its agent. However, the fraud is not so important if we accord to respondent the full benefit of the contract that was actually entered into. And we can see no reason why, in an action brought by appellant to recover on the promise of respondent, she may not show a failure of consideration by reason of the refusal of the former to keep the covenant which was the sole inducement for the promise on the part of respondent. Appellant, having brought the suit, invited the very defense that was interposed, and made it proper to adjudicate the merits of the whole transaction. In this connection it may be said that the record shows that respondent did exercise her option, and that appellant failed to keep its agreement is not the subject of dispute.

It seems entirely plain that respondent could bring no such independent action for damages as is suggested by appellant. How could she sue for the failure to purchase from her stock which she did not own and never had in her possession? How could she tender the stock, as required, before bringing an action for the purchase price when she had no control of said stock?

But we need not go further than to say that in our judgment appellant has failed to appreciate the situation of the parties and the nature of their contract. It has been treated as though the stock had been delivered by respondent and the money paid for it and she were the moving party in the action. It may be that from a legal standpoint the defense might have been presented more artistically and accurately, but the cause was fairly tried and justly decided and the conclusion should not be disturbed. The petition is denied.

BURNS v. HAMMEL, Sheriff. (Civ. 1650.)

1. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⚷138(3)—EXECUTION SALE — CLAIM OF THIRD PARTY — TITLE OF JUDGMENT DEBTOR.

In suit against sheriff for damages for execution sale of automobile, evidence that the judgment debtor at all times assumed complete control of the automobile, and that the money used for its purchase was loaned to him and his wife in his wife's name on account of his ill health, held sufficient to sustain finding that the automobile belonged to the judgment debtor, or that it was community property, as to which no transfer with change of possession required by Civ. Code, § 3440, as to creditors, had ever been made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. §§ 295, 296; Dec. Dig. ⚷138(3).]

2. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⚷138(3)—EXECUTION SALE—CLAIM OF THIRD PERSON—EVIDENCE—"TRUSTEE."

In such action the fact that the judgment debtor purchased the automobile under the designation of "trustee" was of no weight, for the reason that, even though his creditor had been given notice thereof, there was nothing in the form which the transaction took to indicate that any other person that the judgment debtor was the owner and real purchaser.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by J. R. Burns against W. A. Hammel, Sheriff of Los Angeles County. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Shepard & Alm, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff sued the defendant, who was at the time the sheriff of Los Angeles county, to recover as damages the sum of $1,950, alleged to have been the value of a certain automobile taken and sold by the sheriff under a writ of execution in a suit of one Garstang v. Guy Posson. The findings and judgment were in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff, the latter being a third party claimant. The appeal is from the judgment, and is presented under the alternative method.

[1] From the findings of fact it appears that on the 1st day of October, 1912, Guy Posson became a debtor of Garstang, and in December of the same year suit was brought by Garstang and judgment recovered therein for the sum of $450, with costs against Posson; that execution was thereafter issued and a sale made of the automobile for the benefit of the judgment creditor, by which act the plaintiff here asserts a conversion was worked of his property. There is really but one question in the case for this court to determine, and that is as to whether under the evidence submitted the court was justified in the making of the finding that Posson was the owner of the automobile, and that the plaintiff, Burns, acquired no title as against the judgment creditor. On the part of the appellant it is contended that the evidence showed without contradiction that Posson never owned the automobile; that he purchased it for his wife with funds belonging to her; and that his use of the machine was not a use coupled with ownership, but in part was for the benefit of his wife and with her permission. It appears without any dispute whatsoever that Posson at all times, with an exception which will be immediately noted, had possession of the automobile and used it in his business, and that he had such possession at the time the execution herein was levied. There was a brief time when he loaned the machine to one Hedge, who was a close friend and to whom he was indebted for money loaned. Posson purchased the automobile under a contract in which he, as the vendee, was described as "Guy Posson, trustee." He gave checks in payment of the price of the machine signed with the same name and designation. He testified that he bought the machine for "another party." When asked who that party was, he said that it was his wife. When asked where he got the funds with which to pay for the automobile, he said:

> "I got it from Mrs. Posson and some funds that were in the bank that were to that name."

He later said that some of that money had been secured from an old friend named Lewis, who sent the money "to Mrs. Posson" from Portland. In explanation of the circumstances as to how this money happened to be sent, he said:

> "I had had a stroke of paralysis, and had been sick more or less for a year and a half, and Mr. Lewis was an old friend of the family who had been here. I had befriended him and loaned him a good many thousands of dollars many times. He was down here and saw our condition, and he advanced this money and Mr. Moore and Mrs. Posson, and it was put in the bank subject to her check and subject to my check as trustee, in order to work when I could work, do what I could. So, thinking we would be able to earn some money through the machine, letting her son drive it, we bought the machine, directed me to buy it."

He added in his further testimony that the money sent by Lewis was a loan to Mrs. Posson; that it amounted in all to about $2,500. It appeared by his testimony that he later borrowed $5,000 of Hedge and gave Hedge a bill of sale of the machine as security, signing the bill of sale, "Guy Posson, Trustee." The note, however, which he gave to Hedge was signed simply, "Guy Posson." Posson produced also what purported to be a bill of sale executed by himself as trustee to his wife, and another bill of sale executed by the wife to her daughter, covering the same machine. Prior to the 21st of November, 1913, the plaintiff here, who resided at Colton, in this state, loaned certain collateral to Guy Posson for the latter's use. This loan of securities was made purely as a matter of personal accommodation to Guy Posson, and was made without any security delivered at that time. Burns testified that he had no knowledge that any security was to be given him until some time in November —by other testimony it appeared at about the 21st of that month—when Guy Posson came to Colton and delivered to him an assignment of the bill of sale theretofore delivered to Hedge and covering the automobile in question. This act of Posson, according to undisputed testimony, was a voluntary one and without any further consideration extended by Burns to him. This, in brief, is the substance of the material testimony given at the trial, although there was other evidence as to circumstances surrounding the transactions of Posson with respect to the automobile and his handling of the machine, as well as testimony impeaching the character of Posson for truth and veracity. Posson did not produce at the trial his wife or daughter, and all of the testimony given with respect to the wife's ownership of the machine was that furnished by the husband alone. The fact that Posson purchased the machine under the designation of "trustee" is of no weight at all, for the reason that, even though his creditor had been given notice thereof, there was nothing in the form which the transaction took to indicate that any other person than Posson was the owner and real purchaser. See Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 99.

[2] The court had the right to consider all of the circumstances of the case which on their face bore indications of fraud or concealment practiced by Posson. Posson's testimony as to the securing of money from Lewis did not negative a rather clear inference that Lewis, assuming that he loaned money to the Possons, loaned it to them for their community use. The direct suggestion is that the money was called a loan to Mrs. Posson because Posson was threatened with paralysis and preferred to have the money placed so that the control of it might be assumed by his wife in the event of his demise. He at all times assumed complete control of the automobile, not parting with the possession of it, except, as has been noted, for the brief time when the machine was used by Hedge. We think that the evidence was amply sufficient to sustain the finding made by the trial judge that the property was in fact that of Guy Posson, or that it was community property, which would be the same thing for the purposes of this case. As it appears no change of the possession of the machine was had, but that Posson continued to manage and use it as he had at all times theretofore, such transfer as to his creditor Garstang would not be good. Civ. Code, § 3440.

The judgment appears to be sustained by the evidence, and it is therefore affirmed.

KRUSE et al. v. PILLSBURY et al., State Industrial Acc. Commission.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑369—INJURIES TO SERVANT—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—INJURY OUTSIDE STATE.

The Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) does not authorize an award for injuries received outside the state.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑369—INJURIES TO SERVANT—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—INJURIES ON VESSEL—FOREIGN PORT.

A vessel, owned and chartered within the state, but lying in the port of another state at the time a sailor thereon was killed, is subject to the laws of the other state, though while on the high seas she may be considered a part of the territory of the state by which she was owned, and therefore the State Industrial Accident Commission cannot make an award for the sailor's death under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

In Bank. Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Mary Sandberg, to recover compensation for the death of her husband, opposed by Emil T. Kruse and others, employers. An award of compensation was made by A. J. Pillsbury and others, the Industrial Accident Commission, and the employers apply for writ of certiorari. Award annulled.

McCutchen, Olney & Willard and Ira A. Campbell, all of San Francisco, for petitioners. F. R. Wall, of San Francisco, for applicant. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. A writ of certiorari was issued for a review by this court of the proceedings by which a majority of the members of the Industrial Accident Commission of this state made an award in favor of Mary Sandberg, the widow of a sailor who lost his life while in the service of the petitioners on board the steamer Doris in the state of Washington.

[1] The main question examined by the Commission was this: Does the statute authorize the making of an award for injuries received outside of the state? This has been answered in the negative by this court (North Alaska Salmon Company [a corporation] v. A. J. Pillsbury, Will J. French and Harris Weinstock, as Members of and Constituting the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California, 162 Pac. 93, S. F. No. 7432 [opinion filed December 14, 1916]), and that case is decisive upon all questions save one raised by the petitioners herein.

[2] It is argued that the question of extraterritoriality is not involved at all, respondents' counsel taking the position that the schooner Doris, on which the accident occurred, was a part of the territory of the state of California and subject to the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission of this state.

The deceased, Louis Sandberg, at the time of the accident was second officer of the Doris. It was stipulated at the hearing before the Industrial Accident Commission that said accident occurred at Hoquiam, in the state of Washington; that at the time of the accident the deceased employé was performing service growing out of, incidental to, and in the course of, his employment; that the accident was not caused by the willful misconduct or intoxication of the deceased employé.

It thus appears that when the accident occurred the vessel and the officer who was killed were not only within the boundaries of the state of Washington, but were in a port subject to the shipping and other laws of that commonwealth. This fact is to be kept in mind in an analysis of the authorities cited by respondents. In support of the theory that the fiction of admiralty makes the steamer on which the accident occurred a part of the state of California several authorities are cited. The first of these (Crapo v. Kelly, 16 Wall. 610, 21 L. Ed. 430) involved the ownership of a vessel registered in Massachusetts. During a voyage to New York, while the vessel was on the high seas, the owner applied for the benefit of the insolvency laws of Massachusetts, and in the course of the proceedings the court made an order the result of which was to transfer all of the insolvent's property to the assignee. On the arrival of the vessel at the port of New York the sheriff of that county levied an attachment for a debt owed by the insolvent to a resident of the state of New York. It was held that the transfer of the title to the vessel by the court of Massachusetts was just as effective as if it had taken place while she was physically within the state of Massachusetts. The basis of the decision is that while at sea the vessel was constructively a part of the state of Massachusetts. In McDonald v. Mallory, 77 N. Y. 550, 33 Am. Rep. 664, in an opinion written by Judge Rapallo, the authority of Crapo v. Kelly, supra, was followed, and it was decided that the courts of New York had jurisdiction to try a case involving demanded damages for the death of a citizen of New York on a ship owned and registered in that state, the death having occurred while the said vessel was on the high seas. But the fact that both of these cases involve matters occurring on the high seas differentiates them from those cases in which the vessels were in foreign ports at the times when the jurisdiction of the courts of their home states was sought to be applied. In the case of Crapo v. Kelly it was conceded that if the vessel at the time of the execution of the court's assignment had been in the port of New York and had subsequently been seized there under attachment proceedings by a creditor in New York, the attachment would have held her as against the prior assignment. In McDonald v. Mallory, supra, the general rule on the subject was thus stated:

> "The liability of a person for his acts depends, in general, upon the laws of the place where the acts were committed, and although a civil right of action acquired, or liability incurred, in one state or country for a personal injury may be enforced in another to which the parties may remove or where they be found, yet the right or liability must exist under the laws of the place where the act was done. Actions for injuries to the person committed abroad are sustained without proof in the first instance of the lex loci, upon the presumption that the right to compensation for such injuries is recognized by the laws of all countries. But this presumption cannot apply where the wrong complained of is not one of those thus universally recognized as a ground of action, but is one for which redress is given only by statute."

Beyer v. Hamburg-American S. S. Co. (C. C.) 171 Fed. 582, also cited by respondents, was a case in which a German sailor sought to obtain damages in an American court. As the accident occurred upon the high seas upon a German vessel carrying the German flag, it was held that the law of Germany governed the case.

But respondents are of the opinion that the modern rule is not dependent upon the location of the ship at the time of the accident, and in this behalf they cite several authorities which we shall examine. The first of these is Thompson Towing & Wrecking Association v. McGregor, 207 Fed. 209, 124 C. C. A. 479. In that case the accident which was the basis of plaintiff's claim occurred by reason of an explosion upon an American vessel then on Mud Lake, an arm of Lake Huron. It was not certain on which side of the boundary line between the United States and Canada the vessel was floating at the time of the accident. The trial court found, however, that she was on Canadian waters. The circuit court, commenting on this finding, said that it was to be remembered that the vessel had been taken from the American side for a temporary purpose only, i. e., for assisting in floating a stranded ship, and that, without touching at any Canadian port, she was brought back to the nearest American harbor directly after the accident. This, we take it, is important as showing that probably no local statute was involved or could be held applicable to the accident on the steamer from Michigan. Mrs. Workman, the claimant, was a citizen of Michigan; the Stewart on which her husband's death occurred, was owned in Michigan, and the deceased was a citizen of that state up to the time of his death. Any right Mrs. Workman might have possessed under the statutes of Ontario was barred by the lapse of time, but concededly the suit was instituted within the time limited by the statute of Michigan. The court, in discussing this phase of the case, said, in part:

> "Can the right of action in terms preserved to the widow by that statute be enforced? If so, it is because at the time of the death the Stewart was, through ownership and registration, domiciled in Michigan and was, as respects the enforcement of such a right, part of the territory of Michigan. So far as this question is concerned, the ultimate basis of the decree was 'that the explosion of this boiler was a matter which did not directly involve the "peace, dignity, or tranquility" of the Canadian government but rather involved the "internal discipline and management" of the ship.' This was regarded as being in accordance with the ratio decidendi in United States v. Rodgers, 150 U. S. 249, 266, 14 Sup. Ct. 109, 113, 116, 37 L. Ed. 1071, in which it was held that the federal courts have jurisdiction, under section 5346 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3630), to try a person for a crime 'committed on a vessel belonging to a citizen of the United States when such vessel is in the Detroit river, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, and within the territorial limits of the > Dominion of Canada.' Thus the question confronting us is at last narrowed to the inquiry whether, since the act causing the death of Workman occurred on a vessel owned and territorially situated similarly to the vessel involved in the Rodgers Case, jurisdiction extends to the enforcement of a civil liability, like the one urged here. * * * So far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned, if the Canadian waters in question could be regarded the same as the waters of one of the open oceans, recovery in this case might be warranted by decisions like that of The Hamilton, 207 U. S. 398, 405, 28 Sup. Ct. 133, 134, 52 L. Ed. 264; but that case grew out of a collision at sea, without the territorial jurisdiction of any particular nation, and concerned lost members of the crew of the sunken vessel and claims made on account of their deaths against a fund derived from the Hamilton, under the limitation acts of Congress; Mr. Justice Holmes stating: 'The jurisdiction commonly expressed in the formula that a vessel at sea is regarded as part of the territory of the state was held, upon much consideration, to belong to Massachusetts,' etc. It is strongly contended that the Hamilton and the class of cases it represents are inapplicable because the Stewart was, at the time of the accident, lying in waters of another nation. The idea, of course, is that the local law of the place of injury and death must govern. No doubt this is the general rule; still, in determining the place of Workman's death, we must not overlook the question whether, in the circumstances of this case, the Stewart was constructively part of Michigan, so far as her 'internal management and discipline' were concerned. This cannot be solved by such cases as Smith v. Condry, 1 How. 28, 32, 11 L. Ed. 35, where, in passing upon the rights of two American vessels which had collided at the dock of the port of Liverpool, it was held that certain British statutes enacted for the regulation of pilots conducting ships were controlling."

Further, in the course of the opinion, the court said:

> "Since the right of action here has been preserved in Mrs. Workman by the Michigan statute, there is no perceivable reason why the right cannot, under the facts of this case, be enforced. If that statute were an act of Congress and limited in its operation to the waters of the Great Lakes, navigable rivers, etc., the instant case could not be rationally distinguished from the Rodgers Case. As Congress has chosen to remain silent, the subject-matter of the Michigan statute, both as to lands and navigable waters within its borders, was plainly within the legislative power of the state (Bigelow v. Nickerson, 70 Fed. 113, 117, et seq., 17 C. C. A. 1, 30 L. R. A. 336 [C. C. A. 7th Cir.]; Chicago Transit Co. v. Campbell, 110 Ill. App. 366, 370, 371); and there should be accorded to it the same operation and effect concerning the Stewart and her location as would be to an appropriate similar act of Congress. In speaking of the vessels passing through the Detroit river, Mr. Justice Field said in the Rodgers Case, 150 U. S. 260, 14 Sup. Ct. 113, 37 L. Ed. 1071: 'All of them, however, so far as transactions had on board are concerned, are deemed to be within the country of their owners. Constructively they constitute a part of the territory of the nation to which the owners belong. Whilst they are on the navigable waters of the river they are within the admiralty jurisdiction of that country. This jurisdiction is not changed by the fact that each of the neighboring nations may, in some cases, assert its own authority over persons on such vessels in relation to acts committed by them within its territorial limits. * * * The general rule is that the country to which the vessel belongs will exercise jurisdiction over all matters affecting the vessel or those belonging to her, without interference of the local government, unless they involve its peace, dignity, or tranquility, in which case it may assert its authority. Wildenhus' Case, 120 U. S. 1, 12, 7 Sup. Ct. 385, 30 L. Ed. 565; Halleck on International Law, c. 7, § 26, p. 172.'"

We have quoted thus liberally from the above-cited case because it seems to be the authority upon which respondents rely most confidently as supporting their position.

Another case which seems to lend some weight to the argument of respondents is De Valle Da Costa v. Southern Pacific Company (C. C.) 160 Fed. 216. That was an action by the administrator of a late resident of Massachusetts for damages on account of the death of his decedent by reason of the negligence of the defendant. There were three counts, one stating that the accident occurred in the harbor of Galveston within three miles of the shore of Texas, and that plaintiff had a cause of action by virtue of the law of Texas; the second alleged that defendant operated a line of steamers between New York and Galveston, and that by reason of the accident a cause of action arose under the New York Code; and the third, setting forth defendant's status as a corporation under the laws of Kentucky, pleaded a cause of action accruing to plaintiff by virtue of a statute of the last-named state. Judge Lowell decided on the authority of The Hamilton that a cause of action arose under the Kentucky statute. It developed in later stages of the case that death actually took place on the high seas ([C. C.] 167 Fed. 654; 176 Fed. 843, 100 C. C. A. 313; 190 Fed. 689, 111 C. C. A. 417), but the ruling that the Kentucky statute was applicable was made upon pleadings which located the accident at a place within the state of Texas.

In support of the doctrine that the fact of the vessel's presence in the port of a foreign sovereignty at the time of the accident does not deprive of jurisdiction the government of the state in which the vessel is owned and chartered, respondents quote an expression of Mr. Justice Holmes, made in the course of the opinion in the matter of The Hamilton, 207 U. S. 404, 28 Sup. Ct. 133, 52 L. Ed. 264, where, in discussing the principles announced in the opinion in American Steamboat Co. v. Chace, 16 Wall. 522, 21 L. Ed. 369, that learned justice said:

> "So far as the objection to the state law is founded on the admiralty clause in the Constitution, it would seem not to matter whether the accident happened near shore or in mid-ocean, notwithstanding some expressions of doubt."

In our opinion none of the cases above considered nor any other authority cited by respondents supports the conclusion that the dependent wife of a person who was killed within a port of another state upon a vessel owned in California, and under the circumstances attending the death of Sandberg, is entitled to relief under the Workmen's Compensation Law of this state. Thompson Towing Association v. McGregor, supra, in its last analysis held merely that, in the absence of congressional legislation on the subject, an accident occurring upon a ship sailing on the open waters of the Great Lakes was to be treated as one happening upon the high seas, even if the boat was then north of the boundary line between the United States and the British possessions. The dictum of Judge Lowell in Da Costa v. Southern Pacific Company, supra, involved a situation in which local laws would, in all probability, have no operative effect, and the quotation from the opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes is not applicable to the facts in the matter before us, because he was analyzing a state of facts involving an accident on the high seas.

On the other hand there are many authorities in support of the rule that when a merchant vessel of one country enters the port of another for the purposes of commerce, it subjects itself to the laws of the sovereignty governing such port, unless some different rule has been established by treaty or otherwise. This, in substance, was the ruling in Wildenhus' Case, supra, and in Crapo v. Kelly, supra, the court quoted with approval the words of Mr. Wheaton in his work on International Law (8th Ed. § 106) as follows:

> "Both the public and private vessels of every nation on the high seas, and out of the territorial limits of any other state, are subject to the jurisdiction of the state to which they belong."

All nations have equal authority upon the high seas, and therefore a ship upon the waters of the open ocean is subject to the laws of the home port, being for all purposes a part of the substance of the country from which she sails. But in the port of a foreign country the laws of that country are in full force, and must operate to the exclusion of the statutes of the sovereignty governing the ship's home port. Prof. Pomeroy in his work on International Law (section 145) uses the following language:

> "The ports and roadsteads are unquestionably a part of the territory, and subject to the exclusive dominion of the state to which they belong, to the same extent as the land itself. They are governed in all respects by the municipal law."

In The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24, 26 L. Ed. 1001, Mr. Justice Bradley, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> "In administering justice between parties it is essential to know by what law, or code, or system of laws, their mutual rights are to be determined. When they arise in a particular country or state, they are generally to be determined by the laws of that state. Those laws pervade all transactions which take place where they prevail, and give them their color and legal effect."

In 1 Kent's Comm., pp. 29, 30, the learned author asserts that exclusive jurisdiction of a state over those portions of the sea embraced within its harbors, gulfs, bays, and estuaries is unquestionable.

In The Bee (D. C.) 216 Fed. 709, the action was based upon injuries received by a stevedore at a dock in Portland, Or., while assisting in the loading of a vessel owned in California. The suit was transferred to the District Court of the United States because of diversity of citizenship, but the learned judge of that court applied the law of Oregon, saying, in part:

> "Where the act of a ship occasions an actionable personal injury, not maritime, the law, I take it, is that the rights of the parties are to be determined by the law of the place where the injury occurred, and not that of the home port of the vessel. N. P. R. R. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 190, 14 Sup. Ct. 978, 38 L. Ed. 958; Stewart v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 168 U. S. 445, 18 Sup. Ct. 105, 42 L. Ed. 537."

In Faras v. Lower California Development Co., 27 Cal. App. 688, 151 Pac. 35, the court was considering an appeal in an action for damages for personal injuries. Plaintiff was a citizen of Mexico, employed as a sailor upon a British ship. He was injured while the vessel was tied to a wharf in the harbor of San Diego. The court refused to apply the law of Great Britain as it defines the responsibility of the master to his servant. This refusal was sustained by the District Court of Appeal, and a petition to have the case transferred to this court was denied.

The text-writers state the rule that the laws of the parent state apply to a ship on the high seas, but they do not extend the rule to vessels lying in the ports of alien nations. See, in addition to the works previously cited, Wharton on Conflict of Laws, § 356, Wildman on International Law, p. 40, and Minor on Conflict of Laws, page 272; and to the same effect see Beyer v. Hamburg, etc., Co. (C. C.) 171 Fed. 583. Indeed we are cited to no authority holding that the laws of the home port control in a case of this sort in which the accident took place in the port of a foreign state or nation.

The award is annulled.

DOWLING v. SPRING VALLEY WATER CO. et al. (S. F. 7156.)

1. PLEADING ⚷68 — COMPLAINT — INFORMATION AND BELIEF.

In action by purchaser of land at execution sale to set aside in part a decree quieting title to land under the McEnerney Act (St. 1906, p. 78), a complaint alleging only on information and belief that the execution debtor, in whose name the land stood when defendants' suit was commenced, was ignorant of such suit, and not disclosing the sources of information, was demurrable.

2. PLEADING ⚷68—SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT—ALLEGATIONS ON INFORMATION AND BELIEF.

The fraud that would avail to set aside the solemn judgment in rem of a court of record must be clearly pleaded and proved, and it is not sufficient to allege fraud or its elements upon its information and belief, unless the facts upon which the belief is founded are stated in the pleading.

3. PLEADING 🔑68—COMPLAINT—INFORMATION AND BELIEF.

In action to set aside in part a decree quieting title under the McEnerney Act, because of plaintiff's lack of notice of the pendency of the suit, a complaint was demurrable which alleged that the testimony of defendants' representatives in the former suit relative to the owners of the property were false, and which alleged upon information and belief that such representatives knew their falsity, but did not allege facts which showed positively or by reasonable inference that such knowledge was possessed by the representatives.

4. RECORDS 🔑18(1)—LOST RECORDS—MCENERNEY ACT.

Since a suit under the McEnerney Act lies whenever the records of the county have been lost or destroyed "in whole or in any material part," the owner of land is not deprived of the benefit of the statute by the fact that the fire may have spared some parts of the record.

5. JUDGMENT 🔑460(3)—SETTING ASIDE—MCENERNEY ACT.

A complaint in action to set aside in part a decree quieting title under the McEnerney Act, because of ignorance of plaintiff or his predecessor of pendency of such suit, was demurrable for failure to allege any reason why plaintiff or his predecessor was ignorant of the record evidence of the proceeding, such as the lis pendens, affidavit, summons, etc., since one seeking equity to set aside a solemn judgment on the ground of fraud must show affirmatively why he failed to avail himself of sources of information easily within his reach.

Suit by J. J. Dowling against the Spring Valley Water Company and another. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for appellant. McCutchen, Olney & Willard and Heller, Powers & Ehrman, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. J. J. Dowling filed a bill in equity by which he sought to have the court set aside in part a decree quieting the title of the Spring Valley Water Company to certain land in San Francisco pursuant to a proceeding under the statute commonly known as the "McEnerney Act." A general demurrer to the second amended complaint was sustained, and judgment was entered for defendants. From said judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Among the allegations made by appellant in the second amended complaint are in substance the following ones: That from December 30, 1910, to July 14, 1911, and up to the time of a certain execution sale, one Alla J. Tyler was the owner in fee of the property in dispute; that by reason of certain street work performed by plaintiff as a contractor, after due authorization, he acquired a lien on said property amounting to $6.08; that on January 21, 1907, plaintiff began a suit against Alla J. Tyler to foreclose said lien, resulting in a judgment in his favor for $33.38 made a lien on the property; that execution issued; that plaintiff became the purchaser of the property at the sheriff's sale; that since October 9, 1911, the date of said sale, plaintiff has owned the land in fee and has been in peaceable possession thereof; that on December 30, 1910, the Spring Valley Water Company commenced its action under the "McEnerney Act" to quiet its title to certain land embracing the lot to which plaintiff here asserts title; that this complaint was verified, and alleged the peaceable possession by the Spring Valley Water Company and the ownership by that company of the land described in its pleading; and that a lis pendens was filed according to law. There were lengthy quotations in the second amended complaint herein from the affidavit accompanying the complaint in the "McEnerney" suit, which we need not reproduce here. It is sufficient to say that apparently this affidavit fulfilled the requirements of the statute. There is also an averment that pursuant to order of court summons was published, but that neither by the affidavit nor in the publication of summons did it appear that Alla J. Tyler claimed any interest in the property. Plaintiff also stated that he had no notice or knowledge of the pendency of the water company's action and upon information and belief he alleged similar lack of knowledge on the part of Alla J. Tyler and also upon information and belief that if she had possessed knowledge or notice thereof she would have appeared and established her ownership of the property. There were allegations that at the trial of the water company's suit an officer of that corporation swore that it was the owner of all of the property title to which was involved in the action and that said testimony was false because there were then of record in the city and county recorder's office instruments showing Alla J. Tyler to be the owner in fee of all the property claimed by plaintiff as her successor in interest. Certain allegations contained in the affidavit, complaint, and the testimony in the water company's suit were upon information and belief specified as false, and known to be untrue by that corporation. The Union Trust Company of San Francisco was made a party because of a lien of a general mortgage to said defendant by the water company. There were also averments that the assessment rolls from 1905 to the date of the action were not destroyed; that those records showed the assessment of this land to Alla J. Tyler for 1905, 1906, 1907, and 1908 and that for 1909, 1910, and 1911 it was assessed to "Alla J. Taylor." There was a further assertion that the Spring Valley Water Company had paid no taxes on this parcel of land from 1905 to 1911, inclusive. The prayer of plaintiff was to have the decree in the action to quiet title set aside or if that could not be done that the Spring Valley Water Company be adjudged a trustee for plaintiff and be compelled to convey to him, freed of the mortgage of the Union Trust Company, the land to which he asserts title.

[1-4] The demurrer was properly sustained. The complaint showed compliance by the Spring Villey Water Company with all of the requirements of the "McEnerney Act" except (as appellant maintains) personal service of summons upon Alla J. Tyler, appellant's predecessor in interest; but it is alleged only upon information and belief that Alla J. Tyler was ignorant of the proceeding. The source of the information is not set forth. It does not appear that the pleader obtained his information from Alla J. Tyler, or, if not from her, from what other source. Obviously she would be the best source of information and her successor, who did not seek knowledge from her, would be under the necessity of explaining in his complaint why he sought other means of enlightenment and what they were. The fraud that would avail to set aside the solemn judgment in rem of a court of record must be clearly pleaded and proven. And it is not sufficient to allege fraud or its elements upon information and belief unless the facts upon which the belief is founded are stated in the pleading. 9 Ency. Plead. & Prac. 694. In the complaint it is alleged that the statements of the representatives of the Spring Valley Water Company relative to the ownership of the property involved in the former proceeding were "wholly untrue and false in fact" but the averment that they were known by such representatives to be false is "upon information and belief." Obviously there must be cases in which the knowledge of the fraud by its perpetrator must be charged on information and belief; but in such cases there must be allegations of facts which show positively or by reasonable inference that such knowledge must have been possessed by the person accused of the fraud.

It seems to be the theory of appellant in this case that, having alleged the preservation of a part of the records of the city and county of San Francisco, and that these preserved volumes or documents seemed to indicate the assessment of the property to Alla J. Tyler, therefore the agents of the Spring Valley Water Company were guilty of fraud in failing to know of the contents of such records. But a suit under the "McEnerney Act" does not imply the destruction of all of the records which by any possibility may have reference to the property to which the plaintiff seeks to quiet title against all persons. Such an action lies whenever the records of the county have been lost or destroyed "in whole or in any material part." Stats. 1906, p. 78. That the fire may have spared some parts of the record does not deprive a landowner of the benefit of the statute. Therefore the mere allegation that the records described were in existence does not justify the allegation "on information and belief" that fraud was committed by the agents of the Spring Valley Water Company when they deposed that they knew of no adverse claimants to the property involved in the former action. The attempted pleading of extrinsic fraud was utterly insufficient.

[5] The existence of parts of the records did not absolve either plaintiff or Alla J. Tyler from the duty of availing themselves of the information available to them regarding the suit to quiet title. The action in rem was conducted with all the prescribed formalities. The lis pendens was filed, the necessary affidavit was prepared, and the summons was published and posted. We must presume that the recorder kept a plat book showing the lands against which such suits were filed. Plaintiff has failed to allege any reason why he or Alla J. Tyler were ignorant of this record evidence of the proceeding in rem. One seeking equity to set aside a solemn judgment on the ground of fraud must show affirmatively why he failed to avail himself of sources of information easily within his reach. Champion v. Woods, 79 Cal. 17, 21 Pac. 534, 12 Am. St. Rep. 126; Truett v. Onderdonk, 120 Cal. 581, 53 Pac. 26; Davis v. Hibernia Savings, etc., Society, 21 Cal. App. 444, 132 Pac. 462.

From the foregoing it follows that the judgment must be and it accordingly is affirmed.

ATWELL v. HASKELL. (S. F. 7806.)

WILLS ⟹584—ESTATES CREATED—CONSTRUCTION.

Where testator by a holographic will provided, "Should my wife survive me, I give to her a life interest in my property," describing it, "together with the use of the buildings and income to be derived from the same, and the control of the same during her natural life, subject to the leases that may be in effect," and, "having been advised that the law gives to my wife one-half of my property if she survives me, I consider she is amply provided for, and I therefore give the remaining one-half to be divided as follows," naming other beneficiaries, the limitation, "subject to the leases that may be in effect," was used as a reservation withholding from the life estate such leasehold interest as the husband himself had in the property which belonged to the community; the testator before his death having conveyed the fee to the wife and retained leasehold interests.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1273; Dec. Dig. ⚷584.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Proceedings in the estate of Edmund Atwell, deceased, by Lois A. Atwell, against Albert Haskell, as executor of deceased. From a decree of final distribution, Lois A. Atwell appeals. Affirmed.

John Yule, Horatio Alling, and Cary Howard, all of Oakland, for appellant. Wm. C. Clark, of Oakland, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Lois A. Atwell, widow of Edmund Atwell, appeals from the decree of final distribution made and entered in the matter of the estate of said Edmund Atwell, deceased.

The estate of Edmund Atwell consisted entirely of community property as declared by his will. That instrument, which was holographic, contained the following provisions pertinent to the appeal now before us:

"Should my wife, Lois A. Atwell, survive me, I give to her a life interest in my property situated at and fronting on San Pablo avenue and known as lots Nos. 8 and 9 and fractional parts of lots Nos. 10, 11, 12 and 13 of the Kimball tract, together with the use of the buildings and income to be derived from the same and the control of the same during her natural life, subject to the leases that may be in effect. * * * Having been advised that the law gives to my wife one-half of the property I may own, if she survives me, I consider she is amply provided for: and having no natural or adopted child, I give, devise and bequeath the remaining one-half, which I am entitled to dispose of, to be divided as follows:" Here follows an enumeration of the other beneficiaries and the proportionate share of each.

Before his death, Atwell had conveyed the fee of the property to his wife and had retained certain leasehold interests in the property, which leasehold interests were admittedly a part of the community property. In its decree of final distribution the court recognized the ownership of the fee in the wife, and, treating Mr. Atwell's leasehold interests as community property, distributed them one half to the widow as of right; the other half to the named beneficiaries under Atwell's will. The widow appeals, contending that by the terms of the first quoted paragraph of the will she was entitled to have distributed to her all of these leasehold interests, herein invoking the familiar principle of construction that, where a testator does not own all that he attempts to devise or bequeath, so much as he does own will go to the beneficiary.

Therefore it is said that, as his attempt to convey a life estate failed for the indicated reason, it should be held that he did convey by this language whatever was in his power to convey, namely, the leasehold interests. But the terms of this particular devise do not warrant this construction. By those terms even the life estate which was conveyed was, and was to be, subject "to the leases that may be in effect." This quoted language, if held merely to indicate that the widow was to take the life interest subject to the rights of the lessees, would be meaningless, since necessarily she would have to take the property under those burdens. It seems to be quite apparent that the language was used as a reservation and as a withholding from the life estate devised of such leasehold interests as the husband himself had in the property, under the testator's view that those leasehold interests should continue to be a part of the community property. This was the view adopted by the trial court, under which view the decree of distribution here complained of was given.

For the indicated reasons, it was correctly given, and the judgment is affirmed.

In re McCOMBS' ESTATE. (L. A. 4857.)

1. Adoption ⚷17—Evidence—Sufficiency.

In a proceeding by an alleged adopted child and pretermitted heir to contest the distribution of an estate, evidence held insufficient to show that the contestant had been formally adopted pursuant to the statute of New York, c. 438, passed May 31, 1884, which gave orphan asylums and other charitable institutions authority to place children in their care with suitable persons by a written instrument of adoption executed under seal and signed on the corporate name of the corporation and by the person or persons with whom the child is so placed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adoption, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. ⚷17.]

2. Adoption ⚷17—Evidence—Sufficiency.

To establish a child's right to inherit from a person claimed as an adopting parent, there must be proof of the act of adoption done in strict accordance with the statute, as the power to adopt was unknown to the common law.

3. Adoption ⚷17 — Evidence — Burden of Proof.

A contestant of distribution of an estate, who, seeking to establish her own status as an adopted daughter, as against legatees and devisees under a will, has the burden of proof upon her to establish her standing as such.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Proceeding by Helen McCombs Fairchild and another to contest the distribution of the estate of Helen McCombs, deceased. From a decree distributing the estate in accordance with the provisions of the will, the contestants appeal. Affirmed.

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

James B. Irsfeld and Harlan G. Palmer, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Frank Dominguez, W. H. Dehm, and Earl Rogers, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Appellant Helen McCombs Fairchild opposed distribution of the estate of Helen McCombs, deceased, upon the theory that said appellant was the adopted daughter of Helen McCombs and a pretermitted heir. The court found that contestant was not the legally adopted daughter of Helen McCombs, and that the omission to provide for Mrs. Fairchild in decedent's will was intentional. She and her assignee, J. B. Irsfeld, have appealed from the decree distributing the estate in accordance with the provisions of the will of Helen McCombs.

The contestant introduced evidence tending to show that while she was an infant she was an inmate of and entered upon the books of the Jefferson County Orphan Asylum of Watertown, N. Y., as a child placed there by "charity"; that George W. McCombs and his wife, Helen McCombs, of Argenta, Ark., took her from that institution "on trial" on August 8, 1887; and that she went with them to their home and lived with them as their daughter until and for some time after her first marriage. It was shown that Mrs. Helen McCombs had issued cards of invitation to the marriage of "her daughter Helen" to Dell Ingram. There was also testimony to the effect that both Mr. and Mrs. McCombs had on different occasions exhibited documents or a document declared by them to be "Helen's adoption papers," but no person undertook to declare what were the contents of such papers. Contestant herself testified that after the death of George McCombs while she and her husband were living with his widow, Helen McCombs, the latter showed her some papers which were described by Mrs. McCombs as adoption papers. "She showed us the papers," declared witness, "and told me she was going to tear them up so I couldn't get anything when she died; she tore them up in our face." There was an entry in the records of the orphan asylum immediately following the words "Taken on trial by George W. McCombs August 8th, 1887," etc., as follows: "Adopted January, 1888." No court record of formal adoption or contract of adoption was proven to exist. The only proved writing by George W. McCombs was that by which he applied to the trustees of the asylum for the custody of the child "with the intention of adoption." It was also shown that the license issued while contestant was a minor, authorizing her marriage to Ingram, bore the notation "The mother consents." During all the years before her marriage contestant was called "daughter" by Mrs. McCombs, and she called the latter "mother" or "mamma." These are the principal facts established by the contestant.

Appellant is of the opinion that by the evidence offered she has established her status as an adopted child, but the question arises whether or not greater proof than she brought forward was necessary to fix the fact of adoption for the purposes of her contest. Under the law of 1884 in force in the state of New York at the time the child was taken from Watertown to Arkansas, any institution of the same kind as that from which she was procured by the McCombs was empowered to assume guardianship of the person of an indigent minor child. This could be accomplished by an instrument signed by the parents or the survivor of them, or in the case of an abandoned child by the mayor of the city or the county judge.

"Chapter 438. An act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the state relating to the custody and care of indigent and pauper children by orphan asylums and other charitable institutions. Passed May 31, 1884." By this act the institution was given authority to bind out the child by indenture or to place such child out on trial. The law authorized the charitable corporation to place the child by adoption with a suitable person or persons, "by a written instrument of adoption, which shall be executed under seal and signed in the corporate name of such corporation by such officer or officers as shall be authorized by the directors or trustees thereof to sign such corporate name to such instruments, and which shall also be signed by the person or persons with whom such child shall be so placed by adoption, and if either of the persons so taking such child by adoption shall then have a husband or wife from whom such person is not lawfully separated, such instrument of adoption shall also be signed by such husband or wife." There was a further provision that after such adoption the foster parent and the child should sustain toward each other the legal relation of parent and child with all the usual reciprocal rights and duties except the right of inheritance.

[1, 2] It is very clear that no formal adoption under the New York law was proven. Surely the entry in the register of the orphan asylum that the child had been "adopted" was not sufficient to constitute such proof. Nor were the proofs of mere declarations that certain papers were "adoption papers" enough to establish the existence of the solemnly executed contract contemplated by the statute. Nor was there any proof that the child was placed in the Jefferson County Orphan Asylum under such circumstances as gave the officers of that institution power to enter into a contract for her adoption. To establish the child's right to inherit from the person claimed as an adopting parent, there must be proof of an act of adoption done in strict accordance with the statute. Ex parte Clark, 87 Cal. 638-641, 25 Pac. 967. The power to adopt children is a creation of statute and was unknown to the common law. The mode is the measure of the power. Ex parte Chambers, 80 Cal. 216, 22 Pac. 138. Therefore proof of strict formal compliance with the requirements of the statute is necessary. Matter of Cozza, 163 Cal. 514, 126 Pac. 161, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 214.

[3] Appellant conceding the force of these and many other authorities to the same effect insists that there is a distinction between cases where the natural parents are seeking to set aside the supposed adoption and those in which adoptive parents or those standing in their place are making an attack upon such proceedings, and in that behalf Estate of McKeag, 141 Cal. 403, 74 Pac. 1039, 99 Am. St. Rep. 80, is cited. In that case the attack was made by an heir at law upon the status of the administrator of the estate of a deceased person appointed after nomination of his wife who was an adopted daughter of the intestate. The petitioner sought to show that certain alleged informalities in the adoption proceedings rendered them null and of no effect, and this department held that as against such collateral attack the adoption was sufficient. It was also held that the appellant was as effectually estopped as the decedent would have been in her lifetime from questioning the validity of the adoption proceedings. But the case at bar is quite different. Here is a contestant seeking to establish as against the legatees and devisees under a will her own status as an adopted daughter. The burden of proof is upon her to convince the court of her standing as an adopted child. Proof that she had lived with the McCombs and had been treated as a child was not sufficient. In re Romero, 75 Cal. 381, 17 Pac. 434; In re Huyck's Estate, 49 Misc. Rep. 391, 99 N. Y. Supp. 502; Coombs v. Cook, 35 Okl. 326, 129 Pac. 698; Tyler v. Reynolds, 53 Iowa, 147, 4 N. W. 902.

In Smith v. Allen, 161 N. Y. 478, 55 N. E. 1056, the appeal was from a judgment construing a will. By a residuary clause all property remaining after the death or marriage of the testator's widow was to go to those who would have been entitled to succeed in the event of his intestacy. One of the claimants asserted rights as an adopted child, and of her claim Mr. Justice Haight, writing the opinion of the court, used the following language:

> "Mrs. Greene claims to have been the adopted daughter of the testator, and as such to be his sole heir at law and next of kin and entitled to all of the residuary estate. It appears that Mrs. Greene was born in 1851; that she was placed in the Church Charity Foundation in 1856, and was subsequently taken therefrom by Mrs. Allen, the testator's wife. She continued thereafter to live with the testator in his family until her marriage and was treated in every respect as a daughter. The testator in both his will and codicil describes her as his adopted daughter, but it is not claimed that she was ever adopted by any instrument in writing, or that there is any written evidence of an adoption further than an entry in a book kept by the Church Charity Foundation, as follows: 'Sarah Frances was adopted by Captain and Mrs. Allen.' This, we think, is not sufficient to constitute an adoption under the statute of 1873, chapter 830, as amended by the Laws of 1887, chapter 703."

Appellant seeks to distinguish this case from the one at bar on the ground that the law of 1884, unlike that of 1873, gave the officers of eleemosynary institutions the right to place children by adoption. But the decision does not depend upon that distinction. It holds that a mere clerical entry of an adoption proves nothing—that there must be some proof of an instrument in accord with the necessary form of the law, executed with due formality by the proper parties. To be sure this case differs from that in that an attempt was made to show that some sort of a document characterized by the testatrix as "adoption papers" was in existence, but the evidence upon that point was not so strong as the reference in Mr. Allen's will to Mrs. Greene as his adopted daughter. The facts in this case were not so much in favor of the contestant as those appearing in the one just cited. Under that authority and the others which we have discussed and referred to we are constrained to affirm the decree of the probate court as it relates to the conclusion that Mrs. Fairchild was not the adopted child of Helen McCombs. And this makes it unnecessary to discuss the other part of the court's finding that testatrix had Mrs. Fairchild in mind when she omitted to provide for appellant, and that such omission was intentional.

PORTOLA REALTY CO. v. CARLSTON et al.

(Civ. 1927.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1071(4)—TRIVIAL ERROR—FINDINGS.

Trivial and insubstantial variances between statements of the court in making findings and more detailed recital of the facts are insufficient to justify a reversal of the case.

2. MORTGAGES 🔑356—SALE—NOTICE.

Where a trust deed authorized the trustees to sell the premises as a whole or in parcels, an original notice of sale published once a week for three weeks as required by the trust deed was sufficient to give the trustees jurisdiction to make a sale in parcels under a subsequent order of the court which was only published for five days.

3. PAYMENT 🔑25—SUFFICIENCY—ENTRY OF CREDIT.

Payment by the purchaser at a sale under a trust deed by transferring the amount of the purchase price to the trustees by a loan and credit upon the books of a bank which was at the time a creditor of the mortgagor and beneficiary of the trust deed satisfied the requirement of the trust deed that all bids and payments should be made in United States gold coin.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Suit by the Portola Realty Company against J. F. Carlston and another, as trustees, etc., and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Asher, Meyerstein & McNutt, of San Francisco, for appellant. Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action in equity brought by the plaintiff seeking relief from a sale of real estate under a trust deed, of which the defendants Carlston and Harris were the trustees, and at which sale the defendant Winship was the purchaser of the property covered by said trust deed.

The facts of the case are undisputed, and are these: On July 6, 1912, the plaintiff and appellant herein executed a trust deed covering the real estate in question to secure its indebtedness evidenced by its promissory notes in the sum of $58,077.32 to E. Winship, the defendants Carlston and Harris being named as trustees in said deed. This deed of trust was in the usual form, and provided that in the event of the grantor's default and upon demand of the beneficiaries the trustees were required to sell the property at public auction as a whole, or, in their discretion, in such parcels or subdivisions as they in their judgment should deem reasonable, after publishing notice of time and place of sale once a week for three weeks, and also provided as one of the terms of such sale that all bids and payments should be made in United States gold coin. Shortly after the execution of the promissory notes and deed of trust Mr. Winship transferred the same to the Central National Bank of Oakland as collateral security for a certain indebtedness of the United Iron Works, of which he was president. At the time of such transfer and up to and after the sale under the trust deed the said Carlston, one of said trustees, was president of said bank, and Harris, the other of said trustees, was a stockholder therein. The promissory notes of the plaintiff fell due on or about June 6, 1913, and were unpaid. Five days thereafter the said Central National Bank served a written demand upon the trustees, reciting that default had been made in the payment of these notes, and demanding that the property be sold under the provisions of the trust deed. In response to this demand the trustees gave notice of their proposed sale of the premises in question to be held on July 8, 1913, the said notice being published once a week for three weeks prior to the fixed day of sale. In said notice it was provided and published that the premises would be sold in one parcel. On July 7, 1913, one day before the sale, the plaintiff herein commenced an action in the superior court of the county of Alameda, seeking to restrain such sale, and in such action obtained a temporary restraining order, requiring the trustees to show cause on July 11, 1913, why they should not be enjoined from selling the premises during the pendency of the action. On July 11, 1913, upon plaintiff's motion in said action, the court made a further order directing the trustees to postpone the sale to July 21, 1913, and on July 21, 1913, to offer the property for sale in three parcels as specified in the order, and further directed that the trustees should publish for a period of not less than five days prior to said July 21, 1913, notice that the property would be offered in parcels as provided in said order. Upon the institution of said action on July 7, 1913, the trustees postponed the sale, by a proper notice thereof as provided in the trust deed, until July 15, 1913, and again on that day to July 21, 1913, and said trustees also, and five days prior to the last-named date of sale published notice of the offer of said property for sale in parcels for the time and in the manner prescribed in the court's order. On July 21, 1913, the trustees offered the property for sale in parcels, and, there being no bidders, offered it as a whole, whereupon it was sold to Mr. Winship, the only bidder therefor, for the sum of $60,000. The purchaser, Winship, according to the findings of the court herein, did not physically deliver to the trustees in United States gold coin the sum of $60,000, the amount of his bid, or any portion thereof, but immediately after the sale to him borrowed from the said Central National Bank, the then holder of the promissory notes and the beneficiary under the trust deed, the said sum of $60,000, which sum was in said bank credited to said trustees on account of such sale, and a deed to the property was then executed by them to the purchaser. Thereupon the plaintiff brought the present action to set aside said sale.

The court, upon proof or stipulation as to the truth of the foregoing facts, made its findings and rendered its judgment in favor of the defendants, from which judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The first assault which the appellant makes upon the judgment is directed against the findings of the court, which, according to its view, are in irreconcilable conflict, and hence insufficient to support the judgment. An examination of the findings of the trial court will show that they purport to give in detail the history of the acts and conduct of the trustees in the course of the execution of their trust; and while it may be true that some of the general statements of the court in making said findings may vary slightly from the language and effect of its more detailed recital of the facts, these variances are on the whole trivial and insubstantial and wholly insufficient to justify a reversal of the case.

[2] The contention of the appellant that the sale by the trustees should be set aside for the reason that the notice of the sale of the premises in parcels was not published for the full period of three weeks prior to said sale, but only for the period of five days required by the court's order, we find to be without merit in view of the fact that the trustees were empowered by the express terms of the deed of trust to sell the premises as a whole or in parcels at their discretion; and hence their original notice of sale was sufficient in form and substance to give them jurisdiction to make the sale, which jurisdiction the subsequent order of the court requiring the offer of the property in parcels, might direct but could not destroy.

[3] The further contention of the appellant that the sale was invalid because the payment of the sum bid was not made in gold coin is sufficiently answered by the finding of the court, showing how the transfer of the amount of the purchase price from the purchaser to the trustees was accomplished, viz. by a loan and credit upon the books of the bank, which was at the time the creditor of the plaintiff and the beneficiary of the trust deed. Under such conditions no physical transfer of the actual gold coin from the purchaser to the trustees was necessary to satisfy the requirements of the trust deed.

The final contention of the appellant is that, since the trustees were also interested as officials or stockholders in the bank which had become by transfer from the original creditor the holder of the plaintiff's obligations and the beneficiary of the trust deed, they were held to the exercise of some degree of duty in safeguarding the interests of the plaintiff, to which they did not adhere in the sale of the plaintiff's property, might be meritorious if the record disclosed any such violation of their trust; but in that respect the appellant has not succeeded in bringing to our attention any such breach of duty on the part of these trustees as would have justified the intervention of a court of equity in the case at bar.

Judgment affirmed.

HERNAN v. OUR LADY'S HOME.

(Civ. 1913.)

1. CONTRACTS 🔑271—FOR SUPPORT—ELECTION TO RESCIND.

Where decedent directed his attorney to serve a notice of election to terminate contract with defendant to care for decedent, but before notice was served decedent became ill and stated that he did not wish his money back and was cared for by defendant until his death, such notice did not terminate the contract, and the money paid defendant could not be recovered.

Action by Lillie Hernan against Our Lady's Home, a corporation. Plaintiff appeals from judgment for defendant and from an order denying motion for new trial. Affirmed.

William A. Nunlist, of San Francisco, for appellant. James Gartlan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On the 27th day of June, 1907, the defendant corporation entered into a written agreement with one Patrick Hayes, plaintiff's testator, whereby, in consideration of the sum of $1,900 paid to it by Patrick Hayes the defendant obligated itself to provide him with board, lodging, and medical attendance during the remainder of his life. The agreement also provided that if either of the parties thereto became dissatisfied one with the other it was optional with either to terminate it, and in the event of such termination the money paid was to be returned to Patrick Hayes, less $30 per month for the time he had remained with the defendant. After being in the home for a little more than a month, Hayes became dissatisfied with the life there, and requested his attorney to procure a return to him of his money. The attorney, thinking that his client's dissatisfaction was but temporary, deferred taking any action in the matter, but on September 3, 1907, finding him insistent he prepared a notice stating that Hayes elected to terminate the contract and to have refunded to him the amount thereupon due. This notice was not served upon the defendant until September 20th. In the meantime, on September 5th, after a short absence, Hayes returned to the institution conducted by the defendant very ill; and the defendant in order that better care and medical treatment might be furnished Hayes, had him removed to St. Mary's Hospital, where at defendant's expense he remained until his death on September 22d. At the time of the service of the notice of termination of the contract Patrick Hayes was unconscious, from which condition he did not recover until the following day in the afternoon, at which time he told one of the sisters in attendance upon him that he was not dissatisfied with the home, that he did not want his money back, and that if he should die it was his wish that the money paid by him to the defendant should be retained by it.

[1, 2] Plaintiff's contention to the contrary notwithstanding, we think the court did find that the decedent was not dissatisfied with Our Lady's Home, and we also think such finding is sustained by the evidence. In our opinion, the notice alone did not terminate the contract. The record shows that the decedent on the 3d day of September instructed his attorney to terminate the contract. On the 5th of September Patrick Hayes was taken seriously ill, and remained until his death under the care of the defendant. On September 20th, when perhaps it was discovered that the decedent's illness would probably prove fatal, the notice of termination was served. But, as just stated, the decedent continued all this time a member of the home, and on September 21st repudiated any steps that he theretofore had directed to be taken looking to a dissolution of his arrangement with the defendant. We think the court was correct in arriving at the conclusion it did.

The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

1. Pleading 🔑11—Form of Allegations—Matters of Evidence.

In an action for an amount paid on the price of a lot on which there was a building in course of construction, which defendant agreed to complete in a workmanlike manner, plaintiff, averring that the defendant violated his contract by failing to construct and complete the building in a workmanlike manner, was not required to set forth all of the evidence in his complaint, but only to call attention to his chief objections to the work, so that the complaint, which set forth in detail a number of specific defects, was sufficiently specific, although it did not allege evidentiary facts.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Ben Levi against Joseph Sockolov. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying defendant's motion for new trial, the latter appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

G. Gunzendorfer, of San Francisco, for appellant. Wal J. Tuska, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The action was brought to recover the sum of $1,563 alleged to have been paid by the plaintiff upon the purchase price of a lot upon which there was at the time a building in course of construction, the defendant agreeing to complete the construction of said building in a workmanlike manner, and to deliver the same to the plaintiff free and clear of incumbrances with the exception of an existing mortgage for $15,000, the plaintiff agreeing to take the premises when so completed and to pay the sum of $29,000 as the whole purchase price thereof. The plaintiff avers that the defendant violated this agreement by his failure to construct and complete the building in a workmanlike manner or in accordance with the contract, and he therefore prays to recover the sum paid on account of the purchase price. There is also a second count in the complaint wherein the plaintiff seeks to recover the sum of $407 alleged to have been laid out and expended for the defendant's use and benefit.

The first contention of the appellant is that the court should have sustained his demurrers to both counts of the complaint. As to the first alleged cause of action the appellant appears to concede that it might be sufficient as against the assault of his general demurrer, but urges that his special demurrer to that count should have been sustained. The complaint in that count set out the contract between the parties in hæc verba, and proceeded to allege that the defendant had breached the same by not completing the building in a workmanlike manner. He then proceeded to set forth in detail a number of specific defects in the work of construction.

[1] The defendant's objection seems to be that the plaintiff did not go further in evidentiary matter in support of his general averment that the structure was not completed in a workmanlike manner; but we think that the pleader was not required to set forth all of the evidence in his complaint, but only to call attention to his chief objections to the work, and hence that the complaint herein was sufficiently specific to inform the defendant as to the nature of the plaintiff's demand.

[2] As to the second count in the complaint, the latter appears to have been drawn in conformity with the common count for moneys expended for the use and benefit of another. The details of the alleged expenditures were obtainable by the defendant through a demand for a bill of particulars, but could not be properly required by means of a special demurrer. Counsel for appellant cites no authority in support of his contention, and the court finds no merit in it.

[3] The next contention of the defendant is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings of the court in respect to the proper completion of the building; but in regard to the matters of construction in which the building was sought to be proven defective, we find that the evidence is so clearly and radically conflicting as to render it perfectly plain that the judgment cannot be disturbed upon that ground.

In addition to his objection to the sufficiency of the evidence the appellant's voluminous brief directs our attention to 68 or more specific exceptions taken by him to the rulings of the court in the admission or rejection of evidence. We have patiently examined them all, and do not find that any one of them was either vital or supported by authority. They will therefore be disregarded upon this appeal as not sufficiently important to justify a reversal on the case. The fact is that the whole gravamen of the appeal rests in the appellant's claim that the evidence does not support the findings in the case; and this in view of its radical conflicts we decline to review.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; J. E. Barber, Judge.

Action by the Union Investment Company against the F. M. Landon Company, T. B. McMullen, J. R. Spann, Andrew Jessen, B. W. Owens, W. W. Treat, K. G. Moltzner, and V. W. Stevenson. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Gonsalves & Keller, of Oakland, for appellant. Braynard & Kimball, of Redding, for respondents.

HART, J. This action is on a promissory note, and is the culmination of a transaction whereby the defendants bought from the named payees of said note, McLaughlin Bros., a Percheron stallion, named Gluton, for the sum of $1,200.

The note was executed at Anderson, Shasta county, on the 20th day of August, 1910, and made payable on the 1st day of July, 1912. The complaint alleges the payment of the sum of $225 thereon, and that the balance, $975, with accrued interest, remains unpaid; that the defendants have refused and still refuse to pay said balance. The assignment of the note by the McLaughlin Bros. to the plaintiff before maturity for a valuable consideration is alleged, and judgment for the balance alleged to be due on the obligation with the accumulated interest is prayed for.

The answer admits that defendants executed and delivered to McLaughlin Bros. the note in suit as evidence of part of the purchase price of the stallion referred to in the complaint; but, in support of the defense of failure of consideration, alleges that the McLaughlin Bros. sold the stallion to the defendants under the following guaranty (technically a warranty), executed and delivered by the sellers to the defendants contemporaneously with the execution of the contract of sale and the note in controversy:

"Guarantee—If the above-named stallion does not get 60 per cent. of the producing mares with foal, with proper care and handling, we agree to replace him with another stallion of the same breed and price upon delivery to us at our stables in Kansas City, Mo., St. Paul, Minn., or Columbus, Ohio, of the above-named stallion in as sound condition as he is at present. Mares bred with the impregnator, properly used, the percentage is the same as with the stallion, i. e., the above contract holds the same."

The answer proceeds to allege that the stallion, after trial, did not, as a foal-getter, measure up to the terms of said warranty, viz.:

> "That said stallion, when properly handled, did not get 60 or any per cent. of the producing mares with foal or any producing or other mare with foal."

The answer further alleges that long prior to the commencement of this action, and upon the discovery that the said stallion was not as he was guaranteed to be, as aforesaid, said defendants offered to return said stallion to said McLaughlin Bros., and demanded of said McLaughlin Bros. that they replace him with another stallion of the same breed and price as specified in said written guaranty or return to defendants their said promissory note; "that said McLaughlin Bros. have failed, neglected, and refused and still fail, neglect, and refuse to either replace said stallion as aforesaid or to return to defendants their said promissory note."

The answer declares that the defendants still have in their possession the said stallion, and that the animal is in as sound a condition as he was on the 20th day of August, 1910, "and, at all times herein mentioned since the said discovery have been and now are ready and willing and hereby offer, upon the surrender and cancellation of their said promissory note, to deliver the said stallion to the said McLaughlin Bros. as specified in said written guaranty." The defendants, upon information and belief, further deny that the note in suit was, prior to the 1st day of July, 1912, the date of its maturity, assigned, transferred, and indorsed, for a valuable or any consideration, by the McLaughlin Bros. to the plaintiff.

The court's findings coincide with the allegations of the answer, and, accordingly, judgment passed for the defendants. From said judgment the plaintiff has taken this appeal, supporting the same by a bill of exceptions, upon which it pressed a motion for a new trial, which was denied.

The plaintiff assails certain of the vital findings as not being supported by the evidence. The findings attacked may briefly thus be stated: (1) That there was no consideration for the note in controversy; (2) that the note was indorsed after maturity, and that the plaintiff became and now is the holder of said note as the agent of McLaughlin Bros. for the purpose only of collecting the same; (3) that the McLaughlin Bros. violated the terms of the guaranty—the latter finding, in effect, involving the first above stated, viz.: That there was no consideration for the note, or, in other words, a failure of consideration. It is further contended that the findings of fact are inconsistent with and do not sustain the conclusions of law or the judgment. It is hence argued that the court erred in denying the plaintiff's motion for a judgment in its favor on the findings. Exceptions are also urged to certain rulings whereby the court below excluded certain testimony from the record and permitted other testimony to be received, all against the objections of the plaintiff.

It is not disputed that McLaughlin Bros., upon effecting a sale of the stallion in question and contemporaneously therewith, executed and delivered to the defendants a bill of sale, of which the guaranty hereinabove set forth constituted a part. Nor did the plaintiff offer any testimony the purpose or tendency of which was to contradict or overcome the effect of that of the defendants that the stallion, for breeding purposes, wholly failed to measure up to the terms of the guaranty. Upon this point the testimony is that the first breeding season of the stallion, after the defendants bought the animal, was in the year 1911, the season covering a period from the 15th day of March until and including the 1st day of July of that year; that during said season the horse was bred to 104 mares, and out of that number produced but 7 colts; that the mares to which he was bred were known to be and were producing animals; and that the stallion was in all respects properly handled for breeding purposes. The horse made the season of 1912 and 1913 with no better results, the proportion of foals from the stands of those seasons to the number of mares served being far below the percentage guaranteed by the vendors as specified in their written guaranty. Upon this question, then, as well as upon the question whether the note in suit was indorsed, assigned, and transferred to the plaintiff prior to the date of its maturity, upon which proposition the evidence is in sharp and pronounced conflict, it may safely be put down that the findings of the court are sufficiently supported.

[1-3] But as to the finding that the defendants "have received no consideration for their said promissory note," or as to any implied finding, if any there be, that there was a failure of such consideration, we are of a different mind. By the contract the parties fixed their own remedy in case of a breach, and it is the exclusive remedy. They had the right to do this, and, having bound themselves to the remedy so fixed, their rights must be measured thereby.

The sale of the horse to the defendants obviously constituted the consideration for the note in suit, and, of course, a sufficient consideration so long as the animal remained true to the foal-getting test prescribed by the warranty; and there could be a failure of consideration only in case the stallion failed to come up to the percentage for foal-getting provided by the warranty and the refusal or failure of the vendors to replace the stallion with another of the same breed and value. As seen, the stallion did not produce the percentage of foals guaranteed by the vendors, and, this being true, the obligation rested upon the latter, not to cancel and surrender up the note, but to replace said stallion with one answering the stipulations of the guaranty in that regard.

But, under the contract of guaranty, before the vendors could be compelled to do this, the obligation rested upon the defendants to return the stallion in as sound condition as when delivered to them to the possession of the McLaughlin Bros., or, which amounts to the same thing, to a place designated by them in the contract. This stipulation or covenant of the contract of guaranty constituted a condition precedent, the performance of which by the defendants was requisite to entitle them to the substitution and delivery to them of another stallion for the one which had been sold and delivered to them by the plaintiff, unless said condition had been waived by the vendors.

The rule generally applicable to contracts of the sort under present consideration is well stated by the Kansas Supreme Court, in the case of Hickman v. Richardson, 92 Kan. 716, 722, 142 Pac. 964, 966, as follows:

> "It was competent for the parties to agree how the purchaser should take advantage of any breach of warranty and what the rights of the parties should be in case the horse proved unsatisfactory. It seems to be well settled that such an agreement on the part of the purchaser is binding and that he cannot ignore the part of the contract which obligates him to return the property if it prove unsatisfactory after the stipulated test. Birch v. Kavanaugh Knitting Co., 165 N. Y. 617, 59 N. E. 1119; Nichols-Shepard Co. v. Rhoadman, 112 Mo. App. 299, 87 S. W. 62. Cases will be found where the purchaser is given the privilege of returning the property within a certain time if it prove unsatisfactory, but where he makes no agreement that he will pursue that remedy. In such cases it is held that the privilege to return the property is but a cumulative remedy. Am. Dig. (Dec. Ed.) tit. Sales, § 426, and cases cited. In the present case the warranty was in respect to a matter the absolute truth of which it might not have been possible for the seller to know, and the contract seems to have been made upon the theory that only subsequent developments would determine absolutely whether or not the horse would be satisfactory, so the agreement gave certain rights to both seller and purchaser; and the seller had the right to insist upon the provision requiring the horse to be returned within a specified time and another horse taken in its place. * * * By failing to return the horse in accordance with the provisions of the contract, the defendants are precluded from relying upon the breach of warranty of the breeding qualities of the horse."

Again in Crouch & Son v. Leake, 108 Ark. 322, 157 S. W. 390, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 774, where a contract of warranty precisely similar to the one before us was under consideration, it said:

> "The written contract expressed the terms of the warranty and provided the remedy that should accrue from a breach of it which was exclusive of any other mode of compensation and afforded the only relief to which they were entitled. Not having complied with the said condition on their part, nor shown a waiver thereof on the part of appellants, they will be held to have accepted the stallion as in all respects complying with the warranty and bound to the payment of the balance due on the note for the purchase money." Highsmith v. Hammonds, 99 Ark. 400, 138 S. W. 635, and other cases.

See, also, Brown v. Russell & Co., 105 Ind. 46, 52, 4 N. E. 428, 431; Bomberger, Wright & Co. v. Griener, 18 Iowa, 477, 480; Oltmanns Bros. v. Poland (Tex. Civ. App.) 142 S. W. 653; Holbert v. Sanzenbacher (Tex. Civ. App.) 159 S. W. 1054; Beckett v. Gridley, 67 Minn. 37, 69 N. W. 622; cases cited in footnotes under Crouch & Son v. Leake et al., 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) p. 774 et seq.

We now come to an examination of the evidence. But it may first be well to observe that there is no evidence showing or tending to show that the McLaughlin Bros. waived the condition imposed by the guaranty upon the defendants that they would, if the stallion, Gluton, failed to measure up to the terms of said contract as a foal-getter, return the animal to the said vendors. The McLaughlin Bros., however, did modify the guaranty to the extent of giving the defendants the privilege of delivering the horse to them at Emeryville, Cal., instead of making the delivery at one of the several places in the east mentioned in the agreement. But this modification did not, obviously, involve a waiver by the vendors of the condition or obligation imposed by the warranty upon the defendants.

The defendant Landon, who appears to have been the most active of the several parties to the agreement (the defendants) in an effort to secure from the McLaughlins another stallion in the place of the one sold and delivered to them, testified that, after it was discovered that the stallion, Gluton, was incapable of making the percentage of foals guaranteed by McLaughlin Bros., he, in the month of May, 1912, addressed a letter to the McLaughlins apprising them of the fact that the horse, for breeding purposes, had failed to meet the terms of the guaranty, and asking them to replace the animal with another stallion, as agreed. The witness admitted, however, that neither he nor any of the other defendants ever at any time offered to ship the stallion to the stables of McLaughlin Bros. at Kansas City, Mo., or at St. Paul, Minn., or at Columbus, Ohio; but he stated that McLaughlin Bros., in reply to the letter written to them by the witness in May, 1912, above referred to, ordered the shipment of the horse to Emeryville, Cal., where, so the McLaughlins stated, they had a stallion which they would deliver to the defendants in the place of the stallion Gluton. The defendants did not ship the stallion to Emeryville, nor did they (so Landon testified) notify the McLaughlins that they "held the stallion subject to their order. * * * I told them I wanted a change," continued Landon. "Q. Did you ship the stallion to them at Emeryville? A. I did not. I wrote to them for a description of the horse that they had there, and I never could get a letter from them afterwards. Q. After that you never received any further communications? A. No. Q. Did you afterwards write to them, asking them for a change? A. I did." The witness proceeded to say, as all the defendants that testified at the trial declared their willingness to do, that he "would be willing to give up the stallion if the four promissory notes that were given for the stallion were surrendered and canceled."

So far as anything to the contrary appears in this record, the stallion is still in the possession of the defendants. In fact, as above shown, the answer so declares.

Thus it is plainly manifest that the defendants not only wholly failed to discharge the obligation or condition to which they subscribed and bound themselves, but that they purposely refused to perform the condition. They probably stood upon the theory that the failure of the stallion to measure up as a foal-getter to the guaranteed percentage afforded ground for a rescission of the contract of sale. But, as we have above shown, this is an erroneous theory. The case here, stated in its simplest form, is: The contract constituted a completed sale, to which, however, were annexed conditions involving the reciprocal rights of the parties, to wit: As to the vendees, that the property sold should as to quality measure up to a specified standard, and in case it did not, that they would then be entitled, not to a rescission of the contract of sale, but to have it replaced by the vendors with property of like kind and value which would meet the terms of the warranty. As to the vendors, that, if the property did not meet the test prescribed by the warranty, the same should be returned to them by the vendees in as good condition as when delivered before other property of like kind and value should be delivered to the latter. A failure on the part of the vendees to return the property, as agreed, would constitute the breach of the agreement by them and so absolve the vendors from the obligation of replacing the same with other property of like kind and value. A failure of the vendors to replace the property as stipulated, after the return of the same to them in as good condition as when delivered, would constitute the breach of the agreement by them, and in that case only would the vendees be clothed with the right to a rescission and a return of the consideration moving from them to the vendors. But, to repeat, until such breach on the part of the vendors has occurred after the defendants have pursued the exclusive remedy to which by their agreement they had committed themselves, the vendees would have no right of action at all against the former. So, the vendees, having themselves first violated the agreement, or failed or refused to comply with the condition the performance of which was essential to support their right to be provided by the vendors with other property in the place of that originally sold to them, are obviously in no position to claim a rescission or to invoke the defense of no consideration or of failure of consideration for the purchase price in an action upon a promissory note made and delivered by them in consideration of the purchase price of the property sold. Of course, if, after a reasonable trial and the vendees have pursued the remedy fixed in their agreement, the vendors find themselves unable to furnish the vendees with a stallion whose procreative power is such as to enable him to produce the guaranteed percentage of foals, or substantially such percentage, then the vendees would be entitled to rescind the contract of sale and to the return of money paid thereon or the surrender or cancellation of any promissory note or notes delivered to the vendors by them for the purchase price of the stallion.

Counsel for the defendants have undertaken to point out a distinction between this case and the cases cited by the plaintiff and above referred to; but we can perceive no substantial distinction. It is true that some of the cases mentioned above use language which would indicate that a mere offer to return the property without actually returning it would fulfill the requirements of the rule applicable to cases of this character. It is by no means inconceivable that cases may arise (if some have not arisen) where, under a contract of sale, with warranty as to quality, that a mere offer to return the property sold would be sufficient to entitle the vendee to be provided by the vendors with other property in the place of that sold, the latter not having come up to the terms of the warranty. The proposition depends upon the wording of the contract, and perhaps to some extent upon the nature of the property sold. The agreement here, however, expressly and without qualification or reservation calls for a return of the property to the vendors before the latter become obligated to replace it with other property. Not only is this so, but the performance of the condition is itself one of vital importance to the vendors for a reason additional to those suggested in the cases above cited, viz.: That before replacing the stallion with another, the sellers might be afforded an opportunity to see and examine the horse for the purpose of determining whether his condition is the same as when sold, or whether, from negligent or other handling and treatment by the purchasers, the animal is not in the "sound" or healthy condition he was in when delivered into the possession of the vendees, a consideration which was probably in the minds of both parties when the sale was effected.

[4] Counsel for the plaintiff claim to be entitled to an order by this court directing judgment to be entered upon the findings in favor of the plaintiff. We cannot do this. The claim is based upon the theory that the findings support neither the conclusions of law nor the judgment, and this theory follows from the proposition that the court found that the defendants "have received no consideration for their said promissory note," whereas, in its conclusions of law, the court declares "that there was an entire failure of consideration for which the said promissory note was given," etc., implying, of course, that there had been a consideration for the note. Conceding that the asserted inconsistency really exists, the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment upon the findings as made. The objection, if tenable, could, under the state of the findings, as found and adopted by the court, have no other effect than to vitiate the judgment in favor of the defendants. This may sometimes mean, but it does not always mean, and surely has no such meaning in this case, that where the findings do not support the judgment in favor of one party, they would support a judgment in favor of the other. While an appellate court may set aside findings for want of evidence to support them, it very obviously cannot make findings, and this is what we would be compelled to do if we were to direct judgment for the plaintiff.

Under our view of this appeal as above set forth, there is no necessity for a consideration herein of the assignments involving objections to certain rulings of the court admitting and rejecting certain testimony.

For the reasons herein given, we are constrained to the conclusion that the judgment appealed from cannot stand, and the same is accordingly reversed, and the cause remanded.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. SULLIVAN et al. (Civ. 2185.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑93 — COMPENSATION FOR INJURIES TO PROPERTY NOT TAKEN — FLOOD DANGER.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1248, allowing condemnation damages resulting from the construction of the proposed improvement to the portion of the property not taken, and section 1249, providing that the right to such damages accrues at date of the summons, a landowner may recover for the probable future flooding by a canal of land not actually taken.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑203(2) — EVIDENCE REGARDING DAMAGES—ADMISSIBILITY.

In condemnation proceedings, testimony regarding the impairment in value of land from its probable future flooding by a canal, and which tended to establish the facts upon which such opinions were based, is admissible.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑262(5) — HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE REGARDING DAMAGES.

Although Code Civ. Proc. § 1249, provides the right to condemnation damages accrues at date of summons, admitting testimony regarding flooding of defendant's land after the proceedings were instituted was not prejudicial error, where he testified that such flooding could reasonably have been anticipated at date of summons, and the trial court attached no weight to the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the County of Los Angeles against P. T. Sullivan and the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank. Judgment assessing compensation, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Hill, County Counsel, and Charles E. Haas, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. John H. Foley and George H. P. Shaw, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action brought by the county of Los Angeles to condemn a strip of land through a larger tract owned by defendant Sullivan, over which the county proposed to construct a storm drain or canal in the manner described in the complaint, for the purpose of carrying flood waters which in times of heavy rains accumulated upon the watershed contiguous to defendant's said tract of land. The summons was issued on August 13, 1913, and the action was tried by the court without a jury in February, 1914. Pursuant to stipulation of the parties, the court found that Sullivan was entitled to compensation for the strip of land sought to be condemned in the sum of $2,216; and upon evidence adduced by the respective parties, it found that the damage accruing to the remainder of the tract by reason of its severance from the strip condemned and the construction thereon of the storm drainage canal in the manner proposed by the plaintiff was the sum of $11,900. Judgment followed, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

That the evidence adduced is ample to justify the finding made as to the damage, admits of no question; indeed, no attack is made thereon by appellant, its chief contention being that the court erred in admitting testimony of witnesses who, in part, based their opinion as to the amount of damage sustained upon the alleged fact that the proposed storm drain and canal would constitute a constant menace and danger, in that, during times of heavy rainstorms, when a large volume of water would gather and flow down through the drainage canal, it might flood the land, and that the effect of this threatened flooding, due to the construction of the canal for the purpose intended, was to greatly depreciate its market value.

[1, 2] The point made may be best illustrated by quoting the view expressed by the learned trial judge, who, with reference to the rule that should obtain in the trial of the case, said:

> "You should assess as compensation for damages which, in your opinion, would accrue to the land [not] taken by reason of the severance produced by that particular kind of improvement. Now, if the particular kind of improvement proposed is one that might have a tendency to flood the land some time in the future, that possibility should be taken into consideration. It might be a very remote possibility; if so, it would have very little effect on the damages. Any probable contingency might have a considerable effect on the amount of damages."

To which appellant's counsel replied:

> "If your honor please, isn't it the rule that he must take it at the market value as it stands because of severance?"
> The Court: "Precisely; he must take into consideration the character of the instrumentality that caused the severance"

—the damage being fixed as of the time of the issuance of the summons.

The rule thus adopted was in accordance with the provisions of sections 1248 and 1249, Code of Civil Procedure—the first of which provides that there must be assessed "the damages which will accrue to the portion not sought to be condemned, by reason of its severance from the portion sought to be condemned, and the construction of the improvement in the manner proposed by the plaintiff"; and the second providing that the right to such damages shall be deemed to have accrued at the date of the summons. Pursuant to the rule thus adopted by the court in the trial of the case, witnesses were asked the following question:

> "At that time, to wit, August, 13, 1913, what damage accrued to Mr. Sullivan's property by reason of the severance of the land by virtue of the proposed construction, taking into consideration the possibilities of the construction itself bringing more or less water as the case might be upon Mr. Sullivan's property?"

The question in issue was the amount of damage suffered; that is, the difference in the market value of the land immediately preceding the issuance of the summons on August 13, 1913, and its market value with the canal constructed in the manner proposed for the purpose intended. Necessarily the issue must be determined from the opinions of witnesses qualified to testify upon the subject. As to be expected in such cases, the opinions as to the impairment in value differed greatly, ranging from $750 by one who could not foresee any reasonable probability of damage from flooding, to upwards of $18,000 by those who claimed the improvement must inevitably result in flooding and cutting some 75 acres of land, worth before the improvement upwards of $600 per acre. Conceding appellant's contention that "the opinions of witnesses should not be speculative, but based upon facts and conditions proved or admitted," and that "opinions based upon conjecture and remote possibilities are of little value" (Lewis on Eminent Domain [3d Ed.] § 654), nevertheless the objection goes to the value which should be given the testimony, rather than to its competency. Sullivan, as owner of the land, was entitled to compensation for any and all depreciation in the value thereof which could be attributed to the construction of the proposed improvement for the purpose contemplated; and since the testimony clearly tended to establish the facts upon which such opinions were based, it was for the trial court to determine the value thereof as evidence. It is held in many jurisdictions that when a railroad is laid out through a parcel of land the danger of fire necessarily arising from the operation of the road to the buildings upon the remaining land should be considered as an element of damage, so far as it affects the value of the land. Cape Girardeau, etc., R. Co. v. Blechle, 234 Mo. 471, 137 S. W. 974, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 246; Adden v. White Mountains Railroad, 55 N. H. 413, 20 Am. Rep. 220; Beckman v. Lincoln, etc., R. Co., 85 Neb. 228, 122 N. W. 994, 133 Am. St. Rep. 655.

As to whether such danger would be remote would depend upon the proximity of the buildings to the line of the railway, and hence no rule of general application can be laid down governing such question. Whatever tends directly and substantially to diminish the value of the tract of land left to the owner who has been compelled to part with possession of a portion thereof for public good, should be weighed and considered in awarding him damages. Applying this rule, the court was amply justified in admitting evidence tending to show that the construction of the drainage canal in the manner proposed would subject the lands of defendant to danger from flooding, the effect of which would be to materially impair its market value, for which he was entitled to compensation. 15 Cyc. 691, 692; Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 8 Sup. Ct. 820, 31 L. Ed. 638.

[3] It appears that after the date of the issuance of the summons and before the trial of the case two heavy rainstorms occurred, as a result of which defendant's land was flooded to its great damage. Sullivan, the defendant, testified that at the time of the issuance of the summons not only he, but any one familiar with the storm-water conditions in Southern California and the topography of the land contiguous to that owned by him, from which the storm waters were gathered and conducted into the canal, could at the time, to wit, August 13, 1913, have foreseen what the result to his land would be from the construction of the proposed improvement, and, further, that the result which he then foresaw and expected was just what occurred in the two storms referred to. Thereupon questions were asked whereby it was sought to elicit evidence as to the effect which the flooding from these two storms had upon the land, to which objection was made. The objection was overruled, the court saying:

> "Now, Mr. Sullivan has testified that the effect of that improvement would be to produce the very conditions which were produced. * * * It is now proper to show exactly what did ensue, what did happen, he having testified that those things could have been foreseen. Upon that theory the evidence of the present conditions may be admissible."

Thereupon defendant was permitted to show the condition of the land which was washed and channeled and upon which sand and silt were deposited as a result of the flooding. Under the peculiar circumstances of the case, we cannot say this was prejudicial error. Sullivan's testimony as to damage was limited to the time when the summons was issued. His estimate was based upon what he at that time conceived to be the condition which would probably result from the construction of the proposed improvement. The testimony of the witness that in August he foresaw and expected just what occurred—even to the cutting of channels through and the deposit of silt and sand upon his land in February—may appear improbable, thus rendering his evidence of little weight. Indeed, it is apparent that the trial judge attached no weight to the evidence; hence, if error, no prejudice resulted.

There was no error in the ruling of the court upon the admission of evidence, which is ample to sustain the finding that the construction of the proposed canal for the purpose intended endangered the land from annual storm-water floods, as the result of which its market value was impaired, as found by the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

ARBOGAST v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SACRAMENTO COUNTY et al.

(Civ. 1607.)

1. Justices of the Peace 🔑54(1)—Setting Aside Default—Loss of Jurisdiction.

Where a justice of the peace made an order setting aside a default judgment without payment of costs as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 859, he did not thereby lose jurisdiction, and his subsequent judgment entered in a trial upon the merits was valid.

2. Justices of the Peace 🔑122(5)—Setting Aside Default — Time of Application — Statutes.

The time for filing application to set aside default judgment in justice court under Code Civ. Proc. § 859, begins to run from the service of written notice of judgment entry as required by section 893, as amended in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1441).

3. Justices of the Peace 🔑122(5)—Notice of Judgment Entry—Statute.

Personal service of a justice court summons will not be deemed notice of the time of judgment entry as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 893, amended in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1441); such statute making no distinction between personal and constructive service of summons, and not recognizing constructive notice of time of judgment entry.

4. Justices of the Peace 🔑122(5)—Setting Aside Default—Statute.

Code Civ. Proc. § 473, relating to procedure in the superior court, will not aid in construction of section 859, relating to the filing of application to set aside default judgment in justice court, where the Code sections relating to the two courts are entirely separate.

Application by J. L. Arbogast for a writ of prohibition against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Sacramento and Honorable Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge. Demurrer to application sustained, and alternative writ discharged.

Herbert N. De Wolf and H. N. Mitchell, both of Sacramento, for petitioner. Downey, Pullen & Downey, of Sacramento, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. An action was brought by petitioner in the justice's court of Sacramento township to recover for medical services performed for defendant therein. The complaint and summons in the action were personally served in said township, and, the defendant failing to appear, the default and judgment against her for the amount claimed were regularly entered by the justice. Twenty-six days after the date of the entry of said default judgment the defendant appeared by attorney and moved to set aside the judgment and for leave to file an answer, setting out in her affidavit in support of the motion that she was served with notice of said judgment less than ten days prior thereto. After consideration the justice granted the motion. The record shows that he did not require the defendant to pay plaintiff's costs as a prerequisite to setting aside said judgment, although the amount thereof appeared in his docket, nor does the record show that said costs were paid. The case proceeded to trial on the merits, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff in the sum of $20; the default judgment having been for $35. The plaintiff appealed to the superior court on questions of both law and fact. In the superior court the plaintiff-appellant interposed a motion to quash the judgment appealed from and for judgment of the superior court affirming said default judgment rendered in the justice's court. Said motion was denied, and thereupon said plaintiff petitioned this court for a writ of prohibition to restrain said superior court from proceeding to the trial of said action and to require it "to make and enter judgment in said action quashing the judgment of the justice of the peace therein appealed from and confirming the judgment of default theretofore and upon March 14, 1916, entered in said cause by said justice of the peace, upon the ground that said defendants have no jurisdiction to proceed to the trial of said action or to take any other or further action therein except to enter said judgment."

An alternative writ was issued by this court, and on the return thereof a general demurrer and an answer were filed by respondents. The latter, however, becomes immaterial in view of our consideration of the demurrer. At a glance it must appear that the proceeding is somewhat peculiar, in that the party who appealed to the superior court on questions of law and fact, and thus invited its jurisdiction, is seeking to prevent said court from doing the very thing that he apparently sought. However, we may pass by the form of procedure and certain preliminary questions discussed by counsel, and come immediately to the two cardinal points to which the argument is mainly addressed. If the conclusion as to each of these should be in favor of respondents, it is manifest and admitted that petitioner must fail herein. They may be stated in the language of petitioner as follows:

> "We respectfully submit that the justice of the peace was without jurisdiction to set aside his default judgment without requiring as a condition that the defendant first pay plaintiff's costs in the action accrued to the date of such order.
> "We further contend that, where a defendant in a justice court is personally served with a summons and complaint and fails to appear, and judgment by default is entered against him, the time within which he may move to set aside said default judgment starts to run from the date of the entry of the judgment; in other words, that where a defendant is personally served with summons and complaint, such service amounts to notice of the entry of judgment."

These propositions are ably argued by petitioner with the citation of numerous cases bearing more or less upon the questions herein involved, but in this state they have both been authoritatively decided against him.

[1] As to the first, in Townsend v. Parker, 21 Cal. App. 323, 131 Pac. 766, it is said:

> "The appellant further insists that the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction to set aside said judgment without making said order conditional upon the payment of plaintiff's costs. The question is not jurisdictional, and no case cited by counsel supports his contention. The refusal of the justice to impose costs as a condition of making the order vacating the judgment was an error of law, for the correction of which the writ of certiorari may not be properly invoked."

The Supreme Court impliedly indorsed that view by denying a petition for hearing therein. Petitioner claims that the doctrine of said decision is in conflict with other cases of the appellate and Supreme Courts of this state. We do not agree with petitioner. It has been held several times that such failure to impose costs is a serious error for which the case should be reversed, but our courts have not gone to the extent of deciding that thereby is the justice's court divested of jurisdiction to proceed further with the cause.

In his closing brief petitioner renews his attack upon Townsend v. Parker, stating that it "is a void decision, and for that reason is an authority for no purpose." He also declares:

> "What we have herein said concerning Townsend v. Parker, will also apply to the case of Fast v. Young, 19 Cal. App. 577, 126 Pac. 854, also cited by defendants."

We may remark, however, that it is a little more difficult than the able counsel would seem to appreciate, to negative, nullify, and obliterate a serious and deliberate adjudication of an appellate tribunal. He is of the opinion that in the former case:

> "The court most certainly were not aware of the holding of the Supreme Court in the case of Heermanr v. Sawyer, 48 Cal. 562."

We apprehend, however, that said case did not escape either attention or examination. Petitioner seems to misunderstand the bearing of that decision upon the position herein. Therein the court did say that:

> "It has always been held here that the imposition of costs upon the moving party was indispensable to the validity of the order opening the default."

But what actual disposition was made of the appeal by the Supreme Court? The order setting aside the default was reversed, and the court directed that:

> "On the return of the case the court below can, of course, rehear the application upon the moving papers, and upon such other and further showing as it may permit to be made."

The foregoing is entirely in conflict with petitioner's contention. According to his view, the Supreme Court should simply have reversed the order upon the ground that the lower court had no jurisdiction to make it. And if any direction had been given by the Supreme Court, it ought to have been to the effect that the judgment as originally given should operate and be enforced as the judgment of the court. In other words, petitioner would have us believe that, since the court had no jurisdiction to make the particular order in question, it has no authority subsequently to make an order that is permitted by the statute. The making of an invalid order does not exhaust the jurisdiction of the court in the matter. When the invalid order is set aside, the court has the same power as it had originally to make the order that the statute contemplates. It may be admitted that the justice court had no jurisdiction to set aside the default without imposing the costs, but it did have jurisdiction to relieve the party upon said condition. And the same jurisdiction will exist when the invalid order is reversed. In other words, the error—it may be called jurisdictional—affects the order only, and it does not extend to the prior proceedings nor to a valid order that may hereafter be made. The prerequisite conditions for a valid order still exist, and we may presume that in the further prosecution of the litigation, they will not be ignored.

Nor is the point controlled by Johnson v. Superior Court, 28 Cal. App. 618, 153 Pac. 404. That case involved the construction of section 981 of the Code of Civil Procedure as to the payment of costs on appeal. The section provides that, unless the costs are paid at the time the notice of appeal is filed, the appeal from the judgment shall not be effectual for any purpose. The language of the section is such that no other conclusion consistent with the declared intention of the Legislature could be reached than the one announced by this court.

In the Townsend Case, as stated by respondent, the briefs contained a full discussion of the matter, and the cases cited herein by petitioner were cited therein in the District Court of Appeal and in the Supreme Court, and both courts were apparently satisfied with the decision, and so are we satisfied.

[2] As to the said second proposition, it is governed by the decision of this court in Peterson v. Superior Court, 30 Cal. App. 466, 158 Pac. 547. Therein the cases are reviewed, and the conclusion is reached and unequivocally declared that:

> "The time to file an application under section 859 of the Code of Civil Procedure to be relieved from a judgment entered by default in a justice's court, on the ground that such judgment had been taken by mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect, begins to run from service of written notice of entry of the judgment as required by section 893 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1915."

Here, again, we may say that, in view of the plain and simple language of those two sections, any other conclusion would do violence to the expressed will of the Legislature.

[3] Nor can we perceive any force in the suggestion that, where personal service of the summons is had, the defendant is deemed to have notice of the time of the entry of the judgment, and that actual notice is required only where there has been constructive service of summons. The statute makes no such distinction, and for us to recognize it would be to add something that the Legislature has not provided. The statute is too plain and exacting to be frittered away in that manner. It does not recognize constructive notice. There must be actual knowledge brought home to defendant that the judgment has been entered. It is not sufficient that he be notified that judgment will be entered some time in the future if he fails to appear. It is true that in one or two other jurisdictions such distinction as to actual and constructive service of the summons has been made, but we are satisfied said sections of our statute contemplate no such distinction. It is the party who is in default that may move in the matter within ten days after he has received written notice of the entry of the judgment. We cannot perceive how anything can be added to the force of the provision by suggestion or analysis.

[4] Nor can we be aided by the consideration of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which applies to the superior court. If that part of the Code which expressly deals with proceedings in the justices' courts prescribes the powers of those courts in relation to a general subject, about which the powers of courts of record are expressly prescribed in another part, then the powers of the justices' courts with respect to that subject are to be looked for in the former, and not in the latter provision. Weimmer v. Sutherland, 74 Cal. 341, 15 Pac. 849. Section 859 is in the title dealing with proceedings in justices' courts, and provides for the vacating by justices' courts of judgments entered in said courts, while 473 is in that part of the Code dealing with proceedings in superior courts and provides for vacating judgments with certain conditions. Hubbard v. Superior Court, 9 Cal. App. 166, 98 Pac. 394.

We think petitioner has failed to state sufficient facts to justify the writ, and the demurrer is therefore sustained, and the alternative writ is discharged.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

1. Municipal Corporations 🔑886, 887—Indebtedness—General and Particular Funds.

Though when a municipal corporation by authority of law creates a particular fund with reference to which it contracts, any indebtedness arising upon such contract is payable only therefrom if the so-called fund is created by the city for its own convenience and not by direction of law, the indebtedness is not payable from such specific fund, but is a general liability, payable out of the city's general fund.

2. Garnishment 🔑228—Municipal Corporations—Impounding Money—Effect of Judgment.

In proceedings under Code Civ. Proc. § 710, providing for filing transcript of judgment with the auditor of any city from which money is owing to the judgment creditor's debtor, the effect of a judgment which by its terms was made payable "out of the amount due from said defendant city" to said debtor was to impound the amount of money due from the city and to subrogate the judgment creditor to the rights of the principal defendant, and not to determine the fund from which payment might be made or to prevent payment from the general fund.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Cent. Dig. §§ 433, 434; Dec. Dig. 🔑228.]

3. Municipal Corporations 🔑371—Fiscal Management—General Funds.

Though the Santa Barbara City Charter (St. 1899, p. 468), § 76, provides that "the council shall, before fixing the rate of the annual city tax, established by ordinance separate funds representing the funded obligations of the city, if any, and the several departments requiring municipal expenditure, including the general fund, and the percentage of said levy shall be made for each fund, and the whole amount of taxes and revenue of the city apportioned accordingly," where the city contracted for tunnel construction and there was no showing that a separate fund to pay therefor had been established, the court will presume that the cost was payable from the general funds of the city.

Mandamus by the Ott Hardware Company against Miss A. C. Holmberg (substituted for Alfred Davis), as city clerk and city auditor of the city of Santa Barbara. Judgment for plaintiff, and from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion to vacate it and render a different judgment upon the findings, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Canfield & Starbuck, of Santa Barbara, for appellant. B. F. Thomas, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

SHAW, J. These appeals, one from the judgment and the other from an order of court denying defendant's motion to vacate the judgment entered and render a different judgment upon the findings, were taken by Alfred Davis as the then city clerk and auditor of the city of Santa Barbara, for whom, upon suggestion of his death, A. C. Holmberg, his successor in office, has, by orders made pursuant to rule 16 [119 Pac. xii] of the Supreme Court, been substituted as appellant.

The facts upon which this proceeding for the issuance of a writ of mandate to be directed to the city clerk and auditor of the city of Santa Barbara is based, are set forth in an opinion of the Supreme Court filed in the case of Ott Hardware Co. v. Davis, 165 Cal. 795, 134 Pac. 973, wherein on a former appeal prosecuted by plaintiff the court reversed a judgment entered in favor of defendant. This appeal is from the judgment claimed by respondent to have been entered in accordance with the opinion of the Supreme Court upon the going down of the remittitur, whereas appellant, as grounds for a reversal, insists that, as rendered, it is contrary to the views contained in said opinion, and not supported by the findings.

It appears from the findings that on May 25, 1908, plaintiff recovered judgment against one Warren W. Clark; that on December 7, 1909, said Warren W. Clark recovered judgment against one Robert Beyrle in the sum of $705.26, by the provisions of which said judgment the city of Santa Barbara, made a defendant in said action, was adjudged to pay the amount thereof to said Warren W. Clark, or to Canfield & Starbuck, his attorneys, "out of the amount due from said defendant city of Santa Barbara to said defendant Robert Beyrle for the construction in part of the section numbered 16 of the tunnel now or lately in course of construction for said defendant city of Santa Barbara through the Santa Ynez range of mountains"; that after the entry of said last-mentioned judgment in favor of Clark against Robert Beyrle, to be paid out of the moneys due from the city of Santa Barbara to the defendant in said action, and before any satisfaction thereof or compliance therewith by said city of Santa Barbara, to wit, on December 8, 1909, the plaintiff herein, Ott Hardware Company, served upon and filed with the city clerk and city auditor of Santa Barbara a duly authenticated transcript of said judgment so obtained by plaintiff against said Clark, wherein it was stated that said plaintiff desired to avail itself of the provisions of section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and demanded from said city clerk and city auditor a warrant on the city treasurer for said sum of $705.26, pursuant to the provisions of said section 710, the delivery of which was refused; that after said action on the part of plaintiff and refusal by said city clerk and auditor to deliver the warrant to plaintiff as demanded, Canfield & Starbuck presented to the council of said city the demand in writing of Warren W. Clark for payment of said judgment so obtained against Beyrle and to be paid out of any indebtedness due from said city of Santa Barbara to said Beyrle, which said demand was approved by said city council and delivered to the city clerk and auditor, who thereupon drew his warrant for said sum upon the city treasurer of said city, payable to Canfield & Starbuck, "out of the waterworks extension fund of the city," the amount of which said warrant was duly paid by said city treasurer, upon whom it was drawn, to said Canfield & Starbuck by whom, pursuant to an agreement with Clark, it was applied in liquidation of indebtedness due from Clark to his said attorneys.

The prayer of the complaint was that the auditor be commanded "to draw his warrant, properly signed and made out, in favor of or to pay into the superior court of the county of Santa Barbara, state of California, for the sum and in the sum of $705.26, * * * to be paid on and credited on said judgment in favor of the plaintiff herein and against said Warren W. Clark, * * * in the cause designated in said transcript of judgment filed with defendant on the 8th day of December, 1909, by plaintiff herein." The judgment from which this appeal is prosecuted, following the prayer of the complaint, ordered, adjudged, and decreed that defendant as city clerk and city auditor "draw his warrant as such city clerk and city auditor of said city, properly signed and made out, in favor of the superior court of the state of

While counsel for appellant concede the findings considered with the law of the case as established by the decision of the Supreme Court in Ott Hardware Co. v. Davis, supra, entitle plaintiff to the issuance of a warrant for the amount in controversy, they attack the judgment upon the ground that the effect of filing with the city auditor the transcript of the judgment obtained by plaintiff against Clark was to impound money due from the city to Clark out of a separate or particular fund, to wit, "out of the amount due from said defendant city of Santa Barbara to said defendant Robert Beyrle for the construction in part of the section numbered 16 of the tunnel," instead of which, however, the judgment orders a warrant payable, not from the amount due Beyrle for the construction of said tunnel, but from the general funds of the city. This particular point received little or no consideration in the case of Ott Hardware Co. v. Davis, supra, and we do not regard anything there said as determinative of the question.

[1] It is no doubt quite true that when a municipal corporation by authority of law creates a particular fund with reference to which it contracts, any indebtedness arising upon such contract is payable therefrom only. Section 860, Dillon on Municipal Corp.; Lake v. Trustees of Williamsburgh, 4 Denio (N. Y.) 520. Where, however, the so-called fund is one created by the city for its own convenience and not by direction of law, it is not payable from such specified fund, but is a general liability, payable out of the general funds of the city, chargeable, perhaps, to a specified account. As said in Carter v. Tilghman, 119 Cal. 104, 51 Pac. 34:

> "As a matter of bookkeeping, the board may keep as many accounts or funds as deemed necessary or convenient, but such a system of bookkeeping in no way affects the rights of creditors."

In Higgins v. City of San Diego, 131 Cal. 294, 63 Pac. 470, it is said (quoting from the syllabus):

> "The creditors of a city have the right to contract with reference to its entire revenue, except in so far as the charter expressly otherwise provides in the case of special funds, such as the school or library fund."

[2] Section 76 of the charter of the city of Santa Barbara (Stats. 1899, p. 468), provides that:

> "The council shall, before fixing the rate of the annual city tax, establish by ordinance separate funds representing the funded obligations of the city, if any, and the several departments requiring municipal expenditure, including a general fund, and the percentage of said levy shall be named for each fund, and the whole amount of taxes and revenue of the city apportioned accordingly."

[3] As disclosed by the findings, there is nothing showing, or tending to show, the establishment of a separate fund consisting of indebtedness due from the city to Beyrle for the construction of the tunnel. The effect of the judgment obtained by Clark against Beyrle for the sum of $705.26, which by its terms was made payable "out of the amount due from said defendant city of Santa Barbara to said defendant Robert Beyrle," was to impound the amount of money due from the city to Beyrle to the rights of whom as to such fund Clark was subrogated, and in turn plaintiff subrogated to the rights of Clark. As shown by the findings, the city, prior to the rendition of the Clark judgment, was indebted to Beyrle, which indebtedness we must presume, since there is nothing to the contrary disclosed, was payable, not from any special fund created pursuant to the charter provision, but from the general funds of the city. By the judgment obtained by Clark against Beyrle and the city, the amount adjudged therein to be due from him to Beyrle was ordered to be paid to him by the city out of indebtedness due from it to Beyrle. The effect of such adjudication was not to create a special fund. On the former appeal respondent argued that the issuance of the writ would be unavailing for the reason that, as shown by the findings, the fund out of which petitioner was entitled to be paid was entirely exhausted, in response to which it was there said:

> "This is not a consideration affecting the rights of the parties in the proceeding before us."

There is nothing in the opinion determinative of the question as to whether or not the indebtedness due from the city to Beyrle constituted a separate fund created under authority of law, as distinguished from a mere matter of bookkeeping. The foregoing is not only determinative of the appeal from the judgment, but likewise determines the appeal from the order of court denying appellant's motion to have another and different judgment entered upon the findings.

I concur: CONREY, P. J.

JAMES, J. I concur in the judgment. I do this reluctantly, and only because our Supreme Court in Ott Hardware Co. v. Davis, 165 Cal. 795, 134 Pac. 973, has established the law to govern the case. I am still of the opinion that under the facts shown no liability was created against the city of Santa Barbara. The reasons are expressed in the dissenting opinion of the Supreme Court as filed in the case cited.

VALLEJO & N. R. CO. v. REED ORCHARD CO. et al. (Civ. 1553.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN ⚷243(3) — AWARD — DAMAGES INCLUDED—GROWING CROPS.

Where a tenant of orchard lands, under a lease which provided that it should terminate in the event that any of the property was condemned for public use, was made a defendant in condemnation proceedings, but did not appear therein, nor make any claim for damages on account of the taking of his right to remove the crops then growing on the lands, which right was personal property, and there was no evidence introduced as to the value of the crops, and they probably had no value at the time of the hearing, such value was not included in the award, though such award stands in place of the land and is subject to all claims and interests in the land, especially where there was no showing that the railroad company took possession of the condemned property before the crop was harvested.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN ⚷155 — AWARD — DISTRIBUTION—CONTRACT.

Where a tenant of orchard land, whose lease was to expire on condemnation of any of the land, entered into an agreement with plaintiff in condemnation proceedings and with others whereby he was entitled to retain possession of the land and harvest the crop therefrom, the proceeds to be deposited in a bank to be paid to the person or persons finally determined to be entitled thereto, and a suit was pending in the federal court to determine the rights to such proceeds, the tenant cannot recover the value of that crop as against his landlord from the award for condemnation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Vallejo & Northern Railroad Company against the Reed Orchard Company, S. Komano, and others. From an order of the lower court denying defendant Komano's application to share in the award of damages, that defendant appeals. Affirmed.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for appellant. C. E. McLaughlin, of Sacramento, and Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for respondents Reed Orchard Co. and others. Garret McEnerney and Walter Rothchild, both of San Francisco, for respondent Vallejo & N. R. Co.

BURNETT, J. The question involved respects the claim of appellant to share in the damages awarded for condemnation in the above-entitled action. Komano was a tenant in possession of the Reed orchard property under a five-year lease expiring November 1, 1912. The fee was in the said Reed Orchard Company. The condemnation proceedings were commenced in 1910 and tried in 1912, the preliminary order of condemnation being entered April 18, and the final decree of condemnation April 29, 1912. Komano was named as one of the defendants, and he was personally served, but he did not appear in the action. As to him the court found:

> "That the said defendant S. Komano is in the possession of the property herein condemned and also the larger tract or parcel of which the same is a part, as the tenant of the said defendant Reed Orchard Company, a corporation, but that the tenancy and possession of the said S. Komano is by virtue of a certain indenture of lease, * * * but that under and by virtue of the terms of the said lease it was by and between the said Reed Orchard Company and the said S. Komano understood and agreed that the said lease should be terminated in the event that the said land herein condemned, and the said larger parcel, or any part thereof, should be condemned by any judgment of condemnation, and that the estate, right, title, and interest of the said S. Komano therein is of no value."

The rental under the lease was $7.500 per year, payable $3,750 January 1st and $3,750 July 1st of each year. On January 1, 1912, Komano made the semiannual payment, and there is no dispute that he proceeded as required by the lease to cultivate, prune, spray, and otherwise care for and protect the orchard and fruit crops growing on the premises. An appeal was taken from the decree of condemnation, and pending the appeal, to wit, on July 1, 1912, Komano and the plaintiff and others entered into an agreement whereby the crops of 1912 were harvested and the proceeds applied to the payment of the July rental, to the expenses of harvesting and selling the crops, and to certain other items, and the balance of the money was deposited in bank, to be paid to the persons entitled thereto. This balance amounts to $4,688.03, and represents the net value of the fruit on the trees on the 104.1 acres when the decree of condemnation was entered. After the decree had become final, a demand was made of the county clerk and county treasurer by the said Reed Orchard Company and by its assignee of a portion of the fund, for the payment of the whole of said fund of $104,100 awarded as damages as aforesaid. A similar demand was made by appellant for the payment to him out of said fund of the value of said crop. The court denied appellant's application, and hence this appeal.

Certain legal propositions advanced by appellant may well be conceded for the purposes of the case.

1. Where a tenancy is of uncertain duration and is terminated while the crops are growing through no act or fault of the tenant, he has the right to harvest and remove the crops (8 R. C. L. p. 364; Civ. Code, §§ 819, 820; and the rule applies to fruit growing on trees, Vulicevich v. Skinner, 77 Cal. 239, 19 Pac. 424; Purner v. Piercy, 40 Md. 212, 17 Am. Rep. 591).

2. Komano was the owner of this crop of fruit, which is recognized as fructus industriales and "regarded as personal chattels, independent and distinct from the land capable of a sale without regard to whether growing or matured." Swafford v. Spratt, 93 Mo. App. 634, 67 S. W. 702; Lynch v. Sprague Roller Mills, 51 Wash. 535, 99 Pac. 580.

3. The default of Komano would not affect his right to any compensation to which he was entitled. If the defendants make default, the plaintiff must still have a valuation made and tender the amount to the defendants as a consideration for the property acquired through the proceeding. Aliso Water Co. v. Baker, 95 Cal. 268, 30 Pac. 537.

4. Where land is taken for public use, the damages awarded are personal property into which the real property taken has been converted by operation of law. The award represents the aggregate value of all the estates and interests in the real property acquired, and any person interested may obtain a judicial allotment of his proportionate share and recover the amount thereof. Utter v. Richmond, 112 N. Y. 610, 20 N. E. 554; Murphy v. Hirschman, 168 App. Div. 153, 153 N. Y. Supp. 849.

It is declared, though, by appellant that:

> His interest "was not an interest in real property. He had no unexpired term to be valued. His tenancy terminated in the entry of the decree. Because the land was farming land, he thereupon became entitled to entry upon the lands to remove his crop."

Again he states:

> "Necessarily at the time of the trial Komano had received all the benefits which he was entitled to under the lease up to the crop then growing, and this crop, as we have seen, was personal property, and Komano's right, to enter and remove the same was the right which the law gave him on the termination of his leasehold. It was not an interest in real property."

If it was personal property, and not an interest in real property, it is difficult to see how he can obtain in this proceeding any comfort from the doctrine of the cases cited by him that the award represents the aggregate value of all the estates and interests in the real property acquired. The authorities, indeed, seem to contemplate that the condemnation of land reaches only the real property and improvements thereon which are a part of the realty. Our statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1248), provides that in such cases there must be ascertained and assessed "the value of the property sought to be condemned, and all improvements thereon pertaining to the realty, and of each and every separate estate or interest therein." If personal property is to be included in the decree of condemnation, it should at least be specified in the decree. If these emblements were merely personal property, as claimed by appellant, it is at least doubtful whether it was proper to include them in said decree or to award their value, and it would seem that their owner could remove them after said decree of condemnation as well as before. In this connection it may be said that none of the cases cited by appellant involved a similar contention as that made here by appellant in reference to said verdict awarding damages.

In Big Lost River Irr. Co. v. Davidson, 21 Idaho, 160, 121 Pac. 92, no consideration was suggested as to who would share in the award. There was an objection, however, that the verdict should have been segregated as to the several parcels of land which were condemned, but the court held that the objection had been waived by failure to take advantage of it at the proper time.

In Metropolitan West Side Elevated Ry. Co. v. Eschner et al., 232 Ill. 210, 83 N. E. 809, it was decided that it was the duty of the court in awarding the damages assessed by the jury to determine who had title to the land condemned and make the award accordingly, and the court declared:

> "In determining such questions the court will not be restricted to mere legal titles, but will ascertain the rights of the respective owners in the property appropriated, whether such rights are legal or equitable in their nature."

The conflicting claims of title to the land appropriated are obviously what the court had in view.

In Lafferty v. Schuylkill River East Side R. Co., 124 Pa. 297, 16 Atl. 869, 3 L. R. A. 124, 10 Am. St. Rep. 587, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held that:

> "Crops planted by the owner of land after the location of a railroad, but before the damages had been paid or secured or notice given of an intent to enter, are proper subjects for compensation when the land is taken."

In that case, however, the action was brought by the tenant against the railroad company for damages after it had taken possession of the land. There was no suit for condemnation, as the company appropriated said land under an agreement between it and the owner of the fee.

In Buchanan v. Kansas City, 208 Mo. 674, 106 S. W. 531, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 834, the decision was in favor of one having a lien on the land which was condemned, and it was held by the court that:

> "When the money was paid into court, it represented, and stood in place of, the land condemned, and the claimants had the same right to and interest in the money that they had in the land."

In Van Loan v. City of New York, 105 App. Div. 572, 94 N. Y. Supp. 221, it was held, as stated in the syllabus, that:

> "An award, made for the taking of real property in condemnation proceedings, takes the place of the land, and remains subject to mortgage or judgment liens to which the land was subject, and is payable to a receiver appointed in supplementary proceedings on a judgment against the owner of the land."

The point involved therein is really foreign to any issue here. The vital consideration involved in United States v. Dunnington, 146 U. S. 340, 13 Sup. Ct. 79, 36 L. Ed. 996, was that, where lands are condemned for the use of the government, the United States discharges its whole duty to the owners by paying the amount awarded by the commissioners into court pursuant to its order, and that, if there was any error in the distribution of the same, it should not be charged against the government. The court took occasion, however, to point out who were entitled to share in said award and how they could enforce their claims. Therein the court followed Crane v. Elizabeth, 36 N. J. Eq. 339, in declaring it will be the duty of the court to decide the question of title of the various defendants in ordering judgment to the respective defendants, and that the court would not be restricted to mere legal titles, but "will ascertain the rights of the respective owners in the property appropriated, whether such rights are legal or equitable in their nature."

In McAllister v. Reel, 53 Mo. App. 81, both the owner and a lessee were made defendants in condemnation proceedings. There was only one assessment for damages, and it was in favor of the owner and was paid to him. Thereupon the lessee sued the owner to recover his share of the award as money had and received for his benefit. The court said:

> "We are satisfied that the plaintiff's cause of action is well founded. * * * The defendant admits that the plaintiff was his lessee; that the lease had several years to run; and that the larger portion of the house was condemned and removed. He also admits that he received the entire award. The report of the commissioners conclusively shows that the entire damages to the property were assessed. Certainly, under this evidence, the defendant has money in his hands which equitably and fairly belongs to the plaintiff, and which the defendant must pay."

Of course, therein the lessee unquestionably had an interest in the land, and that interest was covered by the award of damages.

North Coast Ry. Co. v. Hess, 56 Wash. 335, 105 Pac. 853, involved the question of the right of lienors of the land condemned to participate in the award of damages, and it was held that these various lienors had the same claim upon this fund for the satisfaction of their claims as they had against the land itself, notwithstanding the fact that their claim of record was only against the land.

Other cases to the same effect are cited, but they exhibit no special feature.

[1] The precise situation here involved was not presented in any of the cases which we have examined, but we do not mean to hold, however, that it would not have been proper to include in the award the value of the fruit crop to which appellant claims he was entitled. But did the award actually include such allowance? We can find in the record no warrant for so holding. Appellant himself did not contemplate that the verdict of the jury would include his claim. If he had anticipated or suspected such contingency, he would undoubtedly have appeared in the action and urged his right and presented some evidence in its support. And it may be said that this case emphasizes the importance of such appearance as a moment's reflection must indicate.

Moreover, when plaintiff made application to the court for an order authorizing it to take possession of and use the property described in the judgment of condemnation, appellant joined with the People's Savings Bank in a written opposition to said application in which they declared not only that said judgment was void in that it did not determine the names of the owners of the various interests and the value of their respective interests, but that the court was without jurisdiction to determine how much of said sum of $104,100 either of the defendants was entitled to, that the value of the interest of either of said defendants had not been paid into court for them, and, furthermore, that the "plaintiff should be prevented from in any manner injuring, taking possession of or interfering with the crop of fruit growing on said premises and now being harvested therefrom for the reason that the plaintiff herein is not entitled to such crop or any part thereof."

Of course, appellant is not estopped by the averments of said opposition, but it is worth mentioning as illustrating his attitude at the time of the trial. He was undoubtedly mistaken in certain respects in his position. He was probably right, though, in the contention that plaintiff was not "entitled" to said crop or any part thereof. At least, we cannot say that it was included in the judgment of condemnation or in the award of damages.

Our attention has not been called to any evidence in the record of the trial bearing upon the value of said crop. How can it be said that the verdict includes said value in the absence of any showing upon the subject? How can it be determined how much the jury concluded should be awarded for the emblements when they were not apprized of any such claim? If an interest in the real property was involved, then, as we have seen, it could be assumed that this was a part of the award and the court might apportion it as the interest of the parties demanded. But the case here concerns personal property according to appellant's claim. Besides, if it could be said that it was contemplated by the verdict, it would be its value not later than the time the verdict was rendered. But there is no evidence that it had any value then. Its potential or prospective value would not control even if there had been evidence of it.

It is quite apparent that, if the court should attempt to carve out of the total award what might be supposed the jury intended for the crop, it would be simply groping in the dark.

Again, there seems to be no evidence in the record that appellant was prevented from harvesting the crop. He claims himself that he had the right to enter upon the lands to remove his crop, but there is nothing to show that he made an effort to do so. He states also that:

> "He suffered no injury of any kind until the entry of the order of possession. Then his right to the emblements ceased, and his equitable right arose to resort to the money in place of resorting to the crop. If the possession had not been taken until after the crop was harvested, Komano would have had no claim upon the money."

It is difficult to understand how that circumstance could affect the question of whether the value of the crop was included in the verdict. But aside from that, there seems to be no evidence in the record that possession of the land was taken by plaintiff until after the crop was harvested. It is true that notice was given of an application for such possession to be heard on Monday, the 27th day of May, 1912, but the motion was not heard until November 11, 1912, and on that date the order was made authorizing "said plaintiff to take possession of and use the property taken and condemned." This was long after the crop had been harvested, as the parties agree. Therefore, it would seem, according to appellant's theory, that he has no claim against the fund constituting the verdict.

[2] Moreover, on July 1, 1912, appellant entered into a written agreement with plaintiff and two fruit companies, electing and agreeing to pursue a certain remedy for the enforcement of his declared claim and he ought to abide by it. That agreement recites that the said judgment of condemnation had been entered, and that the value of said 104.1 acres was fixed at $104,100; that appellant is now, and ever since the 1st day of November, 1907, has been, in possession of said orchard under the aforesaid lease; that "there is now on said orchard a large crop of pears, plums and apples now being harvested, and the harvesting of which will continue during July, 1912, and the greater part of August, 1912"; that said judgment "did not award any specific sum separately to said S. Komano"; that certain appeals were taken in said cause; that the plaintiff claims that it is entitled to take possession of said land and harvest said crops as its own, and appellant claims that the judgment of condemnation is void, and that he is entitled to possession of the premises and the proceeds of said crops; that it is "the desire of the parties hereto that said crops be properly cared for, picked, packed, and sold, and the net proceeds be deposited and safely kept and eventually paid to the party who shall eventually be finally adjudged to be entitled thereto." It was therefore stipulated that said Komano "continue in charge of the care, picking, harvesting, and packing said fruit and preparing the same for market under the terms and conditions of the shipping contract hereto attached and made a part of this agreement, and that the said party of the second part will use and exercise proper care, skill, and diligence in so doing, according to the best practice and customs of handling like crops." Then follow directions as to how the crops shall be sold and distribution of the proceeds, including the payment to appellant of the reasonable value of his services and the amounts paid out by him from March 22 to July 1, 1912, to wit, the sum of $3,020.64, and the further sum of $396 per month until the harvesting is completed; that the sum of $3,750, which would be due as rent on July 1st, be deposited in the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. until the final determination of the rights under said lease and that it be finally paid to the party entitled thereto; "that the residue shall then be deposited in the said Bank of California, at such rate of interest as may be obtainable to be paid to the persons or person who shall have established its or their right thereto." It is further provided that "the object of this agreement is to provide for the care, harvesting, and sale of the said crops so that the net proceeds thereof shall be eventually received by the party entitled thereto after paying the costs, charges, and expenses hereinbefore set forth, and the parties hereto may proceed with the present or any other litigation which they may deem proper to take in order to establish their right to the said funds."

It is not disputed that an action is now pending in the United States district court to determine who is entitled to this money.

Assuredly appellant could not thus voluntarily waive and surrender his claim to the possession of the property for the purpose of harvesting the crop, and then, for the reason that he was not in possession at the time of harvesting, maintain an action for a portion of the verdict of damages awarded by the jury. Independent of his possession at the time of harvest, his claim was either included or not included in the verdict. No one can say it was so included, as there was neither averment nor proof to indicate it. It was no part of the realty; his interest in said realty having terminated by agreement at the time of condemnation. His claim relates to personal property that became valuable after said verdict was found. If, therefore, said property had been or was appropriated by any one subsequent to said judgment of condemnation, or appellant's right to the possession of said personal property had been or was defeated, appellant's redress would be against said party so appropriating the said property or so defeating said right to the possession thereof. It would seem that he has no claim against the Reed Orchard Company. If any cause of action exists in his favor, he should reap the fruits of it in the said action pending in the federal court.

We see no reason to disturb the order of the lower court, and it is, therefore, affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

WOLF v. BRAKEBILL et al.

THOMPSON et al. v. W. H. WOLF, CASTLE BROS., WOLF & SON et al.

(Civ. 2012.)

1. Bills and Notes 🔑520—Fraud—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action on notes given for the purchase price of a wholesale cigar house, the defense being fraud, evidence, in connection with the circumstances of the transaction, held sufficient to support findings made for plaintiff.

2. Bills and Notes 🔑122 — Signing for Accommodation.

As to the payee of notes, parties who signed them for the accommodation of the maker were joint makers.

3. Cancellation of Instruments 🔑24(1)—Notes—Suit by Joint Makers.

While the buyer of a business, who gave notes for the price, retained the property and the benefits of the transaction, joint makers of the notes, who signed them for her accommodation, could not have cancellation of the instruments to release them from their obligation merely because the maker made an injudicious purchase; in the absence of conspiracy existing between the payee and the purchaser and her husband to secure the accommodation signatures by means of fraud, a rescission of the contract and return of the property was a condition prerequisite to maintaining the action to cancel the notes.

4. Bills and Notes 🔑519—Evidence—Showing that Maker was Surety.

If a party, apparently the maker of a note, may show that the payee consented to and did deal with him in the capacity of surety, the supporting evidence must be clear and unequivocal.

5. Bills and Notes 🔑487—Amendment after Trial.

In action on notes, the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow the defendants to amend their answer, after trial, by alleging that plaintiff consented to and did deal with them as sureties and not as principals, where there was no evidence tending to show any agreement or understanding on plaintiff's part, nor on the part of defendants, that the capacity in which they signed the notes, and that in which their signatures were accepted, was other than that of joint makers.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Actions by W. H. Wolf against Mrs. B. Brakebill, B. Brakebill, Chas. Thompson, and C. B. Williams, and by Chas. Thompson and C. B. Williams against W. H. Wolf, Castle Bros., Wolf & Son, a corporation, Mrs. B. Brakebill and B. Brakebill. From a judgment for plaintiff in the first case, and that plaintiffs in the second action take nothing thereby, and an order of the court denying their motion for new trial, plaintiffs in the second action appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Manning, Thompson & Hoover, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Denis & Loewenthal, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The first of these actions was brought by plaintiff to recover a balance upon two promissory notes made to him by defendants. In the second action plaintiffs Chas. Thompson and C. B. Williams (made defendants in the first) sought a decree to have the notes constituting the subject of the first action canceled and annulled. In both actions defendants B. Brakebill and Mrs. B. Brakebill suffered default. The grounds of defense pleaded by Thompson and Williams to the recovery sought upon the notes are substantially the same as those set forth in their complaint to have the notes canceled and annulled. By stipulation of the parties the two actions were consolidated for trial, as a result of which trial it was adjudged and decreed that plaintiff in the first action have judgment for amount of the notes sued upon, and that Thompson and Williams, plaintiffs in the second action, take nothing thereby. From the judgment so entered, and an order of court denying their motion for a new trial, Thompson and Williams appeal.

The complaint upon the notes was in the usual form, setting forth copies thereof, signed, "Mrs. B. Brakebill, B. Brakebill, Chas. Thompson, C. B. Williams," as makers thereof. As a defense to recovery thereon, and also as grounds for the decree asked canceling and annulling the same, Thompson and Williams alleged that their signatures to the notes, as accommodation makers and sureties, were procured by fraud and misrepresentation of Wolf, Castle Bros., Wolf & Son.

It appears that W. H. Wolf was president of Castle Bros., Wolf & Son, a corporation which owned a wholesale cigar house in Los Angeles, of which business B. Brakebill had for about a year prior to August, 1911, been in charge as manager thereof, and as such was under bond in the sum of $1,000 for a faithful discharge of his duties. About August 8, 1911, Mr. Wolf came to Los Angeles from San Francisco, where the main business of the corporation was conducted, and found among the outstanding accounts for goods sold by Brakebill one appearing against a Mr. Inman for $1,394.18, which the latter claimed he had paid, and exhibited what purported to be receipted bills showing payment of some $600 on said account. Wolf told Brakebill the result of his interview with Inman, and expressed a desire for immediate settlement. Thereupon Brakebill proposed to buy the stock of goods and business, stating that he could secure parties to join him in giving a note for the purchase price. Upon Wolf indicating his willingness to effect a sale upon such conditions, negotiations followed, as a result of which the fixtures, stock in trade, business, and good will of the House of Manila were sold, and by bill of sale transferred to Mrs. B. Brakebill for the sum of $5,485.74, which was the value of the goods agreed upon between the vendor and purchaser. At the same time Wolf sold and assigned to Mrs. B. Brakebill the Inman account of an agreed price of $1,394.18. In consideration of such transfer the promissory notes constituting the subject of this action were delivered to Wolf, who received them in full payment of the purchase price of the property sold to Mrs. B. Brakebill.

The alleged fraud constituting the defense and upon which appellant prayed for a cancellation and annullment of the notes, was: First, that the stock was represented to be good and salable, whereas it was musty, mildewed, worm-eaten, and worthless; second, that one-half the goods represented to be in stock, as per an inventory prepared, were not actually in stock; third, that the alleged account represented to exist against Inman and for which the note of $1,394.18 was given, did not exist; fourth, that Wolf, Castle Bros., Wolf & Son agreed to supply stock to Mrs. Brakebill for future sale upon the guaranty of Thompson and Williams, with which agreement they thereafter refused to comply; and fifth, that Wolf, Castle Bros., Wolf & Son fraudulently conspired with the Brakebills to secure the signatures of Thompson and Williams to said notes as accommodation makers thereof. As to all of these contentions the court found in favor of Wolf.

[1] In our opinion, the testimony as to which there is some conflict, taken in connection with the circumstances surrounding the transaction, is ample to support the findings made. That a part of the stock was mildewed and worm-eaten is conceded. This fact, however, was well known to the purchaser. On this account, in some instances reductions were conceded to the extent of 60 per cent. of the invoice price. It must be borne in mind that Wolf was not selling the goods nor the account to Thompson and Williams, but selling them to one who, with her husband, as shown by the evidence, had been in charge and management thereof for nearly a year, and hence fully acquainted with both the quantity of stock on hand and the condition thereof. What is said with reference to this proposition is likewise applicable to the second, namely, that one-half of the goods as shown by the invoice were not in stock. This claim is based upon the evidence of one Dignum, who testified that six days prior to the sale he made an inventory of the stock in the House of Manila from data given him by B. Brakebill, which on that date showed a less number of cigars on hand than on the date of the sale. This is not inconsistent with the alleged statement of Wolf that the inventory constituted a true and correct list of the goods on hand; nor with that of Mrs. Brakebill, the buyer, who, in response to Thompson's inquiry in reference to the inventory, said: "I know that is correct."

That Inman had paid something on his account, which payment was not shown by the books, may be conceded. The purpose of buying the account, as stated to Thompson and Williams by the Brakebills, was to give them money with which to conduct the business until collections from their own sales should come in, and whether part of it had been paid and then in possession of the Brakebills, or whether paid thereafter, was immaterial. In either event, as stated by Brakebill to Thompson, since the contrary is not shown, "it was as good as wheat." The purpose of Thompson and Williams in signing the note was to obtain for Mrs. Brakebill the use of this money, which purpose, so far as disclosed by the record, was accomplished. There is no evidence that Mrs. Brakebill, the buyer, did not receive the full benefit of the amount represented to be due from Inman, and it is clear that the House of Manila released to her all claim thereto.

Moreover, the evidence as a whole touching the subject shows that Thompson and Williams were both attorneys at law; that the former was the legal adviser of the Brakebills; that no confidential relation existed between Wolf and any of the parties, his dealings with the Brakebills being at arm's length; that Thompson and Williams had every opportunity to examine the stock before signing the notes; that before signing they consulted Mrs. Brakebill and her husband, the former stating that there was 60 to 70 per cent. profit to be derived from the business, as to which there is no evidence to the contrary, nor anything to show that Mrs. Brakebill, who retains the property and the proceeds of the sales thereof, is insolvent or unable to meet the payment of the notes for which as to her the other makers are sureties.

[2] As to Wolf, however, they were joint makers of the notes, having signed them for the accommodation of Mrs. Brakebill, in consideration of which Wolf conveyed to her the property referred to. So far as shown, Mrs. Brakebill obtained just what she contracted for; hence she was not defrauded and makes no complaint.

[3] While she retains the property and the benefits of the transaction, Thompson and Williams asked to have the notes given for the purchase price thereof canceled and to be released from their obligation, because the party for whose accommodation they signed the notes made an injudicious purchase. To our minds, a statement of the case is a sufficient answer to the contention of appellants. See Stockton, etc., Society v. Giddings, 96 Cal. 84, 30 Pac. 1016, 21 L. R. A. 406, 31 Am. St. Rep. 181.

We find no evidence whatever to support the contention as to the alleged conspiracy existing between Wolf and the Brakebills to secure the signatures of Thompson and Williams to the notes by means of fraud. In the absence of such conspiracy, a rescission of the contract and return of the property is a prerequisite condition of maintaining the action to cancel the notes. Gifford v. Carvill, 29 Cal. 589; Canal Co. v. Roach, 78 Cal. 552, 21 Pac. 304.

It is next claimed that the court abused its discretion in refusing to allow Thompson and Williams to amend their answer after the trial by alleging that Wolf consented to and did deal with the said defendants Thompson and Williams as sureties and not as principals.

[4] The language of the notes imports an unconditional promise to pay on the part of the makers thereof, and, conceding, as claimed, that notwithstanding the fact that where one appears as the maker of a note he may show that the payee consented to and did deal with him in the capacity of surety, the evidence in support thereof must be clear and unequivocal. Oppenheimer v. Clunie, 142 Cal. 313, 75 Pac. 899; Colton v. Stanford, 82 Cal. 398, 23 Pac. 16, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137.

[5] In the case at bar, while it appears that Brakebill stated to Wolf that he could obtain parties to "join him" in giving notes for the purchase price of the property, and that Wolf in the negotiations used the words "security" and "surety," there is no evidence that tends to show any agreement or understanding on his part, nor in fact upon the part of Thompson and Williams, that the capacity in which they signed the notes and that in which their signatures were accepted was other than that of joint makers thereof, in the promise to pay unconditionally. Damon v. Pardow, 34 Cal. 278. There was no abuse of discretion exercised in denying the motion.

We have examined a number of alleged errors predicated upon the rulings of the court in the admission and rejection of evidence, nearly all of which, under the view of the case hereinbefore expressed, were upon immaterial matters, and, where material, they are not of a character which could be deemed prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellants.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edward P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by the Locomobile Company of America against Fred Belabco. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Elliott McAllister and H. S. Young, both of San Francisco, for appellant. R. W. McKnight, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant. The action is one in replevin for the return of an automobile sold by the plaintiff to the defendant; the plaintiff's right to replevin the same being based upon the theory that at the time of the commencement of the action the defendant was in default in the payment of the sum of $350 due under the terms of a leasenote or conditional sale agreement evidencing the transaction, and which agreement provided that in the event of default the plaintiff might retake possession of the car. Defendant contends, on the other hand, that there was only the sum of $150 due, which he also claims to have tendered to the plaintiff prior to the institution of the action.

The court found for the defendant, awarded him possession of the car, and in addition gave him, upon his cross-complaint, $425 damages consequent upon the replevin of the car.

The agreement in express terms provided that the price of the automobile was $2,650, but that the defendant should be allowed thereon the sum of $1,250, the value of a car turned in by the defendant, and should also be credited with such further sum over and above the $1,250 as might be realized by the plaintiff from a resale of the latter car. It is the claim of the defendant, however, supported by an abundance of evidence and sanctioned by the finding of the trial court, that the defendant signed the contract of purchase with a distinct oral agreement that he was to have a credit on account of the turned-in car of $1,450. He testified, as did others in his behalf, including the salesman who conducted the sale, that the defendant refused to sign the contract unless allowed a credit of at least $1,450 on account of the old car, he having purchased the latter from the plaintiff three months before and having paid therefor $1,750. These witnesses, or some of them, also testified that the defendant signed the contract upon the representation of the salesman that the parent organization of the plaintiff (of which it was but a subsidiary) insisted that cars of the type of the one in question should be sold for not less than the schedule price of $2,650, and that cars of the model of the one turned in in part payment should be considered as of a value of no more than $1,250. There was also testimony that the manager of the plaintiff approved the oral understanding had with the defendant. It is admitted that the old car was sold by the plaintiff for $1,250 several weeks after the transaction here involved by a salesman of the plaintiff other than the one with whom defendant dealt. The latter testified, as a witness for the plaintiff, that when he made the promise to the defendant to allow $1,450 on the old car he was positive he could effect a sale of it for that sum; that he knew persons who he was sure were willing to pay that price for such a car.

The question is: Was the court justified in finding that the defendant was entitled to a credit of $1,450, and not $1,250?

[1] The evidence of the oral contemporaneous agreement, conflicting, as it does with the plain terms of the written contract, was inadmissible (Peterson v. Chaix, 5 Cal. App. 525, 90 Pac. 948; Standard Box Co. v. Mutual Biscuit Co., 10 Cal. App. 746, 103 Pac. 938; Balfour v. Fresno, 109 Cal. 221, 41 Pac. 876; Code Civ. Proc. § 1856; Civ. Code, § 1640), unless, as is asserted by the defendant, it tended to prove, as alleged in the answer, that the representations made to the defendant by the plaintiff were made for the purpose and with the intent to deceive and defraud him.

[2, 3] The burden of proving fraud is always upon him who relies upon it, and it cannot be presumed (Gray v. Galpin, 98 Cal. 633, 33 Pac. 725; Heller v. Dyerville Mfg. Co., 116 Cal. 127, 133, 47 Pac. 1016), and we find no evidence in this record tending to support the finding of the court that the plaintiff deceived and defrauded defendant. The failure of the salesman of plaintiff to carry out his promise, made in good faith, certainly does not constitute fraud. Plaintiff's agent, testifying on behalf of the defendant on this phase of the case, said:

> "I asked him to sign it as it was, and he refused, and I finally settled it by agreeing absolutely to get him more money for the old car. I was just as sure I could get it as I am that I am sitting in this chair."

[4] A failure to perform a parol agreement made in good faith does not constitute fraud. Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 21 Pac. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162; Langley v. Rodriguez, 122 Cal. 580, 55 Pac. 406, 68 Am. St. Rep. 70; 20 Cyc. pp. 20, 21, and 22.

[5] Section 1572 of our Civil Code provides that actual fraud may consist of "a promise made without any intention of performing it." As is stated in Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, at page 527, 17 Pac. 689, at page 690, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189, in reference to a promise made, but not performed:

> "It is to be observed on this ground that the essence of the fraud is the existence of an intent at the time of the promise not to perform. But for such intent there would be no actual fraud; for it is well settled that the mere failure to fulfill a promise is not fraud."

The case of Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 126, on page 131, 20 Pac. 382, on page 384 (12 Am. St. Rep. 29), involved an attack upon two deeds on the ground of fraud, and although the question of the admissibility of parol testimony in reference to a writing is not involved, the definition of fraud is always the same, and is there stated:

> "But the making of a promise with no intention at the time of performing it constitutes a fraud for which a contract may be rescinded. Civ. Code, § 1572. See, also, Bigelow on Fraud, 483 et seq. The mere failure to perform the covenant does not relate back to and render the same fraudulent. It is the present intent not to perform it that renders it wrongful."

The judgment is reversed.

Original petition by T. A. Baker for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ granted, and petitioner discharged from custody.

Wiley & Lambert and C. E. Arnold, all of Bakersfield, for petitioner. E. L. Foster, of Bakersfield, Leon E. Morris and Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, and Robert M. Clarke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The petitioner is in custody of the sheriff of Kern county by virtue of a commitment issued out of the superior court of that county. Claiming that his imprisonment is unlawful he applied to this court for a writ of habeas corpus, which was granted. The commitment is based upon an order made by the superior court on date September 26, 1916, wherein petitioner was required to pay a fine of $500 as punishment for a contempt of court, and wherein it was further ordered that in default of payment of the fine he be imprisoned in the county jail until the fine is satisfied at the rate of one day's imprisonment for each $2 unpaid of the fine.

Petitioner was sheriff of Kern county for the term ending in January, 1915, when he was succeeded by D. B. Newell, the present sheriff. During the year 1913 one Matthew Bailey commenced an action in the superior court of Kern county against Security Trust Company, a corporation, to recover possession of certain corporation certificates of stock and other documents. Under claim and delivery proceedings in that action, Baker, as sheriff, took possession of that property. Thereafter Bailey applied to the superior court for a peremptory writ of mandate to compel the sheriff to deliver the property to him. In that proceeding a judgment rendered in favor of the sheriff was reversed by this court. Bailey v. Baker, 28 Cal. App. 537, 153 Pac. 242. Baker's defense in that case as presented in this court was that he had lawfully returned the property to Security Trust Company by reason of a redelivery bond received by him from the company, and this court held that under the facts then shown by the record the redelivery bond was ineffective, and that the stated defense could not be maintained. When the case of Bailey v. Baker, as Sheriff, etc., was restored to the calendar of the superior court, it was tried again between the original parties; the plaintiff contending that Baker continued to be sheriff for the purpose of completing the duties pertaining to his office in the claim and delivery proceeding. On February 9, 1916, the superior court filed "findings of fact and conclusions of law" which on February 10th were recorded in its book of judgments, and no other judgment was entered. The so-called findings contained a direction that the writ of mandate issue. On the 9th day of February a writ of mandate was issued to Baker "as sheriff of the county of Kern, state of California, to perform the duties as sheriff * * * in that certain action entitled Matthew Bailey v. Security Trust Co. et al., to deliver possession of the personal property hereinafter mentioned and described to the plaintiff." The writ required Baker, as sheriff, to take into his possession immediately the described property and deliver it to Bailey and to make due return of the writ and of his proceedings thereunder on February 14, 1916. The writ was delivered to Baker on the 9th day of February. He made to the superior court no return whatever, and did not deliver the property to Bailey, nor did he take it into possession.

On April 8, 1916, an affidavit was filed by Bailey's attorney in the case of Bailey v. Baker, supra, setting forth the facts concerning the award and issuance of the writ of mandate, and that Baker had failed and refused to comply therewith, and praying that a citation issue requiring Baker to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt of court in refusing to comply with said writ. In the affidavit it was stated that Baker refused to perform the acts required by the writ and informed affiant that he did not have to perform those acts. At that time the superior court refused to issue the citation for contempt, and a writ of mandate was granted by this court directing that the lower court issue the demanded citation. In that proceeding we held (against the contention of the respondent superior court) that the fact that Baker has appealed from the judgment rendered against him in the mandate proceeding of Bailey v. Baker, supra (no undertaking having been given for stay of enforcement of the writ), would not excuse him from performing the acts required by the writ in that proceeding. Bailey v. Superior Court, 159 Pac. 990. The superior court having issued the citation, tried the issues raised by Baker's answer to the order to show cause, and thereupon made the above-mentioned order of September 26th pursuant to which the commitment was issued whereby Baker is in custody. In that order it was recited that the material allegations contained in the affidavit for contempt were true.

[1] In the above-mentioned proceeding of Bailey v. Superior Court, wherein we directed that the citation issue, the point was presented, but not very fully argued, that Baker, having ceased to be sheriff of the county of Kern, no longer had power to perform any official duties, and therefore could not be required to do the things prescribed by the writ of mandate issued to him. On the other side of the question we were referred to Sagely v. Livermore, 45 Cal. 613, and Perrin v. McMann, 97 Cal. 52, 31 Pac. 837, as well as decisions in other jurisdictions. 35 Cyc. 1543, 1544. In Sagely v. Livermore, supra, it was held that under the statutes then in force it was then the intent of the law that an officer commencing to execute process should complete it, notwithstanding a change in the incumbency. Not only was the rule thus established under the statutes existing at the time of that decision, but the same rule existed at common law. People v. Kendall, 14 Colo. App. 175, 59 Pac. 409. In the present proceeding petitioner renews the contention that his authority as sheriff has ceased and that he was and is without power to comply with the writ of mandate requiring him to retake possession of the property involved in that proceeding. Our attention is now directed to changes in the statutes, to which no reference was made by respondent in Bailey v. Superior Court, by reason whereof petitioner claims that his position is sustained. With this contention (notwithstanding our order and opinion in the case last mentioned) it seems that we must agree. It is provided by section 4171 of the Political Code that:

> "* * * When any process remains with the sheriff unexecuted, in whole or in part, * * * at the expiration of his term of office, said process shall be executed by his successor or successors in office. * * *"

This provision was first placed in County Government Act of 1883, § 107. It was repeated in the successive re-enactments of that act, and then carried over into the Political Code as now contained in section 4171. The subject is discussed in Wood v. Lowden, 117 Cal. 232, 49 Pac. 132. It was there held that under the provisions of the County Government Act, as enacted in 1883, where a writ of attachment was received by the sheriff prior to the expiration of his term of office, and his execution thereof had not been completed at the expiration of his term, but the attached property remained in his hands as sheriff (he being his own successor in office), his acts after the commencement of the new term of office were performed under the authority conferred by his second incumbency, and that the sureties on his bond as sheriff for the first term were not liable for neglects of duty by him in the performance of his duties after the expiration of that first term. The court said that the case was within the terms of the statute which provided that writs unexecuted in whole or in part by a sheriff "shall be executed by his successor."

[2] There is no doubt in our minds that the word "process," as used in Political Code, § 4171, includes the proceedings which authorize a sheriff to take property in claim and delivery. Section 4319 is contained in the same title with 4171, and declares that " 'process,' as used in this title, includes all writs, warrants, summons, and orders of courts of justice, or judicial officers. * * *" And in section 17 of the same Code "process" is defined as "a writ or summons issued in the course of judicial proceedings." In Laughlin v. Thompson, 76 Cal. 287, 18 Pac. 330, it is stated that in case of claim and delivery the affidavit, order indorsed thereon, and undertaking all go into the hands of the officer "and constitute the process."

[3] The fact that a provision of the Code is in derogation of the common law does not require that it be strictly construed. The provisions of the Code and all proceedings under it are required to be liberally construed, "with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." Section 4, Pol. Code. The policy of the law, as declared in section 4171, seems to be that the official duties pertaining to the office of sheriff shall so far as possible be performed by the actual incumbent of the office, and that the powers of the office shall not continue to be exercised by one whose term has expired. Unexecuted process in his hands does not lose its force, but the power of the law with respect to such process thereafter moves through the arm of the new officer, to whom whatever belongs to the office should be delivered.

Our conclusion as to the matters above stated renders it unnecessary in this proceeding to determine other questions proposed in the argument of counsel, and which have to do with the validity of the writ of mandamus as it was issued in this case, assuming that it had been directed to a sheriff then having power to act. Neither are we at this time concerned with the liability of the petitioner on account of his failure while sheriff to deliver to the plaintiff property which the plaintiff was entitled to receive from him.

The petitioner is discharged from custody.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasly, Judge.

Action by Earl T. Hansen against the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Denson, Cooley & Denson, of San Francisco, R. C. McComish, of San Jose, and Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for appellant. E. M. Rea, of San Jose, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The action was one for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff while in the employ of the defendant and while engaged as a helper to the driver of a motor truck used by the defendant in hauling electric power poles from its yards at San Martin, in Santa Clara county, to points along its power line on the Monterey road. The action was tried by the court sitting without a jury. The findings of the court set forth the details of the accident in which plaintiff received his injuries substantially as follows: On and prior to the 15th day of April, 1912, the plaintiff was employed by the defendant as helper to a truck driver in and about the construction of its power lines in the above region, and subject to the orders of said truck driver, and also to the orders of the yard foreman of said defendant at San Martin. On said last-named day these three employés of the defendant were engaged in loading a large heavy electric power line pole onto a certain wagon or truck of the defendant by means of a wooden horse, so placed that one end of a large and heavy plank or skid rested on the end of said wooden horse, the other end of said plank resting upon the ground, in order that said electric line pole could be rolled or pulled up the said plank, and thence onto said wagon or truck. While so engaged in loading said pole upon said truck the plaintiff was proceeding under the direction of his fellow employés to so place a block under the legs of said wooden horse as to raise the height of said horse so that the end of the plank or skid resting on the same would be as high as the bed of said truck or wagon, and while the plaintiff was so engaged his fellow employés lifted or raised said wooden horse so high that the end of said plank or skid slipped off the end thereof and fell upon the plaintiff, causing the injuries for which this action was brought. The court further found that said wooden horse was not a fit and proper tool for use for the purposes for which it was being used at the time of said injury, for the reason that it had no cleats bolted or fastened on the end thereof which would have prevented the said plank or skid from slipping from it, and that such cleats as had theretofore been thereon were broken and worn off by usage, and also that the notch in the end of said wooden horse designed to hold said plank or skid in place was worn away, and that imperfect and outworn condition of said appliances was well known to the defendant and was not known to the plaintiff prior and at the time of said injury.

The chief contention of the appellant herein is that the foregoing facts as found by the court were unsupported by the evidence in the case, and for that reason its motion for a nonsuit should have prevailed and its motion for a new trial should have been granted. The appellant makes the further contention that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence which should, as a matter of law, have prevented his recovery in the action.

[1] With respect to the first of these contentions we have carefully read the record relating to the construction and state of repair of the appliance furnished by the defendant to its employés for the purpose of the work in the doing of which the plaintiff's injuries were received, and also relating to the acts in detail of the plaintiff and of the two other superior employés of the defendant under whose direction the plaintiff was working at the time of his injuries; and after such an inspection of the record we are unable to say that the trial court did not have before it sufficient evidence which, if believed by it, would sustain its foregoing findings of fact. The only witnesses to the immediate accident in which plaintiff's injuries were received were the plaintiff himself and the two other employés of the defendant under whose direction he was performing the particular task which put him in the place of danger at the moment when the plank slipped off the end of the wooden horse which his fellow servants were lifting and struck him on the head. The plaintiff himself testified to his own acts under the direction of his fellow servants immediately prior to and at the time of the accident; and while his testimony is in some material respects contradicted by that of his associates, in certain other respects it is inferentially supported by their own statements as to the positions of the three participants in the accident at the moment of its occurrence. The trial judge with these three witnesses before him saw fit to believe the substance of the plaintiff's statement as to the details of the accident, and we are unable to say that in so doing he was in error.

[2] The contention of the defendant that the plaintiff was shown to have been guilty of contributory negligence which should have prevented his recovery we find to be also without merit. Whether the plaintiff knew or ought to have known of the defective qualities of the appliances with which he and his fellow employés were furnished to do the particular thing out of the doing of which his injuries arose was a question of fact for the trial court to determine from the nature and obviousness of the alleged defects, and also from the more or less limited opportunity of the plaintiff to observe them and to appreciate their dangers arising out of his brief time of employment and previous nonuse of these particular appliances; and with its determination of this question of fact in plaintiff's favor we cannot interfere.

This accident occurred after the enactment of the so-called Roseberry Act (St. 1911, p. 796), relieving employés of the defenses of assumption of risk and negligence of their fellow employés; and hence these defenses were not available to the defendant in this action.

[3] The final contention of the appellant is that the award of damages by the trial court was excessive. The sum awarded as damages to the plaintiff was $11,310.05. At the time of his injuries the plaintiff was 32 years of age, in sound condition both physically and mentally, and with an earning capacity of $85 a month. As a result of the accident both his mental and physical condition are seriously and probably permanently impaired, to such an extent that he may never again be able to undergo any productive physical or mental exertion. The trial court seems, in making up its estimate of the amount of the plaintiff's compensation for these injuries, to have taken into account his life expectancy, and to have also made use of the methods of arriving at a proper measure of damages adopted under the so-called Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279). We cannot see that the use of those methods of arriving at a just admeasurement of damages by the trial court was not entirely legitimate, or that the result thus arrived at was either excessive or unjust, there being no contention that the mind of the trial judge was affected either by passion or prejudice in arriving at the amount specified as the sum which the plaintiff was entitled to recover. This being so, the amount of the judgment will not be disturbed.

In so far as the motion for a new trial was based upon newly discovered evidence supported by affidavits, it does not seem to be contended in the briefs of counsel for the appellant or upon oral argument that the trial court erred in refusing to grant said motion upon that ground. It will not, therefore, be considered upon appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by Hannah Sullivan, as administratrix of the estate of James J. Sullivan, deceased, against Timothy Shea. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. Kierce, of San Francisco (Walter Christie, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Tobin & Tobin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought by Hannah Sullivan, as administratrix of the estate of James J. Sullivan, deceased, against Timothy Shea upon a promissory note for $1,000, money alleged to have been borrowed by Shea from Sullivan in his lifetime. The complaint, alleging that the promissory note had been lost, set forth its terms, and the answer admitted the execution of the note substantially in the terms set forth.

In the year 1910 the deceased loaned to the defendant the sum of $1,000 without taking therefor a note, receipt, or other evidence of the transaction. About a year later, when the decedent was about to depart for a visit to Ireland, Shea executed in his favor the note in suit. Upon Sullivan's return he took up his abode with Shea and his wife, at whose home he remained for three or four months. The relationship between him and the Sheas was close and intimate, particularly as regards Mrs. Shea, who was his niece. Before leaving for Ireland, in a conversation concerning the loan, Sullivan told Mrs. Shea he did not care whether he ever got any of the money back; that Mrs. Shea and her husband were the best friends he had and were more entitled to the money than any of his other relatives. On another occasion later Mrs. Shea informed Sullivan that the money was in the bank, and offered to get it and repay the loan, but Sullivan refused to accept it and told her that she and her husband should keep the money and use it. On still another occasion, and after Sullivan had left the Shea home and engaged in business, Shea called on him for the purpose of paying the note and interest, but Sullivan at first refused to accept any money on account of the note, but after some persuasion on the part of Shea, accepted the money offered on account of interest, but refused any portion of the principal, and moreover told Shea not to bother about the note. Six or seven months later Sullivan died, and shortly thereafter the plaintiff was appointed administratrix of his estate. She made a thorough search among the papers and effects of Sullivan without succeeding in finding any trace of the note.

The trial court found for the plaintiff, and from the judgment entered thereupon and from an order denying his motion for a new trial this appeal is prosecuted by the defendant.

[1] The elements essential to constitute a valid gift are an intention to give, and the delivery, either actual or symbolical, of the thing intended to be given. Neither alone is sufficient. The rule is very clearly set forth in the case of Jones v. Falls, 101 Mo. App. 536, 73 S. W. 903, where it is said:

> "To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, there must be an intention to give, and a delivery to the donee, or to some one for him, of the property given. An intention of the donor to give is not alone sufficient; the intention must be executed, by a complete and unconditional delivery. Neither will a delivery be sufficient unless made with an intention to give."

See, also, Beaver v. Beaver, 117 N. Y. 421, 22 N. E. 940, 6 L. R. A. 403, 15 Am. St. Rep. 531; Knight v. Tripp, 121 Cal. 678, 54 Pac. 267; Pullen v. Placer, 138 Cal. 170, 66 Pac. 740, 71 Pac. 83, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19.

[2] It is also settled law that the destruction by the donor of the evidence of indebtedness with the intention to make a gift to the debtor is a sufficient forgiveness of the debt. Darland v. Taylor, 52 Iowa, 503, 3 N. W. 510, 35 Am. Rep. 285; Blake v. Kearney, Man. Unrep. Cas. (La.) 320; Gardner v. Gardner, 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 526, 34 Am. Dec. 340; Licey v. Licey, 7 Pa. 251, 47 Am. Dec. 513; Denunzio v. Scholtz, 117 Ky. 182, 77 S. W. 715, 4 Ann. Cas. 529.

[3] The burden of proving a gift is upon the donee. Lehr v. Jones, 74 App. Div. 54, 77 N. Y. Supp. 213; Thomas v. Tilley, 147 Ala. 189, 41 South. 854; Bray v. O'Rourke, 89 App. Div. 400, 85 N. Y. Supp. 907.

[4] It is also said to be the rule that where a claim of gift is asserted after the death of a donor, every element necessary to constitute a gift must be sustained by explicit and convincing evidence. In support of this rule, in the case of Whalen v. Milholland, 89 Md. 211, 43 Atl. 50, 44 L. R. A. 208, the court said:

> "Mindful of the facility with which, after the alleged donor is dead, fraudulent claims of ownership may be founded on pretended gifts of his property asserted to have been made whilst he was living, it is but a salutary precaution which demands explicit and convincing evidence of every element needed to constitute a valid donation whether it be a donation inter vivos or mortis causa. Even then, fraudulent claims may prevail, but the rigid requirement of the clearest proof will at least diminish the number."

To the same effect see Davis v. Davis (Sup.) 104 N. Y. Supp. 824; De Puy v. Stevens, 37 App. Div. 293, 55 N. Y. Supp. 810; Denigan v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc., 127 Cal. 141, 59 Pac. 389; Lehr v. Jones, supra.

[5, 6] In this case, the note having been shown to exist, we have on the part of the plaintiff the presumption that the obligation still exists until overcome by proof of payment, cancellation, or some stronger counter presumption. Lawson's Law of Presumptive Ev. 210. On the other hand there was testimony to the effect that the decedent had on several different occasions indicated that he intended to make a gift of the indebtedness to the defendant; and it was a question of fact to be passed on by the trial court, after consideration of this evidence coupled with the inference to be drawn from the circumstance that the note could not be found among the effects of the decedent, whether it had been destroyed by the alleged donor with the intent of forgiving the indebtedness. The burden of proof was upon the defendant to establish the gift by clear and convincing evidence, which in the opinion of the trial court, as indicated by the judgment rendered by it, he failed to do; and we cannot say upon a review of the evidence that the court's conclusion was contrary thereto.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

2. MECHANICS' LIENS 🔑279—FORECLOSURE—CONTRACT PRESUMED VALID.

Where pleadings and findings in foreclosure of mechanic's lien allege a contract made between owner and contractor, it will not be presumed that the contract was void for noncompliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, requiring contract to be subscribed by all parties and filed with county recorder.

3. MECHANICS' LIENS 🔑271(1) — FORECLOSURE—STATUTORY PROVISION.

The Mechanic's Lien Law (Code Civ. Proc. § 1200) contemplates foreclosure suits where a contract exists between owner of a building and the contractor, in which the lien is measured by the contract price, and also where there is no contract, when it is measured by actual value, and the lien claimant must show by his pleadings under which theory he claims.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑171(1)—THEORY OF CAUSE—VARIANCE BETWEEN PLEADING AND CLAIM.

Where a materialman claiming lien under Code Civ. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Portland Cement Company against E. W. Hopkins and others. Judgment for defendant named, and plaintiff appeals on judgment roll alone. Affirmed.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, for appellant. McGraw & Barry and Hartley F. Peart, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll alone from a judgment in favor of the defendant owner.

The transaction involved took place in 1909, and our discussion has reference to the Mechanic's Lien Law as it read prior to the amendments of 1911 to section 1183 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. By its complaint the plaintiff sought to enforce a lien for $1,535.10, the unpaid balance of the value of certain cement furnished by it to Webster-Mace Construction Company for use in, and used in, a building being erected by said Webster-Mace Company, as contractor, for E. W. Hopkins, as owner. The plaintiff alleged the making and filing for record of a contract between Hopkins and the Webster-Mace Company, and the abandonment of the contract and work thereunder by the contractor after partial performance on its part. The complaint sought to make a case under section 1200, Code of Civil Procedure, alleging that the value of the work and materials at the time of abandonment, measured by the rule of section 1200, exceeded the sums theretofore paid by the owner under the contract to a sufficient extent to cover plaintiff's claim. The defendant Hopkins in his answer alleged that he had at the time of abandonment paid the contractor more than the value of the work and materials then done and furnished. He did not deny the allegation of the complaint that he had made a contract with the Webster-Mace Company for the construction of the building. On the contrary, he alleged affirmatively that such contract had been made in writing, that it had been filed in the office of the county recorder, and that the contractor had thereafter commenced construction under the contract.

The court found that the plaintiff had furnished the cement as alleged by it, and that the sum of $1,348.65 was due it from the contractor and had not been paid. With regard to the contract between Hopkins and the contractor, the commencement and abandonment of the work, and the value of the work and materials already done and furnished, estimated by the standard of the whole contract price, the findings follow the allegations of the answer. It was further found that at the time of the abandonment the contractor had received from Hopkins under the terms of the contract the sum of $30,643.95, a sum in excess of the value of the work and materials already done and furnished. There was a finding, in accord with the averments of the answer, that Hopkins had fully complied with all of the terms of the contract on his part. As a conclusion of law the court found that there was no fund in the possession of Hopkins applicable to the payment of plaintiff's alleged lien, and that defendant Hopkins was entitled to judgment for his costs. Judgment was entered accordingly.

The appellant's first contention is that the findings are defective in that they do not show that the contract between Hopkins and Webster-Mace Construction Company complied with all of the requirements of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as that section read at the time of the making of such contract. It is argued that neither the defendant's answer nor the findings show that the contract was "subscribed by the parties thereto," or that it set forth "the names of all the parties to the contract, a description of the property to be affected thereby, together with a statement of the general character of the work to be done, the total amount to be paid thereunder, and the amounts of all partial payments, together with the times when such payments shall be due and payable." It may be remarked, in passing, that the only one of these requirements applicable was that the contract be subscribed by the parties. The other matters were demanded by the section only when a memorandum was filed in place of the contract itself. Snell v. Bradbury, 139 Cal. 379, 73 Pac. 150.

[1] But, apart from this, a party, in pleading a contract, is not called upon to negative the existence of every circumstance which might invalidate the contract. And the findings may follow the form of the pleadings. This is the settled rule with respect to allegations and findings of contracts within the statute of frauds. A finding that the contract was made imports that it was made in writing. McDonald v. Mission, etc., Homestead Ass'n, 51 Cal. 210; Emerson v. Bergin, 76 Cal. 197, 18 Pac. 264; McCann v. Pennie, 100 Cal. 547, 35 Pac. 158; Yoakum v. Kingery, 126 Cal. 30, 58 Pac. 324.

[2] So where the pleadings and the findings in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien declare, as they do here, that a contract was made, "it will not be presumed in such case without proof that the contract was void for want of filing or for any other reason." First Nat. Bank v. Perris Irr. Dist., 107 Cal. 55, 65, 40 Pac. 45, 48.

[3] But, even if there were a defect in the manner of pleading and finding the contract, the appellant is in no position to make the point. The Mechanic's Lien Law contemplated two alternative situations in foreclosure suits by laborers, materialmen, and subcontractors. Where there was a valid contract for the construction of a building, the liens of those claiming under the contractor were measured by the contract price or so much thereof as had not been duly paid to the contractor. Where there was no contract, or the attempt to make a contract had failed for want of compliance with the provisions of the Code, persons furnishing labor or materials had a lien for the value thereof, irrespective of the relations between the owner and the contractor. It was for the lien claimant to show by his complaint whether he was asserting a right against the unpaid part of the contract price due from owner to contractor, or was seeking recovery for labor and materials "deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner," in the absence of a valid contract.

> "In an action to enforce the lien of a mechanic or materialman, the complaint must show either that the building was constructed under a valid statutory contract, or that it was not; and a complaint upon the one theory will not warrant a judgment rendered upon the other." Reed v. Norton, 99 Cal. 617, 620, 34 Pac. 333, 334.

The complaint in this action was prepared upon the theory that there was a valid contract between Hopkins and Webster-Mace Construction Company. It alleged the making of a contract, the filing thereof, and the commencement of work thereafter. The allegations with reference to the value of the work and labor done and materials furnished at the time of abandonment, and payments theretofore made by the owner, were useful only for the purpose of showing the portion of the contract price applicable to payment of liens under section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure. These averments had no relevancy or purpose unless there was a valid contract. The answer proceeded upon the same basis, and the findings determined the rights of the parties in view of the making and recording of a valid contract.

[4] The appellant cannot now abandon the theory upon which it began its action, and demand a reversal upon the ground that the defendant did not plead, and the court did not find, with sufficient particularity the existence of the very conditions which the plaintiff had asserted as the foundation of its rights.

[5] The appellant objects, further, that the findings do not show that the payments made by the respondent to the contractor were due at the time they were made. There is nothing in the pleadings to suggest that plaintiff was claiming any rights by virtue of premature payments. But even if the issue were present, the findings would be sufficient to meet it. The court found that at the time of the abandonment the contractor had received from Hopkins "under the terms of said contract" the sum of $30,643.95; also that the defendant Hopkins had on his part fully performed everything agreed to be done or performed "by virtue of the terms of the contract between himself and Webster-Mace Construction Company, and in strict conformity with the terms thereof." This is, at least prima facie, a statement that the payments were made at the times when they should have been made under the contract.

[6] The final point made is that, since the Constitution gives a lien on property upon which labor is bestowed or materials furnished (Const. art. 20, sec. 15), the Legislature has no power to enact a statute which shall limit the lien claimant's recovery to the unpaid portion of the contract price. Whatever might be thought of this as an original question, it is no longer open or debatable in this court. In the recent case of Roystone Co. v. Darling, 171 Cal. 526, 154 Pac. 15, we reviewed the long line of decisions which had established in this state the soundness of the rule that:

> "If there is a valid contract, the contract price measures the limit of the amount of liens which can be acquired against the property by laborers and materialmen."

In the present case the portion of the contract price applicable to the payment of liens was fixed in accordance with the rule laid down in section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That the specific method provided by this section is not in conflict with the Constitution was expressly decided in Hoffman Marks Co. v. Spires, 154 Cal. 111, 115, 97 Pac. 152.

[7] The findings show that there was no unpaid portion of the contract price applicable to the payment of claimants who had furnished labor or materials to the original contractor. The conclusion of law that the defendant was entitled to judgment necessarily follows.

The judgment is affirmed.

GRAY v. COTTON et al. (Sac. 2581.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1917.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑780(1)—ORDERS APPEALABLE — RULINGS ON NEW TRIAL MOTIONS.

Since Code Civ. Proc. § 963, as amended in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 209), does not allow an appeal from an order denying a motion for new trial, an appeal from such order must be dismissed.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1237 — APPEAL BOND—JUDGMENT—NOTICE OF MOTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 942, requiring an undertaking for the stay of execution upon an appeal from a money judgment to stipulate that if the judgment appealed from, or any part thereof, be affirmed and the appellant fails to make payment thereof within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur in the court below, judgment may be entered on motion of the respondent in his favor against the sureties for such amount, and by signing such undertaking the surety consents to entry of judgment on motion, and no notice of the motion is necessary.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1237—SUPPLEMENTARY PROCEEDINGS—ENTRY OF JUDGMENT ON MOTION.

Where an undertaking on appeal was entered into and the judgment affirmed, the records and files were before the court for the purposes of motion to enter judgment, and formal introduction thereof in evidence was unnecessary.

4. NEW TRIAL 🔑2—RIGHT TO NEW TRIAL—MOTION PROCEEDINGS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 656, providing that a new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after trial and decision by jury, court, or referee, refers to issues of fact raised by ordinary pleadings, and not to questions of fact on motions, and proceedings for new trial do not lie to secure re-examination of the decision on a motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. 🔑2.]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑345(1)—PERFECTING APPEAL—TIME FOR NOTICE.

Where, after remand, judgment was entered on motion against the defendant and a surety on the undertaking on appeal, and the surety thereupon sought a new trial on the motion, a new trial being unauthorized thereon, his notice of appeal, more than 60 days after entry of judgment, was too late.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Harry J. Gray against E. J. Cotton, H. D. Rowe, and others. Judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, and Rowe appeals, and plaintiff moves to dismiss both appeals. Appeals dismissed.

Ostrander, Clark & Carey, of Oakland, for appellant. Butler & Swisler, of Sacramento, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this case on May 8, 1916, judgment was entered, on motion of the plaintiff, against H. D. Rowe, as surety in an undertaking given by him on behalf of the defendants, for the stay of execution upon an appeal taken by said defendants from a judgment against them for $7,443.70, made up of several items set forth in separate counts of the complaint. That appeal was successful only with respect to the first count. As to that item the judgment was reversed. As to the other items it was, in effect, affirmed, and the cause was remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment therefor against the defendants in favor of the plaintiff. Gray v. Cotton, 166 Cal. 130, 134 Pac. 1145. Upon the entry of this judgment against him on the motion as aforesaid, Rowe filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial of the motion. This proceeding was decided by the court below on July 29, 1916, the court denying said motion. Rowe filed notices of appeal both from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The respondent now moves to dismiss both appeals.

[1] 1. The amendment of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 209) to section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not allow an appeal from an order denying a motion for new trial. So far as that appeal is concerned, it is immaterial whether a motion for new trial would lie in the case of such a judgment or not. The appeal is unauthorized, and must be dismissed.

2. The notice of appeal from the judgment was filed on August 4, 1916, more than 60 days after the entry of the judgment. It was too late unless it is saved by the clauses allowing an appeal to be taken within 30 days after the termination in the trial court of proceedings on motion for new trial. Sections 939 and 941b. If the court below had power to grant a new trial of the proceeding by which the judgment against Rowe was given, the appeal from the judgment would be in time.

[2] Under section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure an undertaking for the stay of execution upon an appeal from a money judgment must stipulate that if the judgment appealed from, or any part thereof, be affirmed, and the appellant fails to make payment thereof within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur in the court below, "judgment may be entered on motion of the respondent in his favor against the sureties for such amount." The undertaking executed by Rowe contained this stipulation. The judgment in question was entered on motion as provided in said section and in said undertaking. By signing the undertaking on appeal the surety, Rowe, consented that judgment should be entered against him on motion for the amount as to which the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and waived notice thereof. No notice to him of the making of the motion was necessary. Meredith v. Santa Clara, etc., Co., 60 Cal. 621; Mowry v. Heney, 86 Cal. 477, 25 Pac. 17; Levy v. Magnolia Lodge, 110 Cal. 309, 42 Pac. 887; Hawley v. Gray Bros., 127 Cal. 560, 60 Pac. 437.

[3] The records and files in the case were before the court for the purposes of the motion. Formal introduction thereof in evidence was unnecessary. The court had to decide, and in this case did in fact decide, only the question of law, whether or not, upon the facts appearing in these documents, the plaintiff was entitled to the judgment against the surety. Meredith v. Santa Clara, etc., Co., supra.

[4] The provisions of the Code allowing a new trial to be ordered (sections 656 to 660, Code Civ. Proc.) follow immediately the provisions for the framing of issues, the trial and the decision of civil actions. "A new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after a trial and decision by a jury, court or referee." Section 656. This refers, of course, to the trials and decisions of the issues of fact in the civil actions and proceedings embraced in the preceding Code provisions, issues raised by ordinary pleadings, and it has no reference to decisions of questions of fact on motions. It is well settled that proceedings for new trial do not lie to secure the re-examination of the decision of a motion. Harper v. Hildreth, 99 Cal. 270, 33 Pac. 1103; Doyle v. Republican L. I. Co., 125 Cal. 15, 57 Pac. 667; Estate of Heywood, 154 Cal. 312, 97 Pac. 825.

[5] It follows that the attempt to obtain a new trial was unauthorized, and that the pendency and decision thereof did not extend the time for taking the appeal beyond the 60 days allowed where no motion for a new trial is instituted.

The appeals are dismissed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by J. H. Glenn against J. C. Rice. From a judgment for plaintiff for less than the amount claimed, plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

A. H. Sweet and Chas. H. Forward, both of San Diego, for appellant. E. Swift Torrance, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The complaint states a cause of action upon a promissory note for $1,350, executed by the defendant to J. C. Glenn and by him indorsed to the plaintiff, J. H. Glenn. The facts necessary to the decision of the case are stated in the findings.

J. C. Glenn, a real estate broker, as agent of the San Diego Construction Company, and also as the agent of the defendant, Rice, negotiated an exchange between them of a note of the construction company for a parcel of land owned by Rice. He acted, not as a middleman merely, but as the agent of each party. The exchange was duly carried out. Before its consummation the construction company agreed to pay Glenn $1,500 for his services as its agent, and Rice orally agreed to pay a like sum for Glenn's services as his agent. The construction company paid the sum it had agreed to pay, as aforesaid. Glenn owed Rice the sum of $150, which was deducted from the compensation agreed on. For the remainder Rice executed to said Glenn the note sued on.

The construction company did not know that said Glenn was acting as agent for Rice, or that he was to receive from him any remuneration. Rice, however, did know, prior to said exchange, that the construction company had agreed to pay Glenn $1,500, and with that knowledge he made his agreement to pay the like sum to Glenn, but he never expressly or otherwise waived any objection he might have to Glenn receiving the $1,500 from the construction company.

On September 12, 1913, the note was indorsed by J. C. Glenn to J. H. Glenn, the plaintiff, in consideration of $1,350 to be paid by J. H. Glenn, as follows: The sum of $600 in cash to J. C. Glenn; $400 to the American National Bank on the obligation ot J. C. Glenn to said bank; and $350 to George E. Hart upon the obligation of said J. C. Glenn to Hart. He paid the $600 in cash to J. C. Glenn at the time of the indorsement, but he did not pay and has not paid the remainder of the consideration. It does not appear that the plaintiff, at the time he purchased the note and paid the $600 thereon, had any knowledge of the facts relating to the double agency of J. C. Glenn toward Rice and the construction company, as above stated.

On these facts the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $600, with interest thereon and costs, and refused to render judgment for any larger sum. The plaintiff claims that he is entitled to recover the entire amount of the note.

The defendant claims that the facts relating to the double agency of the payee of the note for the two parties to the exchange render the obligation to pay compensation for the services against public policy and void.

[1] The authorities, with practical unanimity, declare that, if an agent is engaged by both parties to effect a sale of property from one to the other, or an exchange between them, not as a mere middleman to bring them together, but actively in inducing each to make the trade, he cannot recover compensation from either party, unless both parties knew of the double agency at the time of the transaction. The reason for the rule is that he thereby puts himself in a position where his duty to one conflicts with his duty to the other, where his own interests tempt him to be unfaithful to both principals, a position which is against sound public policy and good morals. His contract for compensation being thus tainted, the law will not permit him to enforce it against either party. It is no answer to this objection to say that he did, in the particular case, act fairly and honorably to both. The infirmity of his contract does not arise from his actual conduct in the given case, but from the policy of the law, which will not allow a man to gain anything from a relation so conducive to bad faith and double dealing. And the fact that the party whom he sues was aware of the double agency and of the payment, or agreement to pay, compensation by the other party, and consented thereto, does not entitle him to recover. He must show knowledge by both parties. One party might willingly consent, believing that the advantage would accrue to him, to the detriment of the other. The law will not tolerate such an arrangement, except with the knowledge and consent of both, and will enter into no inquiry to determine whether or not the particular negotiation was fairly conducted by the agent. It leaves him as it finds him, affording him no relief. The following cases declare these rules, although the list by no means includes all the cases so holding. Chapman v. Currie, 51 Mo. App. 43; Capener v. Hogan, 40 Ohio St. 203; Rice v. Wood, 113 Mass. 133, 18 Am. Rep. 459; Finnerty v. Fritz, 5 Colo. 175; Green v. Southern States L. Co., 141 Ala. 686, 37 South. 670; s. c., 163 Ala. 514, 50 South. 917; Skirvin v. Gardner, 36 Okl. 615, 129 Pac. 729; Sullivan v. Tufts, 203 Mass. 157, 89 N. E. 239; Lynch v. Fallon, 11 R. I. 311, 23 Am. Rep. 458; Meyer v. Hanchett, 43 Wis. 250; Rice v. Davis, 136 Pa. 441, 20 Atl. 513, 20 Am. St. Rep. 931; Bollman v. Loomis, 41 Conn. 582; Byrd v. Hughes, 84 Ill. 174, 25 Am. Rep. 442. The doctrine was also stated by this court in Berlin v. Farwell, 3 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 643, 31 Pac. 527. The case was not inserted in the official reports, but it has never been overruled.

No cases are cited by the respondent to the contrary. In Jauman v. McCusick, 166 Cal. 517, 137 Pac. 254, the plaintiff was suing for commission as agent for the exchange of real property, and it was said that his rights were not affected "by the fact that under the agreement commissions were to be paid by both parties to the proposed exchange," because the defendant had agreed to pay the commission to the agent with knowledge that he was also to receive a commission from the other parties, and he was not in a position to complain of the illegality of the transaction. On the face of the opinion it does not appear whether or not the other party to the exchange was also aware of the double agency. In fact, however, the record showed that both parties had knowledge thereof. The precise question before the court in the present case was not presented or considered. In Shepherd-Teague Co. v. Hermann, 12 Cal. App. 402, 107 Pac. 622, two justices of the District Court of Appeal say that the fact that the other party was also to pay a commission to the common agent would be no defense to an action against a defendant for such commissions if, when he executed the agreement, he knew of the agreement of the other party to pay commissions. Justice Cooper, concurring specially, stated the proposition to be that, if both principals knew all the facts and each agreed to pay the commissions, there could be nothing unfair in the transaction and both would be liable. In that case also the record shows that both parties knew of the double agency. Neither of these decisions is authority contrary to the rule above stated. In Clark v. Allen, 125 Cal. 278, 57 Pac. 985, it is said that the rule we have stated is sound, but that case was distinguished on the ground that the broker was acting merely as a middleman; his duty being complete when he brought the two parties to the trade together. Our conclusion is that the contract of the defendant to pay commissions to J. C. Glenn was against public policy and void, and that the note given in consideration thereof is consequently invalid. The note sued on reads as follows:

> "Thirty days after date without grace, for value received, I promise to pay to the order of J. C. Glenn at San Diego, Cal., thirteen hundred and fifty and no/100 dollars, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from date until paid, interest payable quarterly, and if not so paid to be compounded annually and bear the same rate of interest as the principal; and should the interest not be paid when due then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note; principal and interest payable in gold coin of the United States. Should suit be commenced, or an attorney employed to enforce the payment of this note I agree to pay an additional sum of ten per cent. on principal and accrued interest as attorney's fees in such suit. J. C. Rice."

[2] This note is negotiable in form. A negotiable instrument must be payable in money only, without conditions not certain of fulfillment, except the contingent agreement to pay attorney's fees and costs if suit be brought thereon. Civ. Code, § 3088. This note was payable at the end of 30 days from its date with no conditions not certain of fulfillment except the agreement to pay attorney's fees. This brings it within the definition of the Code. The provisions that the interest should be paid quarterly, and that, if not paid when due, the whole sum of principal and interest should immediately be due, at the option of the holder, does not change its character. The quarterly interest could not become due until at least 60 days after the maturity of the note itself, and hence that clause did not alter the positive character of the promise to pay the principal 30 days after date, and does not affect the character of the note as a negotiable instrument. The decisions in Meyer v. Weber, 133 Cal. 681, 65 Pac. 1110, and National Hardwood Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 1, 130 Pac. 881, are not inconsistent with the above conclusion.

[3] The plaintiff, having paid the $600 without notice of the invalidity of the note, is protected to the extent of that payment. But with respect to the remainder of the consideration agreed to be paid by him upon the purchase of the note his position is different. He was a purchaser in good faith only to the extent of the part of the price actually paid by him. Where a purchaser of an invalid note, after paying a part of the consideration and receiving the note, learns of its invalidity before paying the residue he agreed to pay, he cannot recover the full amount of the note, but only the amount paid by him before the discovery of its illegality. Hubbard v. Chapin, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 328; Dresser v. Missouri, etc., Co., 93 U. S. 92, 23 L. Ed. 815; Certain v. Smith, 53 Ind. App. 163, 101 N. E. 319. The same rule has been applied in this state to the case of one who purchases real property incumbered by mortgage not properly recorded, and who pays a part of the price before notice of the mortgage. In such case he is protected as to the amount paid, but takes subject to the mortgage as to the portion unpaid at the time he received notice thereof. Davis v. Ward, 109 Cal. 186, 41 Pac. 1010, 50 Am. St. Rep. 29; Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 45, 73 Pac. 803. The agreement of the purchaser to pay certain money upon the debts of the seller had no greater effect to make him an innocent purchaser than if he had agreed to pay it directly to the seller. It does not appear that he had entered into any transaction with the creditors whereby he was bound to pay them in any event, regardless of the validity of the note, and he can therefore set up his defense in answer to any suit such creditors may bring against him. Bank v. Gibson, 109 Cal. 199, 41 Pac. 1008; Henry v. Phillips, 163 Cal. 141, 124 Pac. 837, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 39.

The cases cited by plaintiff to the effect that the bona fide purchaser of a negotiable instrument may recover its full face value, although he paid much less for it, apply only where he pays, or becomes indisputably bound to pay the whole price before he discovers the facts which render the instrument invalid. They are not contrary to the established rule above stated.

To the extent of the $600 which he paid he is entitled to full protection, including the benefit of the agreement in the note to pay attorney's fees. The court should have allowed him 10 per cent. thereon as attorney's fees. To that extent the judgment was erroneous, and should be modified accordingly.

[4] The interest will, of course, run from its original date. It does not appear, however, that this point was urged in the court below, and the appellant should not recover the costs of appeal on account of such modification.

[5] In entering a judgment, it is not necessary to declare therein that it shall bear interest. It bears interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from its date by force of the law, and not by reason of any declaration it may contain to that effect. Civ. Code, § 1920; Code Civ. Proc. § 682. And such interest must not be compounded. The judgment appealed from was erroneous in declaring that the interest thereon at 7 per cent. should be compounded annually. Civ. Code, § 1920. Neither party is entitled to costs on appeal.

The judgment is modified so as to read as follows:

> "It is now, on this 12th day of November, 1914, considered by the court that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of $660, together with costs, taxed at $15.25."

As thus modified the judgment is affirmed, without costs of appeal to either party.

MAGEE v. MAGEE et al. (Sac. 2285.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑348(1)—Time for Appeal—Statute.

Where appeal from the judgment was taken within six months after entry, and the record does not show that any notice of such entry had been served on appellant, the appeal was within the time prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 941b, relative to the time of filing notice of appeal by the alternative method, and, under section 941c, concerning the effect of such an appeal, any question, including the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, may be reviewed, notwithstanding appellant may have had knowledge of the entry of the judgment.

2. Specific Performance 🔑28(1) — Definiteness of Contract.

A contract will not be specifically enforced unless its terms are clear, definite, and certain.

3. Contracts 🔑192 — Uncertainty — Construction—Agreement to Convey.

Where one brother agreed to give another land if the other would erect and furnish thereon a house for the occupancy of their parents, such contract was not uncertain, but was properly construed as meaning that the one would transfer the legal title to the other, though the word "convey" was not used in the conversations between the brothers.

4. Specific Performance 🔑41—Contracts Enforceable—Statute of Frauds—Part Performance.

It is no objection to specific performance of a contract to convey land that the agreement was not in writing, where the grantee has made valuable improvements on the property on the faith of the agreement and those claiming under him have gone into possession.

5. Specific Performance 🔑32(3) — Contracts Enforceable—Mutuality.

Specific performance of a contract whereby one brother agreed to give the other land if the latter would erect and furnish thereon a house for the occupancy of their parents will not be denied for want of mutuality where the grantee has performed in so far as possible, by building a house and permitting the parents to take possession.

6. Specific Performance 🔑75—Agreement Not for Continuing Acts.

Under Civ. Code, § 3386, providing that neither party to an obligation can be compelled specifically to perform it, unless the other party has performed or is compellable, where one brother agreed to give another a lot if the other would erect and furnish thereon a house for the occupancy of their parents, and the other brother erected and furnished the house, the first brother's contract to convey was not unenforceable on the ground that the second brother's obligation was an agreement for continuing acts or personal services, since the purpose that the parents should have a right of possession and enjoyment during their lives was given complete effect by the decree vesting a life estate in the surviving father.

7. Specific Performance 🔑114(2) — Complaint — Allegations — Consideration—Reasonableness.

A complaint for specific performance need not declare in the words of Civ. Code, § 3391, that there was "an adequate consideration for the contract," and that it was "just and reasonable"; the proper mode being to allege facts from which consideration and reasonableness appear.

8. Pleading 🔑8(4)—Conclusions—Consideration and Reasonableness of Contract.

Allegations that there was adequate consideration for the contract, and that it was just and reasonable, are objectionable as mere conclusions.

9. Specific Performance 🔑49(2) — Contracts Enforceable—Consideration.

A contract to convey land to the grantor's brother on the latter's agreement to erect and furnish thereon a house for the occupancy of their parents, which the grantee performed, was supported by adequate consideration to warrant specific performance.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckels, Judge.

Action by James Magee, Jr., against James Magee, Sr., and others. From a judgment for defendants on their cross-complaint, and from an order denying his motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order appealed from affirmed.

Theodore A. Bell, of San Francisco, for appellant. T. T. C. Gregory, of San Francisco, and Theodore W. Chester, of Sacramento, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. This action was brought to quiet title to a lot of land in the city of Vallejo. In their answer the defendants denied plaintiff's title, and set up, by way of further defense and as a cross-complaint, a state of facts in consequence of which, as they claimed, they were the equitable owners of the property or entitled to a conveyance thereof from the plaintiff. The court made findings in accordance with the affirmative allegations of the answer and cross-complaint, and entered judgment accordingly. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The respondents move to dismiss both appeals.

[1] The appeal from the judgment was taken within six months after entry. As the record does not show that any notice of such entry had been served upon the appellant, the appeal was within the time prescribed by section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure, and any question, including that of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, may be reviewed. Code Civ. Proc. § 941c. The fact that the appellant may have had knowledge of the entry of the judgment does not limit his time for appeal under the alternative method to 60 days from the date upon which such knowledge was brought home to him. Estate of Keating, 158 Cal. 109, 110 Pac. 109, relied on by the respondents, has no application to the taking of an appeal. That case turns upon the provisions of sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, creating a method of preparing a record on appeal. The language of section 941b is different, and under it the appellant's right to serve his notice of appeal within six months after entry of judgment is not cut down, except where written notice of the entry has been served upon him. Huntington Park Imp. Co. v. Park Land Co., 165 Cal. 429, 132 Pac. 760; Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Cal. Dev. Co., 168 Cal. 397, 143 Pac. 723.

It is probable that the appeal from the order denying a new trial was not taken within the time allowed by subdivision 3 of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as that section read at the time of the proceedings under review. The record does not, however, show all the data necessary to a definite determination of this point, and, since all the questions raised may be considered on the appeal from the judgment, we shall decide the case on the merits.

James Magee, Jr., is a son of the defendant James Magee, Sr., and a brother of the defendants Catherine Magee and Nellie Magee Murphy. Patrick Magee, who died in 1899, was a brother of the plaintiff, James Magee, Jr. The court found, in effect, these facts: Prior to 1895 James Magee, Sr., and his wife, the parents of James Magee, Jr., and Patrick Magee, were living in Ireland. The plaintiff and Patrick were living at Vallejo, in this state. Plaintiff was the owner of the piece of land here involved, having purchased the same for $500. He has never made any conveyance of the land, and the record title still remains in him.

James Magee, Sr., with his wife and minor children, came to California at the invitation of James, Jr., or Patrick, or both. The sons were apparently desirous of providing a home for their parents, and in June, 1895, Patrick agreed with the plaintiff James, Jr., that if the said James, Jr., would give or convey to Patrick the lot in controversy, he, said Patrick, would erect thereon a suitable home for his parents and would furnish the same at his own cost and expense. To this the plaintiff agreed. Thereafter, relying on said agreement, Patrick entered into a contract for the construction of a dwelling house on said property, and caused the house to be erected and furnished at his expense. Upon completion of the house the defendant James Magee, Sr., with his wife and daughters, entered into possession of the house and land. He and his daughters have remained in possession ever since, the mother having died in the meanwhile.

The court finds that at the time of the making of said agreement the real property was worth $500, that the cost of constructing the house exceeded $3,000, and that the cost of furnishing it was $700 or more. In 1899 Patrick Magee died intestate. His estate was administered in probate, and $^1/_{18}$ thereof was distributed to the plaintiff, $^{12}/_{18}$ to the defendant James Magee, Sr., and $^1/_{18}$ to each of the other defendants.

On these facts the court concluded and adjudged that the defendant James Magee, Sr., is the owner of a life estate in the said real property, and that he is the owner of $^{12}/_{18}$ of the remainder, that each of the defendants Catherine Magee and Nellie Magee Murphy is the owner of an undivided $^1/_{18}$ of the remainder, and that plaintiff is the owner of a like $^1/_{18}$. It is further adjudged that plaintiff convey to the defendants the title so adjudged to belong to them.

[2-4] The plaintiff attacks as unsupported the findings relative to the making of the agreement between himself and Patrick in June, 1895. The evidence is, to be sure, conflicting, but there was testimony to the effect that the agreement, as found by the court, had been made by the brothers. It is, of course, well settled that a contract will not be specifically enforced unless its terms are clear, definite, and certain. Agard

v. Valencia, 39 Cal. 292; Magee v. McManus, 70 Cal. 553, 12 Pac. 451; Stanton v. Singleton, 126 Cal. 657, 59 Pac. 146, 47 L. R. A. 334; Monsen v. Monsen (Sac. No. 2271) 162 Pac. 90, decided December 19, 1916. But we do not see that the contract found to have been made between the plaintiff and his brother Patrick is lacking in certainty or definiteness. Patrick was to erect on the land, and to furnish, a house for the use of the parents of the contracting parties, and in consideration of these acts the plaintiff was to convey the land to Patrick. It is true that the word "convey" may not have been used in the conversations between the brothers. But there was testimony that James said he would "give" Patrick the lot for the purposes named, if Patrick would make the expenditures referred to. In view of the surrounding circumstances, the court was justified in construing the language of plaintiff as meaning that he would transfer the legal title to Patrick.

It is no objection to specific performance that the agreement was not in writing. Patrick had made valuable improvements on the property on the faith of the agreement, and those claiming under him had gone into possession. This is enough to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Burlingame v. Rowland, 77 Cal. 315, 19 Pac. 526, 1 L. R. A. 829; Manning v. Franklin, 81 Cal. 205, 22 Pac. 550; Calanchini v. Branstetter, 84 Cal. 249, 24 Pac. 149.

[5] It is further urged by the appellant that the contract cannot be enforced for want of mutuality. The argument is that some of the obligations on Patrick's part still remain unperformed, and that these are of such a character that a court of equity could not specifically enforce them. If this position be sound, it will, no doubt, afford a sufficient answer to a demand for specific performance against the plaintiff. Civ. Code, § 3386; Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 404; Banbury v. Arnold, 91 Cal. 608, 27 Pac. 934; O'Brien v. Perry, 130 Cal. 526, 62 Pac. 927. The court found, and the evidence fully supports the finding, that Patrick had, during his lifetime, performed every part of his agreement that it was possible for him to perform. He had built and furnished the house, and has permitted the occupancy of it by his parents.

[6] But it is claimed that he was required to permit the further occupancy of the premises so long as the parents, or either of them, should live, and this, it is said, is an agreement for continuing acts or personal services, which a court of equity will not undertake to supervise or to enforce specifically. 36 Cyc. 584. There is, however, nothing in the agreement calling for any such acts or services. All that was contemplated was that the parents should have the right of possession and enjoyment during their lives, a purpose that could be given complete effect by the execution of a single paper on the part of Patrick, or his successors in interest. This purpose was fully met by vesting a life estate in the surviving husband and father, as was done by the terms of the decree.

[7, 8] Finally, it is argued that specific performance could not properly be decreed in this case for want of allegation and evidence that the plaintiff received an adequate consideration, and that the contract was, as to him, just and reasonable. Civ. Code, § 3391. Such pleading and proof has always been required in the chancery courts. It is not necessary, however, that the complaint for specific enforcement should declare, in the very words of the Code, that there was "an adequate consideration for the contract," and that it was "just and reasonable." These allegations, standing alone, would be objectionable as embodying the mere conclusion of the pleader. The proper mode of pleading is to set forth the facts from which the court may conclude that the contract is supported by an adequate consideration, and is, as to the defendant, fair and just. Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 171, 66 Pac. 231; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 87 Pac. 193.

[9, 10] The facts here alleged by the defendant and found by the court on satisfactory evidence are, we think, sufficient to show the existence of the equitable requisites. Taking into account the relations of the parties, the desire of the plaintiff and his brother Patrick to provide a home for their parents, the value of the land contributed by the plaintiff, the extent and value of the improvements furnished by Patrick, and the fact that Patrick could receive no pecuniary benefit from the land or from his expenditures until after the death of both of his parents, the court was fully justified in drawing the inference, implied in its decree, that the contract was fair and just as to the plaintiff, and that said plaintiff received, in the expenditures by Patrick and the provision for the parents, a consideration which was entirely adequate to support his agreement to contribute the lot. This was not the ordinary case of a sale of land for a money consideration alone. The transaction was one between brothers, bound by a common tie of filial duty, and seeking to benefit their parents, rather than to deal for profit. These were elements to be given due weight by the trial court, which is to exercise a sound discretion in determining whether, under all the circumstances, the contract was just, and the consideration adequate. O'Hara v. Lynch, 172 Cal. 525, 157 Pac. 608. It cannot be said that any abuse of discretion appears here.

No other points are made.

Ex parte ISCH. (Cr. 2053.)

1. Counties 🔑47—Legislative Powers—Board of Supervisors.

Except as affected by the initiative and referendum provisions of the law, the legislative power of a county is vested in its board of supervisors, and the board is vested with the right to exercise within the limits of its jurisdiction the entire police power of the state, subject to the control of general laws.

2. Counties 🔑55—Police Power—Constitution.

Const. art. 11, § 11, providing that any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, gives a county the right to determine what police regulations it will prescribe, and the only limitation upon the exercise of the power is that such regulations shall not be in conflict with the general laws of the state.

3. Intoxicating Liquors 🔑11—Power to Regulate—Counties—Police Ordinance—Validity—Statute.

Ordinance No. 168 of San Bernardino county, prohibiting the sale of intoxicants outside of municipal corporations and prescribing a penalty of fine not exceeding $600 or imprisonment in the county jail for not more than seven months, or both, is not violative of Pen. Code, § 19, providing that, except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by the Code, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in a county jail for not exceeding six months, or by a fine not exceeding $500, or both, since the section was not intended to declare a general rule limiting the power of counties, cities, and towns in the matter of prescribing penalties for the violation of regulations enacted under the authority conferred by Const. art. 11, § 11.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. 🔑11.]

4. Counties 🔑55—Limitation of Power to Prescribe Penalties—Statute.

If Pen. Code, § 19, were applicable, it could not reasonably be construed as a limitation on the power of local bodies in the matter of prescribing penalties, but simply as a law prescribing the penalty where a different punishment is not prescribed by the local body.

5. Counties 🔑55—Police Ordinance—Fixing Penalty.

County boards of supervisors, in enacting a police ordinance under Const. art. 11, § 11, are not required to so fix the penalty that the case shall come within the prescribed jurisdiction of the justices' court, or that it shall not come within the jurisdiction of the superior court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 71, 72; Dec. Dig. 🔑55.]

In Bank. Petition for writ of habeas corpus by Fred Isch. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody.

See, also, 162 Pac. 140.

Frank T. Bates, of San Bernardino, for petitioner. T. W. Duckworth, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The question presented by this proceeding is as to the validity of the provision of Ordinance No. 168 of San Bernardino county, prescribing the penalty for a violation of such ordinance. The ordinance is one enacted by the board of supervisors of that county, prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within the county outside of municipal corporations. The section prescribing the penalty is section 18, and is as follows:

> "Any person violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding six hundred dollars, or be imprisoned in the county jail of San Bernardino county for not more than seven months, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment."

The claim is that the board of supervisors exceeded its power in providing a penalty exceeding $500 as to fine and six months as to imprisonment. Section 11, art. 11, Const., reads as follows:

> "Any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

[1, 2] Except as affected by the initiative and referendum provisions of our law, which are in no way involved here, the legislative power of a county is vested in the board of supervisors thereof. As was said in Odd Fellows Cen. Ass'n v. San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 231, 73 Pac. 987, 988:

> "The power conferred by the Constitution in this respect, subject to the two exceptions, that it is local to the city, and that it is subject to general laws, is as broad as that of the Legislature itself" —and the board was vested with the right to exercise within the limits of its jurisdiction, to use the words of the case just cited, "the entire police power of the state, subject only to the control of general laws." Necessarily this constitutional provision gives to a county "the right to determine what police regulations it will prescribe, and the only limitation upon the exercise of the power is that such regulations shall not be in conflict with the general laws of this state." Ex parte Cheney, 90 Cal. 617, 620, 27 Pac. 436, 437. In no respect is it claimed that the ordinance before us is in conflict with any general law of the state, except in the matter of the penalty prescribed. Of course no claim can well be made that in the enactment of such police regulations the county or city may not provide for the enforcement thereof by prescribing a penalty for the violation thereof. The claim simply is that here the county had no power to impose the particular penalty prescribed. In view of the broad grant of power in the Constitution, this contention must necessarily be based on the claim that the penalty provision is in conflict with some general law of the state.

[3] It is claimed that it is in conflict with section 19 of the Penal Code. That section is as follows:

> "Except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by this Code, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding six months, or by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by both."

The preceding section (18) provides:

> "Except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by this Code, every offense declared to be a felony is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, not exceeding five years."

The Penal Code contains many provisions declaring various offenses felonies and misdemeanors without prescribing any penalty except as the same is prescribed in the sections we have quoted. These sections are contained in that part of the Penal Code which is entitled "Preliminary Provisions." To our minds their intent and scope are very clear. They manifestly refer only to offenses declared by the Code of which they are a part (the Penal Code), and were designed solely to provide a penalty for any such offense where no other penalty was specially provided therefor, and cannot reasonably be read in any other way. It certainly would not be reasonable to read them as showing an intention to prescribe the maximum penalty for offenses that might be declared by the Legislature by statutes not a part of any Code, or by provisions of the other Codes of the state, for which the Legislature might desire to provide a more severe penalty, as, of course, it would have the right to do. And yet such is the meaning that would have to be given to the section under the construction claimed for it, for it would then purport to apply to every offense as to which a different punishment was not prescribed by the Penal Code, whether the offense was or was not one declared by such Code. The mere fact that it could not avail against a later expression of the will of the Legislature as shown in some other statute declaring a particular offense and prescribing a different penalty therefor is not material in this connection, except as tending to show that those enacting the Code could not have intended any such futile effort. Manifestly they were talking solely about offenses declared "by this Code." Certainly nothing in the section furnishes a reasonable basis for a conclusion that it was intended thereby to declare a general rule, limiting the power of counties, cities, and towns in the matter of prescribing penalties for the violation of regulations enacted under the authority conferred by section 11, art. 11, of the Constitution. It is to be observed that section 19 of the Penal Code prescribes only a maximum penalty for the offenses to which it applies, thus leaving it within the discretion of the court pronouncing judgment to impose any penalty not exceeding that prescribed. If applicable to city or county ordinances, the section would preclude the fixing by city councils or boards of supervisors of any minimum penalty. It is a matter of common knowledge that many such ordinances do prescribe a minimum penalty, below which the court pronouncing judgment is not permitted to go, and it certainly has never been supposed that section 19, Penal Code, precludes such a course. In Ex parte Cheney, 90 Cal. 617, 27 Pac. 436, it was claimed that the penalty provision of an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco which prohibited the carrying of a concealed weapon, and by which the penalty was fixed at "a fine of not less than $250 and not exceeding $500," or imprisonment, or both, was invalid for the reason that the minimum penalty prescribed was "repugnant to and not in harmony with the spirit and letter of the law * * * of the state of California." Section 19 of the Penal Code was not mentioned, but it was substantially declared that the city had the power to make the provision as to a minimum penalty and the same was upheld. We are satisfied that section 19, Penal Code, is not applicable in the matter of city, town, and county ordinances.

[4] We are further satisfied that if it could be held applicable, it could not reasonably be construed as a limitation on the power of local bodies in the matter of prescribing penalties, but simply as a law prescribing the penalty where a different punishment is not prescribed by the local body. There is no decision in conflict with our views. Arfsten v. Superior Court, 20 Cal. App. 269, 128 Pac. 949, was decided upon the theory that the prosecution was under an ordinance prohibiting the carrying on of a business, without a license, the offense declared by section 435, Penal Code, and as to which the penalty was prescribed, of course, by section 19, Penal Code.

In Ex parte Solomon, 91 Cal. 440, 27 Pac. 757, it was held that an ordinance prescribing a minimum fine of $250, and a minimum imprisonment of three months for having lottery tickets in one's possession, when under the general law of the state such misdemeanors as conducting the drawing of a lottery, selling lottery tickets, etc., were punishable by fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, without any prescribed minimum, providing as it did a greater penalty than that provided by statute for kindred offenses, was not in harmony with the general laws of the state, and was therefore unreasonable and void. See, also, In re Ah You, 88 Cal. 99, 25 Pac. 974, 11 L. R. A. 408, 22 Am. St. Rep. 280. This ruling would prevent counties, cities, and towns from going to the possible extremes suggested by learned counsel for petitioner. But it can have no effect in the case at bar for the simple reason that the legislative enactment known as the Local Option Law (Stats. 1911, p. 599), a kindred law of the state, prescribes the same maximum penalty.

[5] That by reason of other provisions of our Constitution and statutes the jurisdiction in cases of violation of the ordinance is in the superior court instead of in the justices' court simply because the punishment may exceed six months' imprisonment and $500 fine, we regard as altogether immaterial to the question before us. There is nothing in our law expressly or impliedly requiring boards of supervisors to so fix the penalty that the case shall come within the prescribed jurisdiction of the justices' court, or that it shall not come within the jurisdiction of the superior court. The penalty being prescribed, the law determines the matter of jurisdiction of the offense.

We see no reasonable ground upon which it may be held that the provision assailed is in conflict with any general law of the state, or against public policy. The same conclusion was reached by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District in People v. Fages (App.) 162 Pac. 137.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of San Bernardino county.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑70(1)—CONTRACTS FOR EMPLOYMENT—COMPENSATION—CONSTRUCTION.

A contract for services requiring payment of a monthly salary, and providing that, if the plant were sold, the employé should receive 6 per cent. of the profits obtained by reason of such sale in addition to his salary, which contract was for a period of five years, the servant was entitled to a sum equal to $250 per month for five years, plus 6 per cent. of the profits, and sale during the five years did not terminate his right to the salary.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑40(3)—CONTRACTS FOR EMPLOYMENT—COMPENSATION—CONSTRUCTION.

Under such contract, where a sale was negotiated within five years and the servant continued to work for the new company, the mere fact that checks for his salary were those of the new company did not show that the contract for employment with the original company had ended.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑39(1), 40(2)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action by a master to reform contract of employment, wherein it was an issue under the cross-complaint whether the servant had continued the work satisfactorily after a sale of the business, it was error to exclude evidence showing failure of the servant to comply with the contract and to refuse amendment of the master's answer to the cross-complaint, to embrace such issue.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the W. F. Boardman Company against Thomas D. Petch. Judgment for defendant on his cross-complaint and order denying plaintiff's motion for new trial, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

William C. Crittenden and William A. Nunlist, both of San Francisco (Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. McGowan & Westlake, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The appeal is from a judgment in favor of defendant on a cross-complaint and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

On January 28, 1911, plaintiff and defendant entered into the following contract:

"The parties of the first part are the owners of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company, with its principal place of business in the town of Medford, Oregon, and have furnished the entire capital for the erection and completion of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company. * * * The parties of the first part agree to pay the party of the second part the sum of $3,000 per year, in installments of $250 per month for the term of five years from the first day of February, 1911, ending the first day of February, 1916; or if the party of the second part does not begin actual services in Medford at that time, then it is to begin at the date at which the said second party begins actual services in taking charge of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company, but in all events the said party agrees that his services will not begin later than March first, 1911, and as much earlier as he can get away from present position.

"In addition to the salary above mentioned, the parties of the first part agree to pay the party of the second part six per cent. of the net profits received by the parties of the first part on the sale of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company, should said sale be made on or before the expiration of five years from the date of the signing of this contract."

Then follows a stipulation as to how the net profits shall be computed if the property is sold within the five years, and, if not sold within said period, how an appraisement shall be made and the increase in the value of the property determined upon which as actual profits shall be computed 6 per cent. which the party of the second part shall receive. The first party then agrees to deliver to the said second party, or his heirs, at the time of said sale, this 6 per cent. in cash, or, if the property has not been sold, in stocks or bonds.

"In consideration of the above agreement party of the second part agrees to devote his time, attention and ability to the management of the property mentioned, by using every effort in his power to make it successful.

"In the event of disagreement between both parties, or inability through sickness on the part of the party of the second part to the performance of his duties as general manager the above contract is to be settled by arbitration in the same manner described theretofore.

"It is understood and agreed that the party of the second part is to have the entire management in outlining the conditions under which this property is to be operated, being under the jurisdiction and control of the following parties, namely: J. R. Anderson, Geo. H. Eckert and W. F. Boardman, or their successors.

"The party of the second part has entered into a five-year agreement with the Rogue River Valley Gas Company on January 18, 1911. This contract includes all terms and provisions in the above five-year agreement, and is made to cover all points and stipulations in same, or in other words, is to take the place of said agreement."

The said contract of January 18th, it may be said, provided for the employment of said party of the second part for the same time and at the same salary as said agreement of January 28th, as manager and superintendent of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company, but there was no reference to any sale of the property. The defendant commenced his services as said manager about February 15, 1911. The property then consisted of a high-pressure gas plant located near Medford, Or., and was supplying gas to the towns of Medford, Phœnix, Tallant, and Ashland, all of which, except Medford, were very small towns, a few miles apart. The whole cost of the property was $126,778.65. The entire property was thereafter, on June 3, 1911, sold to the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, not for cash, but said company issued to plaintiff in exchange for its rights 195 bonds of the newly organized company of the par value of $1,000 each, and in addition gave as a bonus with each bond 15 shares of its stock of the par value of $100 each. As a part of this sale consideration, the plaintiff agreed to supervise, for the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, the property purchased, which agreement it has been carrying out. After procuring the property in question the Oregon Gas & Electric Company commenced the development and construction of other gas properties in the towns of Roseburg and Grants Pass, Or., where, theretofore, neither the Rogue River Valley Gas Company nor the plaintiff had ever had any property. In order to do this work and to improve the old property the company sold 155 additional bonds for $139,500 in cash, which was used for said purpose. On March 23, 1912, defendant was discharged from his employment. This action was commenced by the plaintiff to reform said contract of January 28, 1911, so as to conform to the understanding of the parties:

(1) "That the said monthly sum of two hundred and fifty dollars should be paid and accepted as payment and in full for all services rendered and to be rendered by the defendant to the said Rogue River Valley Gas Company." (2) "That the services for which plaintiff was to be liable to the defendant were the services which the defendant was to render the Rogue River Valley Gas Company."

As to that issue, the court granted a nonsuit, from which no appeal was taken. The defendant filed an answer and cross-complaint, asking for damages upon two grounds, namely: (1) For 6 per cent. of plaintiff's profits from the sale of the property of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company; and (2) for a wrongful discharge. The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict rendered for defendant for the sum of $19.323.22. A new trial was sought by plaintiff, and the trial judge made a conditional order reducing the verdict to $13,992.84, without specifying any ground for the diminution. Defendant agreed to the reduction, and the motion for a new trial was denied. At the trial plaintiff admitted that the defendant's share of the profits at the time, including interest, approximated $3,313.80, and filed its written offer to allow defendant to take judgment for $3,500.

What we have said is taken from the opinion rendered by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District.

In view of the condition of the pleadings, the theory on which the case was tried, and the concessions to that effect contained in the briefs of both parties, it must be taken as a conceded fact that there was a sale on June 3, 1911, of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company property within the meaning of the contract, and that thereby defendant became entitled as of that date to 6 per cent. of the net profits received by plaintiff on such sale, in cash. At the trial it was admitted by plaintiff that defendant was entitled to receive on this account, including interest, the sum of $3,313.80. Consideration of the record has satisfied us that there is therein no substantial evidence warranting the award of a larger amount on this account. In our opinion, any conclusion of a greater actual profit to plaintiff than $48,721.35 would be based only, as the record now is, upon the merest conjecture and surmise. Defendant was entitled to 6 per cent. on this amount, with interest thereon from the date of sale to the date of verdict.

Justification for the amount of the judgment in excess of $3,313.80 must be found, if at all, in defendant's right to his compensation under the contract for his services from March 1 to March 23, 1912, when he was discharged, and to damages for his alleged wrongful discharge on that date and plaintiff's refusal to pay him the specified $250 per month from that date to February 15, 1916, his employment having commenced February 15, 1911.

[1] It is earnestly urged that under the contract all right on the part of defendant to be paid $250 per month terminated with the sale of June 3, 1911. The theory, of course, is that the contract shows, as it in fact does, that it was one contemplating personal service on the part of defendant in connection with the property of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company, and that it was the intention of the parties that a sale of that property within the five years should, ipso facto, terminate defendant's rights in so far as the payment of $250 per month was concerned, leaving him with a right only to 6 per cent. of the profits obtained by plaintiff by reason of such sale. We are unable so to read the contract. As the contract itself shows, the parties were stipulating, with a possible sale of the property within five years in mind, and expressly provided for such a contingency. This being the situation, plaintiff agreed in so many words to pay defendant $3,000 per year, in installments of $250 per month "for the term of five years," and to pay "in addition to" this 6 per cent. of the net profits on a sale of the property within five years, and in the event that no sale was made within that time, 6 per cent. of the actual profits of the concern at the end of such five years. In other words, defendant was to receive, in consideration of his part of the contract, $250 each month for a term of five years, together with 6 per cent. of the net profits of plaintiff in the event of a sale within five years, or, if no sale be made within that time, 6 per cent. of the profits of the concern at the end of the five years. In consideration of this undertaking on the part of plaintiff, defendant agreed "to devote his time, attention and ability to the management of the property mentioned, by using every effort in his power to make it successful." If by reason of a sale of the property it followed that there was no longer any property to the management of which for the benefit of plaintiff he could devote his time, attention, and ability, the obligation of plaintiff to pay the stipulated sum was nevertheless in no way impaired or lessened. Authorities to the effect that when parties contract upon the assumption of the continued existence of a given person or property or of certain circumstances, and the person or property ceases to exist or the circumstances change, the obligation is at an end, are not in point, for here the parties did not contract upon any such assumption. As written, the contract plainly shows the intention we have stated, and there is nothing in the circumstances appearing in evidence to indicate any other intention, or that the contract, so construed, is at all absurd or even unreasonable. In fact the circumstances tend to support rather than to operate against such construction, and certainly the conduct of the parties until the time of defendant's discharge was in line with such a construction. No one appeared to have supposed that defendant's rights or duties under the contract terminated with the sale. The evidence indicates that plaintiff was in control of the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, the vendee, and that defendant continued as general manager, under the terms of the contract between himself and plaintiff, until the date of his discharge.

The five-year term actually commenced February 15, 1911. Defendant was paid only to March 1, 1912. This left 47½ months for which he was not paid, which, at $250 per month, would have yielded $11,875. He received from another source for personal services, $1,400, leaving a balance of $10,475, as prima facie, the amount of damage. There is nothing in the evidence to support a larger award on this account.

It thus appears that there is evidence fully supporting an award to defendant of $3,318.80, plus $10,475, an aggregate of $13,793.80, where as he was given by the modified judgment $13,992.84, an excess of $199.04. We can find no sufficient support in the evidence for this excess.

Defendant's undertaking under the contract was "to devote his time, attention and ability to the management of the property mentioned by using every effort in his power to make it successful." Any right of plaintiff to terminate the relation between itself and defendant within the five-year term was necessarily limited by the language of this provision. As long as defendant did what he had agreed to do, give his time, attention, and ability to the management of this property and use every effort in his power to make it successful, no ground existed for a repudiation of its part of the contract by plaintiff.

An examination of the record has satisfied us, as it did the District Court of Appeal, that the evidence sufficiently supports the conclusion in favor of defendant in this regard, in so far as the particular property owned by the Rogue River Valley Gas Company prior to the transfer is concerned.

[2] As we have seen, immediately after the sale, the new company, the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, commenced the development and construction of other gas properties in Roseburg and Grants Pass, to be operated in conjunction with the property received from the Rogue River Valley Gas Company. Plaintiff was largely interested, if not indeed the controlling factor in the new corporation, and until the time of his discharge defendant acted as "general manager" of all the properties, receiving his monthly $250 in checks of the new corporation. While, in view of the issues made by the pleadings and the theory on which the case was tried, it must be held, as we have seen, that there was a "sale" of the property within the meaning of the provisions of the contract entitling defendant to a certain percentage of the profits in the event of a sale, there can be no question, in view of the evidence, that it was the understanding of both plaintiff and defendant that defendant was entitled and required under the contract to continue his services in the management and development of the property. The mere fact that the checks for his salary were checks of the new corporation does not detract in the slightest degree from the evidence in this regard. Defendant's contract was for the management and development of the gas plant of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company for the benefit of plaintiff. If without any sale, that company, by increasing its available capital by means of the issuance of bonds and additional stock, had extended its operations so as to include Grants Pass and Roseburg territory, there can be no question that the additional properties would have been a part of the property referred to in the contract as to which defendant's services and management were required. So far as the property was concerned, this was what was substantially done. The Rogue River Valley Gas Company property was transferred to a new corporation, in which plaintiff was very largely interested, which, with the aid of additional capital, proceeded to develop the plant by including Roseburg and Grants Pass territory within its operations.

[3] Much can be said in support of the theory that, in view of the circumstances, defendant's obligations to plaintiff, under the contract, extended to the whole property operated by the new corporation, including the Roseburg and Grants Pass additions. These were practically simply by way of development of the original plant. The trial court, however, excluded much evidence offered to show a failure on the part of defendant to comply with his part of the contract in so far as the Roseburg and Grants Pass extensions were concerned, on the theory that the same was not within the issues made by the pleadings, because such extensions were not a part of the property referred to in the contract. Complaint is made of the rulings in this regard. Whether this complaint be well based or not, it appears that plaintiff sought to amend its answer to defendant's cross-complaint to obviate the objection that such evidence was not within the issues. As stated by the District Court of Appeal, the desire of plaintiff was to show that, if the original contract was not extinguished by the sale, "it was modified or virtually superseded by an executed parol agreement of the parties, considerably enlarging the scope of the written one, with the effect that defendant 'became obligated to manage the new property at Grants Pass and Roseburg as well as the original property at Medford, Oregon.'" Upon objection being sustained to testimony in so far as Roseburg and Grants Pass were concerned, plaintiff asked leave to amend the answer in this regard, and later renewed the motion, and the court denied the application, on the ground that it came too late. At the conclusion of the introduction of evidence, plaintiff again moved the court for its permission to amend its answer to the cross-complaint, "in order to make the said answer conform to the evidence introduced at the trial in this action, and also in order to plead more definitely a subsequent executed oral agreement on the part of the defendant and the plaintiff." This application was denied. As to this the District Court of Appeal, in deciding this case, said:

> "We cannot resist the conclusion that the court unduly restricted plaintiff in its efforts to establish one vital defense upon which it relied. It may be admitted that its original answer is somewhat defective, but it does appear therein that the original contract was superseded by an employment of defendant by the said Oregon Gas & Electric Company, and that by the latter he was discharged for cause. From evidence received without objection it also appears that defendant was employed by said company to manage its plant at various places, including said Grants Pass and Roseburg, but when evidence of his mismanagement at these points was offered, an objection was sustained on the ground that it was not within the issues. Immediately, plaintiff requested to amend the pleading, but was denied the privilege. The matter was one of great importance to appellant, and involved the consideration of a complete trial upon the merits.
> "It would certainly be better, ordinarily, if such motions were not opposed. It may be that counsel for appellant should have been more careful in framing their original pleading, but it is hardly necessary to say that the rigor of the old rules of pleading has been greatly relaxed, and the effort of courts is and should be directed to the end that the cause, if possible, may be fully tried and determined.
> "Respondent was manifestly awarded $10,000, in round numbers, as damages for his discharge. If he was wrongfully discharged, he is entitled to it, but the door should have been open for the fullest investigation as to whether under the original engagement or an added or substituted obligation there was ample justification. If said showing had been made, the result might have been, of course, the same. Of that we cannot say, but the consideration to which we have adverted is so vital that we think a new trial should be had.
> "There was, indeed, as we have seen, some evidence of the theory contended for, including the declared misconduct of defendant at Grants Pass and Roseburg, but a complete showing was not permitted, and, besides, the court withdrew that consideration entirely from the jury."

Full consideration has satisfied us that this is correct, and we adopt the same as a part of this opinion.

We do not deem it necessary for the purposes of a new trial to consider any other point made by plaintiff on this appeal further than to say that the real question in regard to the right of plaintiff to terminate the relation existing between it and defendant, as it attempted to do, is whether defendant failed to devote his time, attention, and ability to the management he had assumed, and used every effort in his power to make the property successful. Such was his undertaking.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

SUTTMAN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 8166.)

1. DIVORCE 🔑161—INTERLOCUTORY JUDGMENT—VACATION OF—STATUTES.

In view of Civ. Code, § 131, providing that neither party may dismiss divorce action after entry of interlocutory judgment without other party's consent, the court had no jurisdiction to vacate such a judgment merely at wife's request without notice to or consent of husband, wife's request not being made under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing for review of final judgments, this being the only method provided by law, and it was immaterial that the judgment was in her favor, or that husband had suffered default.

2. JUDGMENT 🔑381—VACATION OF—VOID ON FACE.

Where an order of court is void upon its face, it can be vacated at any time by the court on its own motion.

3. DIVORCE 🔑161—INTERLOCUTORY JUDGMENT—VACATION OF—AFTER DEFAULT.

Where a husband had been defaulted in a divorce action, he nevertheless had authority under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing for review of final judgments, to object to the vacation of an interlocutory decree entered against him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 522-526; Dec. Dig. 🔑161.]

In Bank. Application by Julia M. Suttman for a writ of review prayed for against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and Hon. John J. Van Nostrand, Judge of said court. Application denied.

Jos. L. Taaffe, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an application for a writ of review, the object being to obtain the annulment of an order of the superior court, purporting to vacate a previous order which purported to vacate an interlocutory judgment previously given in a divorce action, declaring the plaintiff therein to be entitled to a divorce.

The action was one in which defendant husband had failed to appear, and his default had been entered. The interlocutory judgment was regularly given and entered. Some three months thereafter the plaintiff wife asked the court to make its order setting aside the interlocutory judgment, her application stating simply that she "is desirous of setting aside the interlocutory decree," etc., and not in any sense being an application for relief under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. On October 26, 1916, the superior court made its order purporting to grant the application and to vacate, annul, and set aside such judgment. All this was done without notice to or consent of the defendant husband. On December 23, 1916, the superior court made an order on the application of the defendant husband vacating, annulling, and setting aside the order of October 26, 1916. The last named order is the one here sought to be reviewed.

[1] We are satisfied that the order of October 26, 1916, was in excess of the jurisdiction of the court. In view of our statutory provisions, the interlocutory judgment provided for by section 131, Civil Code, is, when regularly entered, subject to be modified or vacated only in some way provided by law for the modification or vacating of final judgments. The character of such an interlocutory judgment in this regard is fully shown by what is said in Claudius v. Melvin, 146 Cal. 257, 79 Pac. 897. It is final except against such attack as is expressly authorized by statute. It is subject to be vacated on appeal, or on motion for a new trial, or by proceedings under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure (Claudius v. Melvin, supra), or in any other way that may be expressly authorized for the review of final judgments. There is no statutory provision authorizing the superior court to vacate a valid interlocutory judgment for divorce which has been regularly made and correctly entered simply because one of the parties desires it to be vacated, even though that party be the one in whose favor the judgment was given. It is expressly provided in section 131, Civil Code, that:

> "After the entry of the interlocutory judgment, neither party shall have the right to dismiss the action without the consent of the other."

Pending entry of final decree the interlocutory judgment can be affected only in some way provided by statute for its review, and with the lapse of one year from the date of its entry, in the absence of some authorized review, either party becomes entitled to have a final decree entered in accord with its terms. See Claudius v. Melvin, supra. It is immaterial in this connection that the defendant suffered default.

[2, 3] The facts stated herein are fully set forth in the petition of the wife to this court for a writ of review. They show that the order of October 26, 1916, was in excess of the jurisdiction of the superior court. Even if we assume that such order is not void on its face, void in the light of such record as is available on a collateral attack thereon (in which event it could be vacated at any time by the court on its own motion [People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 Pac. 651]), nevertheless the superior court undoubtedly had jurisdiction to entertain and grant the application of the defendant, made under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, within six months after such order was made, that such order be vacated. There is no doubt in our minds that in view of the provisions of our statute such defendant had such standing as entitled him, notwithstanding his default, to insist on the integrity of the interlocutory decree and its immunity from such action as was attempted by the order of October 26, 1916.

The application for a writ of review is denied.

LIMONEIRA CO. et al. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA.

1. Waters and Water Courses ⚷257(1)—Public Water Company—Regulations—Mutual Ditch Company.

A mutual water company, supplying water to its stockholders to be used on their lands, which takes its water from a corporation operating a ditch as a public utility, occupies the same position as any other consumer taking water from the ditch, and the rental charges against it are equally subject to public regulation.

2. Waters and Water Courses ⚷257(1)—Public Water Company—Regulation—Contract.

Under the provision of the Constitution of 1879 that the use of all water appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution is a public use, subject to the regulation and control of the state in the manner to be prescribed by law, and that the right to collect compensation for the use of the water is a franchise, which cannot be exercised, except by authority and in the manner prescribed by law, a contract for the rental of water from a ditch company, made after the adoption of the Constitution, does not affect the right of the state thereafter to regulate the charges for the delivery of the water contracted for, since the power to prescribe rates is a necessary incident of the power of regulation, and such power is a continuing one, which may be exercised at any time.

3. Constitutional Law ⚷154(2)—Impairing Contracts—Regulation of Water Rates—"Impairing Obligation of Contract."

The exercise by the state of the power reserved in its Constitution to regulate the rental charges for the distribution of water after the execution of a rental contract does not impair the obligation of the contract, within the meaning of the federal Constitution, where the state has not surrendered to the public utility involved by the contract any portion of its regulatory power.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 461–473; Dec. Dig. ⚷154(2).

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Impairing Obligation of Contract.]

4. Waters and Water Courses ⚷253—Appropriation—Character of Use—Reservation from Conveyance.

A corporation, engaged as a public utility in appropriating water for distribution and sale, cannot, by reserving from a conveyance of all its property the right to water used on the lands of its sole stockholder, with right of way for the flow of such water through the ditch, divest that water of the public use imposed on it by the Constitution, or deprive the Railroad Commission of power to fix the charges for the delivery of the water.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. ⚷253.]

5. Public Service Commissions ⚷6—Jurisdiction—Determination of Facts.

Under the provisions of Const. art. 12, § 22, and the Public Utilities Act (St. Extra Sess. 1911, p. 18), giving the Railroad Commission jurisdiction to regulate a public utility by fixing rates, the Commission has power, subject to review by the court, to determine the validity of asserted rights of property which affect the exercise of its jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Service Commissions, Dec. Dig. ⚷6.]

In Bank. Original petition for certiorari by the Limoneira Company and others against the Railroad Commission of California, to annul an order fixing rates to be charged by the Santa Clara Water & Irrigating Company, in so far as it affected petitioners. Order of the Commission affirmed.

George E. Farrand, of Ventura, Andrews, Toland & Andrews, Lewis W. Andrews, Thos. O. Toland, A. V. Andrews, and E. M. Selby, all of Los Angeles, Don G. Bowker, of Ventura, and Hiatt & Selby, of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding in certiorari looking to the annulment, in so far as it affects petitioners, of an order fixing the rates to be charged by the Santa Clara Water & Irrigating Company, hereinafter referred to as the Santa Clara Company, admittedly a public utility subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission. The Santa Clara Company, having passed a resolution raising the rate to be charged by it to 25 cents per miner's inch, except as to water under contract at a lower rate, applied to the Railroad Commission for an order declaring the proposed rate reasonable and making it effective. The proposed rate in no way affected either Limoneira Company, a corporation, which was receiving through the ditches of the Santa Clara Company 200 inches of water, claiming by virtue of certain contracts and under the right to have the same delivered by the petitioner company free of charge or the Thermal Belt Water Company, hereinafter styled the Thermal Belt Company, which was receiving 200 inches under a lease for the consideration of $800 per annum. These companies were made parties to the proceeding before the Railroad Commission, together with the Farmers' Ditch Irrigating Company, hereinafter styled the Farmers' Ditch Company, the alleged owner of the 200 inches that were being delivered to Limoneira Company; the Limoneira Company being the sole stockholder of said Farmers' Ditch Company. The order of the Commission fixed a rate of 20 cents per miner's day inch for all consumers except the Limoneira and Thermal Belt Companies, and fixed as the rate to be paid by each of them annually the sum of $2,000. It is the portion of the order purporting to affect these companies that is complained of. We do not understand that any question is raised as to the reasonableness of the rate so fixed, in the event that the Commission had the power to fix any rate at all so far as these companies are concerned. The claim is that, under the circumstances shown by evidence free from conflict, the Commission was without power to prescribe any rate at all as to the Limoneira Company, or any other rate than $800 per annum as to the Thermal Belt Company.

At first glance the facts appear to be very complicated, but consideration thereof makes it possible to state what we believe to be the material facts in such a manner as to clearly show in comparatively few words the real questions involved. The Santa Clara Company owns and controls two separate and distinct systems for selling and distributing water for irrigation purposes, one on the southerly side of the Santa Clara river, in Ventura county, which it owned and operated for many years prior to 1905, and the other on the northerly side of said river, which it acquired in 1905 from Leopoldo Schiappa Pietra, who had acquired it in 1904, apparently for the company. The Limoneira Company and the Thermal Belt Company are served by the northerly system, and we are not concerned here with any question as to the water served by means of the southerly system.

The system on the north side of the river was known as the Farmers' Ditch. It was inaugurated somewhere about the year 1871 by a few settlers for the irrigation of their lands; the water being diverted on the north side of the river and conveyed through ditches. The record furnishes practically no information as to terms and conditions upon which water was furnished prior to the year 1896, but there is nothing to indicate that the use was not the same prior to that year that it was in 1896 and subsequently. The record is apparently destitute of information as to the owners prior to the year 1896, or the quantity of water claimed or actually diverted from the river to the ditch prior to that year. We have merely the fact that about the year 1871 the ditch was at least partially constructed for the purposes of some 17 settlers on the northerly side of the river, and that some water was furnished for irrigation by means of the same. In 1896 we find that the system was owned by one Lisle, who then leased it to E. Nichols and C. A. Belyea, who operated it purely as a public utility for two or three years, furnishing water for a compensation to those under the ditch who desired it. They were then diverting and delivering between 400 and 500 inches. In 1898 Lisle caused the Keystone Mining, Manufacturing, Land & Power Company to be incorporated, and it became the owner of the system, Nichols continuing in charge for the corporation, which operated the property in the same way as Nichols and Belyea had done under their lease; i. e., as a means of selling and distributing water for a compensation. This company in 1898 entered into the first contract with the Thermal Belt Company for 200 inches of water, the same to be delivered through the ditches of the system at the pumping plant of the Thermal Belt Company to be erected on the ditch, for an annual rental or sum. The instrument purported to be a lease for a term of years of such water and the right to have the same diverted from the river and carried through the ditches to such point. The Thermal Belt Company was and is a mutual water company, supplying water to lands above the ditch. In the instrument the Keystone Company covenanted that it was the owner and had the right to divert from the river, and was distributing, at least 1,500 inches of water, and that it was a portion of such waters that it was contracting to deliver. The Farmers' Ditch Company was then organized as a corporation, and the Keystone Company conveyed to it all of its property. It was provided in the articles of incorporation that one of the purposes was:

> "To divert, take, convey, have, buy, sell, use, distribute, supply * * * water for any and all beneficial uses, and erect, construct and maintain waterworks of every kind and nature and water pumping plants."

This company (Farmers' Ditch) in 1901 entered into an agreement with one Clarice H. Ramsey by which it purported to demise and let to her a continuous flow of 200 miner's inches during the irrigating season, for ten years, at $200 per year, the same to be delivered at any point on the ditch designated by her where she chose to locate her pumping plant. In 1903 the Farmers' Ditch Company entered into the contract with the Thermal Belt Company under which the latter bases its claim herein. It was practically a renewal of its former contract with the Keystone Company, except that it was for a term expiring October 31, 1942, and the annual rental or charge was $800. On September 1, 1904, the Farmers' Ditch Company conveyed all of its property to Schiappa Pietra, the deed containing a purported reservation which is material in determining the claim of the Limoneira Company, and which will be discussed hereafter. On April 15, 1905, Schiappa Pietra conveyed the property to the Santa Clara Company, which has ever since operated it. An examination of the record leaves us in no doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant the conclusion of the Commission that up to the time of the conveyance to Schiappa Pietra the various owners of the Farmers' Ditch system were engaged solely as a public utility, appropriating for distribution and sale within the meaning of our constitutional provision all of the water diverted and carried through their ditches, and that the Thermal Belt Company and Mrs. Ramsey were simply consumers from a public service water company, differing from the other consumers only in the fact that they had contracts for a term of years at specified rates. This has continued to be the situation ever since the conveyance to Schiappa Pietra and the Santa Clara Company, except as to the 200 inches of water contracted to be furnished Mrs. Ramsey and material in the matter of the Limoneira Company claim, which we shall discuss separately.

There is nothing to compel a conclusion that there was any new appropriation of water to enable the utility to satisfy the requirements of these contracts, and certainly nothing to fairly support a conclusion that there was any private appropriation for the benefit of particular lands or particular consumers. The public utility continued to take waters to which it claimed to be entitled, for purposes of distribution and sale. Of course, the addition of its two new consumers may have made it essential for it to actually take and carry through its ditches more water than it had originally taken and carried; but in no sense did it do this as a private agency of these consumers, and, as we have seen, it was taking only water of which it then claimed to be the owner and which it had the right to divert, and distribute and sell, and it was taking it for the purpose of distribution and sale. If the contract with the Thermal Belt Company be construed as one contemplating the use of the water on the particular lands supplied by that company, or even as giving that land the right to receive water for permanent and continuous use for irrigation, it "would not technically attach it to the land as an appurtenance," and "would do nothing more than bring the land within the territory to which the public use extended, and establish its status as land permanently entitled to share in the public use." Leavitt v. Lassen Irr. Co., 157 Cal. 89, 91, 106 Pac. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213. The same is true as to the Ramsey contract. Of course, it is entirely immaterial who were the stockholders of the Farmers' Ditch Company, or even that Mrs. Ramsey was the sole stockholder, except as to shares held by others merely to qualify them as directors.

It may be added that no special reliance is apparently placed by learned counsel on the fact that the ditch was at least partly constructed and some water diverted prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1879. The record is such that it does not appear how that fact can possibly be material to any contention made by petitioner here. There is no basis in the record for any conclusion as to the amount of water actually diverted prior to 1880.

[1] This being the situation, the question as to the Thermal Belt Company is a very simple one, in view of our well-settled law. The fact that it is a mutual water company, supplying the water it obtains to its stockholders to be used on their lands, does not make it any the less a consumer, with the rights and subject to the obligations of the other consumers. It occupies the same position precisely as does a single individual taking water from the utility for the irrigation of his lands, and the fact that it represents a combination of several persons is immaterial here. It is one of "the public" that is being served by the public utility.

[2] The only difference between it and the other consumer was that it had a contract for a term of years at a fixed, discriminatory rate. But it cannot now be questioned that this contract, made in the year 1903, was subject to the power of the state to practically annul it in so far as the prescribed rate was concerned in the regulation of the public use. Ever since 1879 our Constitution has provided:

> That "the use of all water now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated, for sale, rental, or distribution, is hereby declared to be a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the state, in the manner to be prescribed by law," and also that "the right to collect rates or compensation for the use of water supplied to any county, city and county, or town, or the inhabitants thereof, is a franchise, and cannot be exercised except by authority of and in the manner prescribed by law."

The power to prescribe the rates at which water devoted to public use shall be furnished is, of course, a necessary incident of the power of regulation possessed by the state, for the purpose, among others, of preventing discrimination between persons entitled to the benefit of the use, and insuring to such persons the furnishing of the water to which they may be entitled upon fair and reasonable terms. It is a continuing power that may be exercised at any time, regardless of any attempted contract existing between the public utility and a consumer. We are speaking, of course, with reference to appropriation of water and contracts made since 1879, for the exigencies of this case require no consideration of alleged rights of an earlier date. Any such contract, although not in violation of any existing law or regulation when made, was necessarily made subject to this continuing power of the state to so affect it, just as much so as if the contract had contained a provision expressly making it so subject. No preferential right as to rates to be paid for the use of any part of the water devoted to public use can be so created by contract between the parties as to be immune from such regulation by the state. The effect of the provisions of our own Constitution in this regard is so exhaustively and clearly stated in Leavitt v. Lassen Irr. Co., 157 Cal. 82, 106 Pac. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213, where our earlier decisions are reviewed, as to render further citation or discussion unnecessary. See, also, Penney & Boyle Co. v. L. A. Gas etc. Co., 168 Cal. 12, 18, 141 Pac. 820, L. R. A. 1915C, 282, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 471; Southern Pacific Co. v. Spring Valley Water Co., 159 Pac. 865.

[3] The uniform course of decision of the United States Supreme Court on questions similar in principle precludes any claim that the exercise by the state of the power to thus affect such an existing contract as that here involved impairs the obligation of a contract within the meaning of the federal Constitution. We are speaking, of course, of a situation where the state cannot be held as matter of fact to have surrendered to the public utility involved, by something tantamount to a contract between it and the public utility, any portion of this regulatory power, which is the situation here. The Railroad Commission has been vested by the state with this power of regulation, and the contract of the Thermal Belt Company cannot be held to prevent the exercise of that power in so far as the fixing of the rate to be paid by it is concerned.

[4] The Limoneira Company's claim to be served with the 200 inches free of charge is, to our minds, equally untenable, though it depends on facts of a somewhat different nature. The Limoneira Company is the successor of Mrs. Ramsey, the owner of the lands formerly owned by her and supplied with water under her contract of lease, and also the sole stockholder of the Farmers' Ditch Company. It is claimed that the ownership of the right to this water never passed to Schiappa Pietra, or his grantee, the Santa Clara Company, but remained in the Farmers' Ditch Company, and that all that the Santa Clara Company acquired in connection therewith was its obligation to divert and convey its water through its ditches to the pumping plant and there deliver it to be carried to the lands to be supplied. This claim is based on the attempted reservation in the deed to Schiappa Pietra, to which we have already referred, and the covenants of the grantee in connection therewith. Save and except for this attempted reservation, the deed of the Farmers' Ditch Company was an absolute conveyance of all its water and water rights, and claims thereto, in and to the waters of Santa Clara river and Santa Paula Creek, their branches, sloughs, and tributaries, its right to divert water therefrom, its right to use, own, sell, rent, distribute, etc., said water and water rights, its works, ditches, etc., and all other property owned by it; in other words, a grant of its whole system and all property and rights owned by it in connection therewith, "excepting and reserving" only—

> "subject to the terms, covenants, and conditions herein contained, unto the party of the first part, its successors and assigns forever, out of and from the water and water rights and other property above described, such a quantity of water of the waters of the Santa Clara river that when the same shall be diverted by means of the dams and head works herein mentioned and shall be conducted from said Santa Clara river by means of the water ditch, ditches, conduits, and flumes herein mentioned to the pumping station situated in the northwest corner of subdivision 18 of the Rancho Santa Paula y Saticoy, and hereinafter more particularly described, it shall produce or measure 200 inches of water at said pumping station, and the right to divert said amount of water hereby excepted and reserved from said Santa Clara river; also excepting and reserving a right of way and easement in, along and through the water ditch and dams, head works, conduits, ditches, and flumes, and over and along the rights of way above described, to divert said quantity of excepted and reserved water from said Santa Clara river, and to convey and conduct the same or any part thereof from said point of diversion to said pumping station, together with a right of way and easement in said ditches, flumes, and conduits herein mentioned for conveying whenever necessary the waste or surplus of and the waste or surplus incident to the handling of the water hereby excepted and reserved, from said pumping station to the place where the main ditch or conduit of the water system above described crosses or shall cross the place usually called the 'Wheeler Canyon' or 'Todd Baranca.' The party of the first part does for itself, its successors and assigns forever, hereby covenant and agree to and with the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns forever, that the 200 inches of water herein excepted and reserved by and to the party of the first part and to its successors and assigns shall and may be used and sold, leased, or rented for irrigation, domestic, and stock purposes and for other lawful uses and purposes by the party of the first part, its successors and assigns, for use upon, but not elsewhere than upon, the following lands."

Then follows a description of what are known as the "Olive Lands" and certain portions of the Limoneira ranch. Then follow covenants to the effect that the grantee, Schiappa Pietra, shall maintain the system and deliver the water, and if such is not done the party of the first part, the grantor, may do so at the expense of the grantee. It is further agreed that the existence of the contract between the Farmers' Ditch Irrigating Company and the Thermal Belt Water Company, of the 1st day of September, 1903, be recognized, and that all rentals, rights, and advantages secured to the party of the first part are granted, sold, and assigned and transferred to the party of the second part. The party of the second part undertakes to perform the obligations of the party of the first part to the Thermal Belt Water Company. It is further agreed that the lease of the Farmers' Ditch Irrigating Company with Clarice H. Ramsey of December 9, 1901, expiring on the 9th day of December, 1911, shall continue to be held and the burdens and responsibilities thereof shall continue to be assumed and borne by the party of the first part. And the party of the first part covenants to save harmless Schiappa Pietra, the party of the second part, from any and all of the conditions and provisions contained in said lease. Apparently the consideration given by Schiappa Pietra for the transfer was $33,000, the obligations assumed by him being the continued delivery of the water and the payment of the $33,000, and in return he received the rent of $800 per year from the water sold to the Thermal Belt Water Company and all the other water of the system.

On the 15th day of April, 1905, Schiappa Pietra conveyed all of the property theretofore acquired from the Farmers' Ditch Irrigating Company to the Santa Clara Water & Irrigating Company for the sum of $33,995. The same reservation was made in this conveyance from Schiappa Pietra to the applicant herein as was made in the conveyance to Schiappa Pietra. Upon this, Limoneira Company, now the sole stockholder of the Farmers' Ditch Company, claims to be entitled to the delivery of this water without charge. In view of the facts of the case, as we have heretofore stated them, the case of Leavitt v. Lassen Irr. Co., 157 Cal. 82, 106 Pac. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213, appears to be conclusive against the claim. The property and rights attempted to be reserved were simply a part of property devoted wholly to public use, an inseparable part of the system owned by the grantor, the Farmers' Ditch Company, exclusively devoted to that use. Certainly the instrument of conveyance was drawn with great care and ability in an effort to carve a private right of ownership out of this public use as to a part of the property devoted to public use, for the benefit of the Farmers' Ditch Company and its then sole stockholder, Mrs. Ramsey. The difficulty is that such a thing could not be accomplished under our law by the parties to this transaction. This case cannot be distinguished on the facts from Leavitt v. Lassen Irrigating Company, supra. There Leavitt, granting his water system, attempted to make a reservation of the right to take water for the irrigation of his ranch. Mr. Justice Henshaw said, in an opinion concurred in by all the members of the court except Chief Justice Beatty:

> "Treating Leavitt's appropriation as being wholly and entirely for public use, he, the owner of the system, was but an instrumentality for the distribution of the waters which he gathered to such members of the public as might apply for them and pay to him the legal charge for the service that he rendered. As the agent of such a public use, he had no power whatsoever to reserve to himself for his private purposes any part of this water. If he could reserve a part, he could reserve all, and thus, by his ipse dixit, convert a public use into private ownership; or, if he could reserve a part for himself, he could with equal authority give away parts of the supply to others, and by this method destroy what the constitution itself has declared shall forever remain a public use."

And again:

> "If * * * the facts should be that he did not make such private appropriation, his attempted reservation of a private right out of a public trust, as above stated, would be futile and void."

In the case at bar it is clear that the attempted reservation was solely for the purpose of creating a private right for the lands of Mrs. Ramsey, which it is claimed has now been fully accomplished. The Railroad Commission had full support in the record for its conclusion that the attempted reservation was futile and void, and that the whole property passed to the grantee.

[5] A large part of the briefs of learned counsel for petitioner is devoted to discussion of a claim that the Railroad Commission was without jurisdiction to determine any question as to the validity of petitioner's asserted rights of property in regard to the waters claimed by them in good faith. In view of the provisions of our Constitution and the Public Utilities Act, and our decisions thereunder, we do not see how it can be doubted that the Railroad Commission had the power to determine for the purposes of the exercise of its jurisdiction to regulate a public utility by the fixing of rates, subject to such power of review as is possessed by this court, all questions of fact essential to the proper exercise of that jurisdiction. And, of course, as said in Palermo Land & Water Co. v. Railroad Commission, 160 Pac. 228, "Wherever a court or board is authorized to act upon the existence of a certain state of facts, it has jurisdiction to determine the existence or nonexistence of the requisite facts," and "its jurisdiction cannot be affected by the circumstance that these facts are denied." The opinion in the case just cited sufficiently answers the claims of petitioner in this regard.

We find in the briefs no other objection meriting discussion.

The order of the Railroad Commission is affirmed.

EDMUNDS v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO. et al. (L. A. 3878.)

1. EVIDENCE 🔑174(1)—SECONDARY EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

A carbon copy of a letter written and sent by plaintiff's counsel to counsel for defendant was admissible without previous notice to defendant and demand for production of the original, where plaintiff's counsel produced a letter which was apparently an answer to the carbon, and testified that up to the date of the receipt of such answer he had written defendant but one letter, of the body of which the offered carbon was a correct copy.

2. TRIAL 🔑252(8)—INSTRUCTION—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

In an action for personal injuries inflicted by defendant's special policeman, where the evidence did not show a ratification by the defendant of the agent's acts, an instruction on ratification of the employé's act in assaulting plaintiff and defendant's liability in punitive damages was not justified.

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT 🔑170(4)—UNLAWFUL ACTS OF AGENT—RATIFICATION.

Although a person may ratify the oppressive acts of an agent, and failure to discharge such agent may be evidence tending to show ratification, the omission to dispense with the services of the offender, unsupported by any other circumstances indicating the employer's approval of his course, does not establish ratification, and where it is not shown that the employer had an opportunity to investigate, failure to discharge is not even an element of proof of ratification.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑330(3)—TORT OF SERVANT—RATIFICATION—EVIDENCE.

In an action for personal injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff by defendant's special policeman, evidence held not to show an opportunity on the part of defendant to investigate its agent's acts or subsequent conduct by which the defendant approved his alleged acts of oppression.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1066—REVIEW—REVERSIBLE ERROR.

In an action for personal injuries inflicted by defendant's special policeman, where the verdict was not segregated into items of punitive and other damages, and the actual injury was small, and there was no evidence justifying punitive damages, an instruction authorizing punitive damages was reversible error.

6. EVIDENCE 🔑471(17)—OPINION EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILTY.

In an action for personal injuries inflicted on plaintiff by defendant's special policeman in ejecting plaintiff from defendant's premises, where one of the issues was whether the officer used more vigorous measures than were necessary to eject plaintiff, it was error to permit a witness to submit his opinion on the subject.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by Edward G. Edmunds against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company and another. From a judgment against the named defendant and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, it appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

U. T. Clotfelter and M. W. Reed, both of Los Angeles, Rollin Laird, of Crescent City, and A. H. Van Cott, of Los Angeles, for appellant. R. H. Wilson and M. S. Platz, both of Bakersfield, and E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company (a corporation) appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff, Edward G. Edmunds, was engaged in the business of selling newspapers in the city of Bakersfield. He had been ordered by John Lambert, a special policeman in the employ of the appellant corporation, not to offer for sale or to sell papers at the station or on the right of way of the company in Bakersfield. The officer, on the theory that Edmunds had violated this order, forcibly ejected him from the right of way. Edmunds brought suit for damages against Lambert and the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company. Later the complaint was dismissed as to Lambert and the San Joaquin Valley Railway Company, appellant's lessor, was substituted as a party defendant. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict for $4,000 as damages was returned against appellant alone; the court giving judgment accordingly.

Appellant insists that the evidence shows without contradiction that no more force than was necessary was used to eject plaintiff from its premises, but we think there was a substantial conflict of testimony regarding the amount of force used. The verdict is also attacked as excessive and several other reasons are urged for reversal, but we need not consider all of these in detail, as we must reverse the judgment and order because of misdirection to the jury.

[1] The court permitted the plaintiff to introduce in evidence without previous notice to appellant and demand for a production of the original, a carbon copy of a letter written and sent by plaintiff's counsel to one of the counsel for the Santa Fé Company. The ruling was based upon the fact that plaintiff also produced a letter written by Mr. Camp, appellant's solicitor, which was apparently an answer to one written by plaintiff's counsel who testified that up to the date of the receipt of Mr. Camp's communication he had written to the company but one letter, of the body of which the offered carbon was a correct copy. The ruling was proper and is supported by the authority of Pratt v. Phelps, 23 Cal. App. 755–757, 139 Pac. 906. The letter from plaintiff's counsel to a representative of the railway company was dated August 12, 1911, and purported to be a description of the attack upon Mr. Edmunds by the special police officer. It gave the date of the occurrence as August 9th. It is not necessary to produce the letter in its entirety. Suffice it to say that it graphically described an attack by a powerful man upon one who was physically his inferior, and who was suffering from the results of a railroad accident. There was a denial that at the time of the occurrence Mr. Edwards was selling papers on the company's property. The letter also contained the following language:

> "For these injuries and indignities we expect the company to stand responsible. * * *
> "In the utmost good part we are laying this matter before you just as it is. If you think you can defeat us with these facts satisfactorily proven, we cannot agree. Otherwise we hope to arrive at an adjustment and speedy settlement."

Mr. Camp's reply, which was very brief, was as follows:

> "Mr. R. H. Wilson, Attorney at Law, Fish Building, Bakersfield, Cal.—Dear Sir: Yours of the 12th inst., addressed to the legal department, has reached my hands. I am making some investigation in regard to the matter, but as Mr. Lambert, the special officer, is away on a short vacation, I shall hardly be able to get his side of the story before the 1st of September. I am assured that there is another and very different side to the story and I certainly hope that Mr. Edmunds will not attempt to sell papers on our premises where he has been forbidden to peddle them, and I assure you that all necessary force will be used at any time to prevent the forbidden action. Yours truly, E. W. Camp, Solicitor."

[2] This correspondence is very important in view of certain instructions given by the court. The jurors were instructed that, if Lambert acted with oppression or malice towards plaintiff with the approval or ratification of his employer, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company, they might give, in addition to actual damages, an award of smart money or punitive damages. They were also instructed as follows:

> "If you believe from the evidence that John Lambert, while acting as the servant of the defendant Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company, in the general scope of his employment, used oppression or malice in the alleged assault upon plaintiff at the time and place alleged in his complaint, and that the attention of defendant was called to such oppressive or malicious assault, and that it had the means of verifying the truth of such charge, and thereafter retained said John Lambert in its employ, then you are instructed that said defendant ratified the act of said Lambert, and it is liable to plaintiff in punitive damages by way of example in addition to any actual damage that you may find plaintiff has suffered."

[3, 4] This instruction was not justified by the evidence, nor is it a correct statement of the law. It is undoubtedly true that a principal may ratify and approve the oppressive acts of an agent and that failure to discharge such agent may be evidence tending to show ratification, but the omission to dispense with the services of the offender, standing by itself and unsupported by any other circumstances indicating the employer's approval of his course, is never sufficient to establish ratification. By continuing the wrongdoer in his service after knowledge or opportunity to learn of the misconduct and by other acts, the principal may become an abettor of the oppression, and may make himself liable in punitive damages. In this case the evidence shows that upon receipt of the letter from plaintiff's representative the railroad company's solicitor promptly promised a thorough investigation of the matter upon the return of the police officer from his vacation. It is not shown that after the offer to treat with the railroad company for the purpose of reaching an adjustment of Mr. Edmund's claim out of court any other negotiation was had between the parties prior to the commencement of the action, which, according to counsel for appellant, was some ten days prior to September 1st, the date mentioned by Mr. Camp as the probable time of Lambert's return. The record does not show definitely the time of the filing of either complaint, but certain it is that plaintiff did not show an opportunity on the part of the employer to investigate its agent's acts and its subsequent conduct by which that corporation approved his deeds of oppression if any were committed. No proofs were furnished, so far as the record shows, nor were the names of the many alleged witnesses given to Mr. Camp or to any other representative of the railroad company. Under these circumstances the failure to discharge the special officer was not even an element of proof of an approbation, indorsement, or ratification of his acts. If a plaintiff in a case such as this wishes to charge a principal with vindictive damages, he should inform the principal of the facts before commencing the action, and should give him an opportunity of redressing the wrong. The mere notification of the principal of the claim of the injured person is not enough. There should be, in addition to this, time and opportunity for investigation. Foley v. Martin, 142 Cal. 256–264, 71 Pac. 165, 75 Pac. 842, 100 Am. St. Rep. 123.

[5] The instruction was obviously very injurious to appellant. The verdict was not segregated into items of punitive and other damages, but, in view of the admitted fact that plaintiff was incapacitated for his usual work only a few hours following the alleged brutality of the policeman, there can be small doubt that at least a portion of the verdict of $4,000 was intended by the jury as punishment for the wrong which the jurors believed had been inflicted upon plaintiff.

[6] In view of the possibility of another trial, we need only review one other alleged error. One of the witnesses was permitted to testify that in his opinion Mr. Lambert used more force than was necessary. This was error which will doubtless not occur at another trial. One of the issues before the jury was whether or not the officer was using more vigorous measures than were necessary to eject plaintiff from the premises. It was error to permit the witness to submit his opinion on this subject. Raynor v. Railway Company, 129 N. C. 195, 39 S. E. 821; Zube v. Weber, 67 Mich. 54, 34 N. W. 264; Kendall v. Limberg, 69 Ill. 358.

The judgment and order are reversed.

CERTIORARI 🔑10—ORIGINAL APPLICATION TO SUPREME COURT — PRIOR APPLICATION TO APPELLATE COURT.

Where an application had been made to the district court of appeal for a writ of review, and had been denied by that court, petitioner cannot apply to the Supreme Court for a similar writ, but must petition therein for hearing of the proceeding in the court of appeal.

In Bank. Petition by William Snyder against J. A. Plummer, as Judge of the Superior Court, for a writ of review. Petition denied without opinion, and application for rehearing denied.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. In denying a rehearing it is proper to state that the petition for a writ of review was denied because it showed on its face a prior application to the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District, and a denial by that court. This barred a new application for such a writ to this court; the only remedy of petitioner being a petition for hearing in this court of the district court of appeal proceeding.

CERTIORARI 🔑5(1) — ORDERS REVIEWABLE — APPEALABLE ORDER.

The Supreme Court will not grant a hearing after decision by the district court of appeal on petition for certiorari to review an order of the superior court made after final judgment, from which order an appeal lies under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, so that certiorari will not lie under section 1068, authorizing certiorari when there is no appeal nor plain, speedy, and adequate remedy.

PER CURIAM. In denying the petition for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District, we deem it proper to say that the denial is made solely for the reason that the order of the superior court sought to be reviewed is a special order made after final judgment, and is therefore one from which an appeal lies. Petition by the Pacific Coast Casualty Company to review the proceedings of A. J. Pillsbury and others, constituting the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California, in the matter of the application of Mrs. J. Cassell to recover compensation for the death of Simon Cassell under the Workman's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279). Writ granted, and action of the Commission annulled. Petition for rehearing denied.

T. T. C. Gregory, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Chris M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of review directed against the Industrial Accident Commission by the petitioner, who is the insurer of the Simon Millinery Company of San Francisco, which company was the employer of one Simon Cassell, an errand boy, who was killed in an elevator accident during the time of his employment by said company.

The facts of the case as disclosed by the record are briefly these: The deceased, Simon Cassell, entered the employment of the Simon Millinery Company as an errand boy about one month prior to the accident in which he met his death. The place of business of the Simon Millinery Company was in the Lincoln building, situate near the corner of Fifth and Market streets in said city. There were several passenger and freight elevators in said building. The tenants in the portion of the building fronting on Market street used chiefly the freight and passenger elevators near the entrance to said building on said street. There was also a freight and passenger elevator chiefly used by tenants in that portion of the building fronting upon Fifth street, and it was in the freight elevator near the Fifth street entrance that the deceased met with the accident which caused his immediate death. On the 3d day of September, 1915, the deceased was directed by his employer, the Simon Millinery Company, to go to a certain place on Mission street and obtain some piping. He went upon said errand, and returning with the piping attempted to enter the building and ascend to the floor upon which his employer had its place of business by way of the freight elevator near the Fifth street entrance, and in so doing to operate the elevator himself. In some manner not made very clear by the evidence he was crushed and killed in the attempt to thus operate this elevator.

There was evidence introduced before the commission that upon entering the employment of the Simon Millinery Company the deceased had been expressly warned not to ride in or attempt to operate the freight elevators under penalty of immediate discharge. There was also some evidence before the commission tending to show that notices were posted at or near the entrances to both freight elevators in the building warning persons against attempting to operate or ride in them without the presence of the regular operator of said elevators. There was also some evidence before the commission that these warnings or notices had been occasionally disregarded by certain of the employés of the Simon Millinery Company, and that upon several occasions the errand boys had ridden up and down in the freight elevators of the building in violation of the express warning and instruction not to do so.

[1, 2] We have examined the record carefully for the purpose of determining whether there is any evidence therein that these instances of the disregard of the instructions and warnings on the part of its employés were ever brought to its notice, and as to whether or not there is any evidence showing that the employer was derelict in not taking notice of the fact that its orders were being disobeyed by its employés; but upon such examination we have failed to find any evidence whatever of any such knowledge on the part of the employer, or of any such negligence on its part from the fact of which such knowledge would be chargeable. This being so, we are of the opinion that the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission "that the deceased and other employés of the defendant frequently operated said Fifth street elevator by themselves without reproof or discipline by said defendant," and also the finding "that the signs placed by the owners of said building upon the doors of the elevators were habitually disregarded without protest," and also the finding "that the protection of its employés from serious bodily injury or death in connection with the operation of such elevators was not made plain to them nor to Cassell in a manner suited to the intelligence of a person of his age," are without evidence to support them, and are contrary to the evidence in the case; and that, since these findings of fact were essential to the recovery of the applicant before the Industrial Accident Commission, the action of that body in awarding such compensation without any evidence sufficient to sustain said findings was beyond the jurisdiction of the commission, and hence that a writ of review would properly lie, and that such writ should issue, and that the action of the commission in awarding such compensation should be annulled.

It is so ordered.

On Petition for Rehearing.

[3] The petition for rehearing is denied. We are of the opinion that the undisputed evidence in the case showed that the deceased had been expressly warned not to ride in, or attempt to operate, the freight elevators in the building in which he met his death, under penalty of discharge and that notices were posted at, or near, the entrance of such elevators of similar import, and that the disregard of such warning by the employé must, in the absence of evidence mitigating such disobedience, be held to constitute such willful misconduct as would prevent a recovery before the commission, where, as in the instant case, there is no evidence tending to show that the disregard of its warnings, orders, and notices was condoned by the employer.

BURKETT v. DOTY. (Civ. 1543.)

1. Assignments 🔑137 — Delivery—Presumptions.

As Civ. Code, § 1055, declares that there is a presumption that an instrument was delivered on the day of its date, the delivery of a written assignment is sufficiently established by plaintiff's production of the same at trial; it appearing that plaintiff had previously had the instrument recorded.

2. Bills and Notes 🔑310 — Validity — Transfers.

That a grantor did not deliver possession of notes assigned to the grantee does not affect the validity of the transfer; the instrument not being rendered executory because no actual delivery was made.

3. Sales 🔑1(2)—Transfer of Possession —Necessity.

A sale of personal property is good as between the parties whether possession be delivered or not; want of delivery rendering it void only as to creditors and subsequent purchasers.

4. Wills 🔑89—Validity — Testamentary Instruments.

An assignment of notes which provided that it should not be recorded until the grantor's death was duly executed and delivered to the assignee. After the assignor's death it was recorded and the assignee claimed the notes. Civ. Code, § 1054, declares that a grant takes effect upon delivery, while section 1056 declares that a grant cannot be delivered to the grantee conditionally. Held, that as the assignment was delivered it conveyed a present interest, and was not testamentary in its character; the purpose of recordation as shown by Civ. Code, §§ 1213, 1217, being to serve notice on other persons, and so the provision withholding the instrument from record did not affect its character.

5. Evidence 🔑392—Parol Evidence Rule —Admissibility.

Where a written assignment showed the conveyance of an immediate present interest, parol evidence contradicting its terms is inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1733–1735½; Dec. Dig. 🔑392.]

6. Gifts 🔑4—Validity—Consideration.

Where a gift inter vivos is perfected by delivery of possession or delivery of a deed of gift, it is complete, though unsupported by consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gifts, Cent. Dig. §§ 3, 17; Dec. Dig. 🔑4.]

7. Evidence 🔑419(8) — Parol Evidence Rule—Consideration.

While the recitals of consideration in a written instrument are not conclusive as to the amount or character of the consideration when those matters are in issue, evidence of want of consideration or of a different consideration is not admissible to vary and defeat the covenants by which rights are expressly stated, and hence an assignment of notes duly executed cannot be defeated by proof that the recitals of consideration were untrue.

8. Principal and Agent 🔑72 — Conversion By Agent—What Constitutes.

The holder of notes having assigned them, directed her agent to procure them, and she indorsed the notes, and the agent, negotiated one note. After the holder's death and his appointment as administrator of the holder's estate, the agent took up the note and refused to surrender it to the assignee. Held, that the agent was guilty of a conversion, and could not defeat recovery on the theory of agency.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Emma M. Burkett against W. M. Doty. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, and Lon Bond, of Chico, for appellant. Guy R. Kennedy, of Chico, and W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for the conversion of a promissory note executed September 25, 1911, for $1,395.85 by Harry Harrington to Nellie Mead Doty, the then wife of defendant. This note was the first of a series of three notes executed and delivered by Harrington to Mrs. Doty each of the same date and for the same amount and secured by mortgage. The conversion is alleged to have occurred April 1, 1912.

Defendant answered: Denied that plaintiff was on that day or at any other time the owner or entitled to the possession of said note or of any moneys due or to become due thereon; alleged that in the month of March, 1912, Nellie Mead Doty was the owner of said note, and by her direction defendant cashed the same at the Sacramento Valley Bank of Biggs, and thereafter in said year and prior to her death, at her request and direction, he applied the proceeds of said note to her use and benefit to the extent of about $1,000; that said Nellie Mead Doty died on the 18th day of July, 1912, and thereafter, to wit, on April 7, 1913, defendant was duly appointed administrator of her estate; that all the moneys realized from said note and not expended for the benefit of said Nellie during her life were received by defendant as such administrator and not otherwise, and he has since retained possession thereof; denied that on April 1, 1912, or at any other time, defendant unlawfully, or at all, converted or disposed of said note, and denied that plaintiff ever had any ownership in, or right or title to, said note or to any of the moneys represented thereby.

The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and the following findings were made by it: That plaintiff was not, on April 1, 1912, or at any other time, the owner of or entitled to possession of said note, which was on April 1, 1912, of the value, principal and interest, of $1,486.57; that on said day, or at all, defendant did not, nor has he at any time, unlawfully, or at all, converted said note to his own use, or at all, or "done anything in connection therewith except as hereinafter in these findings set forth"; that said note was executed as alleged in the complaint and thereafter, as alleged in the answer and while in the possession of Mrs. Doty, the said note was by her delivered to defendant who thereafter, under her instructions, as alleged in the answer, delivered the same to said bank "and from said bank then and there received the full value * * * and applied and used all thereof to and for the use and benefit of said Nellie Mead Doty, something over $1,000 of the same being so applied and used during her lifetime and the remainder after her death in payment of her just debts and liabilities"; that she died July 18, 1912, and defendant was, as alleged in the answer, duly appointed administrator of her estate, and he thereupon took charge of all her estate and has ever since retained such possession; that said note was not paid at its maturity and since his said appointment "defendant was called upon by said bank to protect the said indorsement of said promissory note made by said Nellie Mead Doty aforesaid, and accordingly he did protect the same by paying to said Sacramento Valley Bank the full amount of said promissory note, paid as aforesaid by said bank when it cashed the same as hereinbefore specified; and thereupon said bank delivered said promissory note to defendant, who has ever since retained and now does retain the same," but at no time has plaintiff ever had any right to or title in said note or any moneys represented thereby. Judgment was accordingly entered for defendant that plaintiff take nothing by the action. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment on bill of exceptions.

Plaintiff introduced the Harrington notes and mortgage, and also the assignment of the same to plaintiff. The latter reads:

> "Know all men by these presents: That Nellie Mead Doty, of the city of Biggs, county of Butte, state of California, the party of the first part, for and in consideration of ten ($10.00) dollars, lawful money of the United States of America, to her paid by Emma M. Burkett (a widow), of the city of Chico, county of Butte, state of California, the party of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, by these presents assigns to the party of the second part, a certain indenture of mortgage, bearing date the 25th day of September, 1911, made by Harry Harrington, of the county of Butte, state of California, on the following land and premises: [Description.] Together with the three (3) promissory notes therein described, and the money due and to become due thereon, with the interest. * * * This assignment of said mortgage is not to be placed as of record during the lifetime of Nellie Mead Doty, the party of the first part."

Duly executed "and recorded at the request of Emma M. Burkett on July 19, 1912, in Book B of Assignments of Mortgages, at page 483, records of Butte county."

It was stipulated that on December 30, 1911, Mrs. Doty was the owner of the note and mortgage in question, and that she was the wife on that day of defendant, and that she died July 18, 1912; "that the note itself was never delivered to plaintiff, but remained in the custody of Nellie Mead Doty until the time it was turned over by her to the defendant in this action." Defendant testified that the note in question on December 30, 1911, was in a tin box in the vault of said bank to which both he and his wife had access.

He testified:

> "In February or March of 1912, Mrs. Doty was taken sick, and we had to take her to the hospital, and she realized we had to have money and she had me go to the bank and make arrangements with Mr. Brough, the cashier of the Sacramento Valley Bank, to get money on the note and use it for her sickness. In accordance with those instructions, I borrowed the money first. I took the note and had her indorse it and put it in the bank. I had to go to the bank and ask for the box and take out the note. At that time the note was not indorsed. I took it to Sacramento where she was sick, and she indorsed it there. I think it was in the Sisters' Hospital at Sacramento. I then returned it to the bank as collateral for the money I borrowed. During her illness I drew against this note and paid her bills. This was done under her instructions."

Over the objection of plaintiff, he testified as to the amount of money used prior to Mrs. Doty's death for her benefit, and also after her death for funeral expenses, doctor's bills, etc., amounting in all to "more than the full amount of the note." Over objection, proof of her death, and of the appointment of the administrator was made. On cross-examination, he testified:

> "By Mr. Schwab: Q. Mr. Doty, I understood you to say that you took this note from the box in the Sacramento Valley Bank and took it to the Sacramento Hospital at Sacramento and had Mrs. Doty indorse it and brought it back to the bank; is that right? A. That is right. Q. And then you, as I understand you to say, that you deposited as collateral that note and borrowed money on it—that is a fact—did you actually pass title to it? Did you negotiate it? A. Did I negotiate it? What do you mean? Q. Tell us what you did; I don't quite understand you; you said at one time that you borrowed money on it, and then afterwards that you got this money and deposited it in the bank there; what did you do? I want to get the facts, that is all. A. I negotiated with the bank that I might borrow money on the note. Q. What has become of the note now? A. I have it; I took it up afterwards. Q. Do you still own it now? A. Yes, sir. Q. In other words, at the present time, you have possession of the note, and it is a binding obligation as to Harry Harrington, the maker of the note? A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Mr. Schwab: Q. Is it the fact that you claimed the note as administrator of the estate of Nellie Mead Doty, as administrator of that estate? A. I claim it as my own.

"The Court: Q. Did you take it up with your own money? A. Yes, sir; I took it up with my own money.

"Mr. Schwab: Q. You still claim possession of it? A. Yes, sir; certainly. Q. And still claim the title to it, and that you own it? A. Yes, sir; certainly. Q. And you never did actually pass title to the bank at the time that you got the money there? You simply deposited it as a collateral security, is that the fact? A. I placed it in the bank to draw against it, and if he had taken it all up and the note had been paid, I would have had nothing to do with it. Q. The understanding was that that was simply a collateral security? A. Necessarily so; we had used all of the note, and if Mr. Harrington had gone forward and paid the note there would have been nothing more to do."

Over objection by plaintiff, the witness testified:

"A. The last of the series remained there up to the time of my wife's death. The second of the series, she realized that we were going to use a great deal of money, that she had better indorse the other one and use it the same as we did the other one, and I went to the box and took up the same as I did the other one; took it to the house, and she indorsed it. I then took it and put it in my safe and never used it. Q. She had indorsed that looking to the time that it might be needed? A. Yes, sir. She died before it was needed. No. 2 of the series remains in my possession, and No. 3 remained in the box unindorsed. No. 1 had been indorsed and used."

Over plaintiff's objection plaintiff was called as defendant's witness, and testified that she did not pay Mrs. Doty anything for the assignment. A motion to strike out the answer was denied, and plaintiff excepted.

This is substantially the evidence in the case. There was no evidence of any circumstances attending the assignment or of the relation of the parties to each other or as to the motive of Mrs. Doty in making the assignment. There was no suggestion of fraud, mistake, or undue influence in the execution of the assignment.

Plaintiff's position is that by the assignment the title to the note and mortgage in question passed absolutely to plaintiff, although the note was then in the possession of Mrs. Doty and remained in her possession, and although she afterwards indorsed it and her husband by her direction used it as collateral for a loan for her benefit. It was because of this view of the assignment that plaintiff objected as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, to testimony as to the hypothecation of the note by Mrs. Doty's direction and the uses made of the money borrowed by her husband; also the evidence as to her death and the appointment of the administrator of her estate; also the testimony that the notes were kept in a box to which Mrs. Doty and her husband had access; also the testimony of plaintiff, when called by defendant, that she paid no money consideration for the assignment.

The position of defendant is that "the whole transaction shows conclusively that Mrs. Doty did not intend to deliver or part title with any of the promissory notes"; that "she didn't indorse them, but on the contrary, she kept them in her possession with a view to using them if necessary"; that there is nothing in the transaction "which shows any evidence of a delivery of the property, which, of course, is capable of manual delivery, or of any intent to do so during the life of the donor"; that "the plaintiff testified that no consideration was paid, and that unless she can establish the transaction as a gift she will have no standing before this court (Civ. Code, §§ 1146, 1147, 1149; Hart v. Ketchum, 121 Cal. 426, 53 Pac. 931)"; that "a written gift need not be actually delivered, but no gift of personal property, whether written or verbal, is complete and effectual unless the donor intends to divest himself completely of control or dominion over the property given," citing Estate of Hall, 154 Cal. 529, 98 Pac. 269; Noble v. Garden, 146 Cal. 225, 79 Pac. 883, 2 Ann. Cas. 1001; Noble v. Learned, 153 Cal. 245, 94 Pac. 1047; Humble v. Gay, 168 Cal. 516, 143 Pac. 778. Treated as a sale, defendant's position is that "not being accompanied by any immediate or continued change of possession the transaction was void (Civ. Code, § 3440), and void not only as to creditors, but as to the executrix of the will (Kelly v. Murphy, 70 Cal. 560, 12 Pac. 467)."

[1] It seems to us that the decision in this case must turn upon the admissibility of the evidence objected to by plaintiff. If that evidence can be considered it has a tendency to show that the donor or assignor did not intend to presently pass the title to the property. We cannot attribute to Mrs. Doty a purpose to knowingly violate her transfer of the notes and mortgage to Mrs. Burkett. She must be held to have acted upon the assumption that she had a right to dispose of the note in question and to convert the proceeds to her own use notwithstanding assignment to plaintiff. We are brought, therefore, to consider the character and legal effect of the assignment.

The assignment bears date December 30, 1911, was signed and acknowledged of that date, and recites: "Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of F. F. Carduff." "A grant takes effect so as to vest the interest intended to be transferred only upon its delivery by the grantor." Civ. Code, § 1054. "A grant cannot be delivered to the grantee conditionally. Delivery to him, or to his agent as such, is necessarily absolute, and the instrument takes effect thereupon, discharged of any condition on which the delivery was made." Civ. Code, § 1056. There is a presumption that the instrument was delivered on the day of its date. Civ. Code, § 1055. Plaintiff had possession of the instrument and produced it at the trial, having previously caused it to be recorded. This sufficiently established delivery, and there was no evidence to the contrary. Towne v. Towne, 6 Cal. App. 697, 701, 92 Pac. 1050.

[2, 3] The fact that the grantor did not deliver possession of the property to the grantee was a matter of no importance as affecting the completion or efficiency of the transfer. Driscoll v. Driscoll, 143 Cal. 528, 77 Pac. 471; Francoeur v. Beatty, 170 Cal. 740, 151 Pac. 123. The instrument of assignment was not rendered executory because accompanied by no actual delivery to the transferee of the property transferred. "A sale of personal property is, however, good as between the parties whether the possession be delivered or not. Want of delivery renders it only void as to creditors and subsequent purchasers." Driscoll v. Driscoll, supra. No question arises here as to the rights of creditors or subsequent purchasers.

[4] What Mrs. Doty's motive was in inserting in the grant the provision that "this assignment of said mortgage is not to be placed of record during" her life, is not apparent and can only be conjectured. We have seen that by section 1056 of the Civil Code a grant cannot be delivered to the grantee conditionally. The placing of the instrument of record was not essential to its efficacy. Recordation has no other function than that of notice to the world (Civ. Code, § 1213); and "an unrecorded instrument is valid as between the parties thereto and those who have notice thereof" (Civ. Code, § 1217).

We must look alone to the terms of the instrument to determine whether it is testamentary in nature and not to be operative as a transfer of the property purported to be conveyed by it, until the death of the maker. As was said in Tennant v. John Tennant Memorial Home, 167 Cal. 570, 579, 140 Pac. 242, 246:

> "This is always essential. If the instrument, according to its proper legal effect under the rules of conveyancing, passes at the time of its execution a present interest or title in the property to a third person, although it may be only an interest in a future estate and may be subject to defeat on the happening or nonoccurrence of a future event, it is a present conveyance and not a will."

That the assignment is absolute in its terms and conveyed a present interest in the notes and mortgage cannot be doubted. We can discover nothing in the provision as to recording which shows or has a tendency to show an intention of the grantor to reserve to herself the title to the property or to postpone its enjoyment by the grantee until after the death of the grantor. Nor do we think the clause in question gives any indication that the grantor did not intend to divest herself completely of control or dominion over the property, which is the test given in the cases cited by respondent, such as Estate of Hall, supra, and others. We cannot see that the provision amounted to anything more than a request that the assignment be not recorded until after the assignor's death. But it was held in Dimmick v. Dimmick, 95 Cal. 323, 328, 30 Pac. 547, that the fact that the grantor requested the grantee to refrain from recording the instrument until after his death was entirely immaterial.

[5] If, as we hold, the clause in question had no operative effect upon the instrument as a present grant of the property, it was not competent to prove by parol any facts "tending to establish an agreement contrary to the plain import of the written assignment, which on its face is absolute." Albert v. Albert, 12 Cal. App. 268, 271, 107 Pac. 156. See Mowry v. Heney, 86 Cal. 471, 476, 25 Pac. 17.

[6] Proof that no consideration was paid for the assignment doubtless was admitted to show that the transaction was a gift, but even so, the rule of construction would be the same as in case of a grant—i. e., the language of the instrument must control. As was said in the Driscoll Case:

> "Where a gift inter vivos is perfected by delivery of possession of the thing or delivery of a deed of gift it is complete, although made without any consideration."

[7] The assignment stated that it was made in consideration of $10 in hand paid to and received by the assignor. The rule is thus stated in Arnold v. Arnold, 137 Cal. 291, 296, 70 Pac. 23, 24:

> "As to the subject of consideration, the law is, that while the recitals of consideration in written instruments are not conclusive as to the amount or character or payment of the consideration, when these latter matters are the subject of litigation, evidence of want of consideration, or of a different consideration, is not admissible for the purpose of varying, contradicting, and defeating covenants by which rights are expressly vested." Hendrick v. Crowley, 31 Cal. 472; Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 530, 21 Pac. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162, and many other cases, are cited to like effect.

[8] The evidence showed a conversion by defendant. 38 Cyc. pp. 2005, 2009; Dodge v. Meyer, 61 Cal. 405; Wood v. McDonald, 66 Cal. 546, 6 Pac. 452. Defendant cannot escape liability on the ground that he was acting as the agent of Mrs. Doty. 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 688; 38 Cyc. p. 2056 (d); Swim v. Wilson, 90 Cal. 126, 27 Pac. 33, 13 L. R. A. 605, 25 Am. St. Rep. 110.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: BURNETT, J.; HART, J.

SUPERIOR CALIFORNIA FRUIT LAND CO. et al. v. GROSSMAN et al.

(Civ. 1577.)

1. QUIETING TITLE 🔑30(2)—PARTIES PLAINTIFF—JOINDER—STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 381, providing that any two or more persons claiming any estate or interest in land under a common source of title may unite in an action against any person claiming an adverse estate or interest therein to determine such adverse claim, or to remove a cloud, plaintiff fruit land company acquiring title through a third person, who had acquired under an agreement to purchase from the holder of an option, and plaintiffs' grantees of a part of the land might unite in a suit to quiet title, pursuant to section 749, providing for the determination of adverse claims to real property, against defendants claiming under an earlier agreement with the option holder as the common source of title for the purchase of all the lands owned by the respective plaintiffs.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE 🔑90—DEFENSES—LACHES.

Defendants in an action to quiet title, who, under a cross-complaint, sought to set up a cause of action for specific performance of an option contract executed to them by an option holder, as the common source of title, which cross-complaint was filed three years and nine months after such contract to purchase, and after the option holder had sold and conveyed to a third party through whom the plaintiffs claimed, who did not show any valid tender of the money representing the purchase price, and who after record of the instruments under which plaintiffs claimed, and after plaintiffs' possession, had remained silent and inactive, lost their rights of action in equity, if any, by reason of laches.

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE 🔑114(1) — DAMAGES—BREACH OF CONTRACT —PLEADING.

The fact that Civ. Code, § 3387, provides that it is presumed that the damages for failure to comply with the terms of a contract for the sale of real estate will not furnish adequate compensation does not relieve the pleader from showing such damages and stating a cause for the equitable interposition of the court.

4. PLEADING 🔑193(4)—DEFENSES—LACHES.

The defense of laches, which in substance is that the complaint does not show equity or fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, can be taken advantage of by demurrer.

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE 🔑105(3)—LACHES —LIMITATIONS.

The statute of limitations, which would apply to an action at law, does not determine a question of laches in equity, where one is seeking specific performance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; H. M. Albery, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the Superior California Fruit Land Company and others against A. B. Grossman and others, in which defendants sought specific performance of an option or agreement to sell to them. Judgment and decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for appellants. De Ligne & Jones, of Sacramento (H. T. Hiatt, of Sacramento, of counsel), for respondents.

PLUMMER, Judge pro tem. Plaintiffs instituted this action to remove a cloud therefrom and quiet their title to a tract of land, embracing 6,173 acres, situate in the county of Colusa. The defendants, by answer and cross-complaint, sought specific performance of a certain option or agreement of sale relating to the same premises. Plaintiffs had judgment and decree of the trial court, as prayed for, from which judgment and decree defendants appeal, the merits of which may be determined by the solution of two questions:

First. Was the trial court right in holding that the plaintiffs were entitled to unite in the prosecution of this action?

Second. Was the trial court correct in sustaining the plaintiffs' demurrer to the defendants' cross-complaint?

[1] The cause comes before this court upon the judgment roll, and involves only the ruling of the trial court upon the demurrers interposed to the pleadings in the court below. The facts as gleaned from the pleadings are as follows: On the 21st day of March, 1908, Hyman Estate Company, being the owner of $^{35}/_{36}$ of the tract of land above referred to, entered into an agreement or option to purchase with one S. Rummelsburg. This agreement was recorded on the 7th day of July, 1910. On the 12th day of March, 1910, the said Rummelsburg entered into a contract or option of sale with appellant Grossman for the whole of the tract of land referred to, which agreement or option was recorded on the 16th day of March, 1910. On the 29th day of March, 1910, it is alleged that the appellant Grossman in writing demanded of Rummelsburg a deed of conveyance of said real property, and of the whole thereof, and also tendered and offered to pay the purchase price of said property; that on the 6th day of May, 1910, the said Rummelsburg entered into an agreement to convey the said lands and premises to one Fleming, which agreement was recorded on the same day; that on the 10th day of May, 1910, the Hyman Estate Company acquired the outstanding $^{1}/_{36}$ interest in and to the lands and premises hereinbefore referred to, the deed to the same being recorded on the 12th day of May, 1910; that on or about the 1st day of July, 1910, the said Fleming assigned his interest in the contract theretofore obtained by him from Rummelsburg to the fruit company, plaintiff in this action; this assignment was recorded on the same day; that on or about the 26th day of August, 1911, the Hyman Estate Company granted and conveyed all of the premises herein referred to to the said Rummelsburg, the deed being recorded on the day of its date. On the 2d day of July, 1912, the said Rummelsburg granted and conveyed the premises involved herein to the plaintiff Fruit Land Company, which deed was also recorded on the day of its date. The other plaintiffs herein have succeeded to the interest of the Fruit Land Company in a portion of the premises involved in this action, by deeds of conveyance from said company. The price of the land named in the option given to the defendant Grossman was slightly in excess of $80,000.

The complaint filed by the plaintiffs is in the usual form of an action to quiet title, or to remove cloud therefrom, and is directed to the option or agreement to purchase executed and delivered by Rummelsburg to the defendant Grossman. This instrument, by its terms, included and covered all the premises owned by the respective plaintiffs, and constituted the cloud upon the title of the lands held by them severally, and its removal is the object of the action now before the court.

Section 381, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that:

> "Any two or more persons claiming any estate or interest in lands under a common source of title, whether holding as tenants in common, joint tenants, * * * may unite in an action against any person claiming an adverse estate or interest therein, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim, or of establishing such common source of title * * * or of removing a cloud upon the same."

The common source of title through whom all the parties to this action assert an interest in the real estate hereinbefore referred to is the person Rummelsburg. Plaintiffs derived their title from Rummelsburg, through Fleming, and the defendants claim directly from Rummelsburg. It is difficult to imagine a case that would more completely fit the provisions of section 381 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The action herein is authorized by section 749, Code of Civil Procedure, and the parties who may unite in the prosecution of it are provided for by section 381, as above stated. That this action is properly prosecuted, and that the plaintiffs were properly joined, and that the trial court did not err in overruling the defendants' demurrer for misjoinder, seems to us beyond question. Gillespie v. Gouly, 152 Cal. 643, 93 Pac. 856. A number of other cases might be cited in support of the ruling of the trial court, but this one seems sufficient.

[2] The second question for determination is: Was the ruling of the trial court correct in sustaining the plaintiffs' demurrer to the defendants' cross-complaint? The cross-complaint sought to set up a cause of action for specific performance of the option contract dated March 12, 1910, executed by Rummelsburg and the defendant Grossman, and to enforce the same for the conveyance of the lands and premises herein referred to as against the plaintiffs in this action. Many reasons have been urged by counsel pro and con as to the correctness or incorrectness of the ruling of the trial court, but, for the reasons hereinafter stated, only one needs to be considered, as it is determinative of this question.

The option contract referred to bears date of March 12, 1910. The cross-complaint for specific performance was filed December 8, 1913, almost three years and nine months later. On May 6, 1910, Rummelsburg entered into an agreement to convey the lands and premises to George Fleming. This agreement was recorded on the day of its date, less than two months after the date of the option given by Rummelsburg to the appellant Grossman. All that appellants have ever done towards seeking performance of their contract appears in the following allegation:

> "That the said Grossman, on the 29th day of March, 1910, in writing, demanded of said Rummelsburg a deed of conveyance of said real property, and of the whole thereof, and tendered and offered to pay the purchase price of said property in the sum named and fixed in said agreement, and according to the terms of said agreement," etc.

The cross-complainant further alleges:

> "That no time was fixed in said contract for its performance, or for payment of the purchase price mentioned therein."

From which it appears, from the very language of the defendants' cross-complaint, that the pleader did not state, and the trial court could not conclude, that any valid tender of the money representing the purchase price, to wit, $80,249, had ever been made. It further appears that at the date of the alleged tender the cross-complainant knew that the Hyman estate did not own all of the premises for which Grossman was demanding a deed of conveyance. This interest belonged to a minor, and, by the defendants' cross-complaint, was not acquired until the 10th day of May, 1910. After this date it does not appear that any kind of tender or offer of performance was made by either of the cross-complainants in this action until the 8th day of December, 1913, at which time their pleadings in this action were filed. On the 6th day of May, 1910, the Fleming agreement was made a matter of record, and the subsequent instruments hereinbefore referred to were from time to time recorded. The plaintiffs went into possession thereunder, notwithstanding which the cross-complainants remained silent and inactive for nearly four years.

Have the cross-complainants lost their right of action, if any, in equity, by reason of laches? We think so. The language of Justice Brewer quoted in the case of Troll v. City of St. Louis, 257 Mo. 662, 168 S. W.

175, where the doctrine of laches is thoroughly considered, appears pertinent:

> "No doctrine is so wholesome, when wisely administered, as that of laches. It prevents the resurrection of stale titles, and forbids the spying out from the records of ancient and abandoned rights. It requires of every owner that he take care of his property, and of every claimant that he make known his claims. It gives to the actual and longer possessor security, and induces and justifies him in all efforts to improve and make valuable the property he holds. It is a doctrine received with favor, because its proper application works out justice and equity, and often bars the holder of a mere technical right, which he has abandoned for years, from enforcing it when its enforcement will work large injury to many."

[3] It may be noted, in passing, that the cross-complainants do not allege that they have suffered any injury or any pecuniary loss by reason of the failure of Rummelsburg to convey, or that they will suffer any injury or pecuniary loss unless specific performance is enforced herein. The fact that the Civil Code (§ 3387) provides that it is presumed that the damages for failure to comply with the terms of a contract for the sale of real estate will not furnish adequate compensation does not relieve the pleader from showing such damages and stating a cause for the equitable interposition of the court. Herzog v. A., T. & S. F. Ry., 153 Cal. 502, 95 Pac. 898, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428, and cases cited.

[4] The defense of laches can be taken advantage of by demurrer. Such a defense is, in substance, that the complaint does not show equity, or fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The Supreme Court of this state has so held in Marsh v. Lott, 156 Cal. 643, 105 Pac. 968. It was there also held:

> That "no artificial rule as to the lapse of time or the circumstances which will justify the application of the doctrine of laches can be laid down; that each case, as it arises, must be determined by its own circumstances. If, after the vendor's violation or express repudiation of the contract of sale, the vendee delays to proceed in the enforcement of the contract for such a length of time as to constitute acquiescence in vendor's breach, or to create a presumption of abandonment of his right to specific performance, relief in equity will be denied."

In the Lott Case the delay was for a period of three years, five months, and a few days, being less than the period which has elapsed in the case at bar. The fact that Rummelsburg may have had no just reason for violating the terms of his agreement with the cross-complainants (assuming, for the purposes of argument, that such is the case, the terms of the agreement are not before the court, and cannot be considered) does not alter the situation. The record shows Rummelsburg, after giving the option contract to the defendant Grossman, immediately contracted with one Fleming, that the premises were thereafter conveyed to Fleming, and by mesne conveyance passed to the plaintiffs, all of these instruments being of record, and the plaintiffs coming into possession under the instruments referred to. To these facts the language of Mr. Pomeroy, in his work on Specific Performance, is applicable:

> "Where one party, even without any just or sufficient reason for so doing, and as a mere act of arbitrary will, notifies the other that he will not perform the contract, shall treat it as at an end, acquiescence by the party notified will cut off the latter's right of enforcement, and this acquiescence will be sufficiently shown by a delay in commencing a suit which would otherwise be too short to prejudice his rights."

Or, as otherwise stated in 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law:

> "If, after the violation or express repudiation of the contract, the party seeking specific performance delays to proceed for such a length of time as to constitute acquiescence in the breach, or a presumption of abandonment of his right to specific performance, relief in equity will be denied."

[5] The statute of limitations, which would apply to an action at law, does not determine the question of laches in equity, where one is seeking specific performance. Marsh v. Lott, supra, and cases there cited.

The question of laches in actions for specific performance has been passed upon a number of times by the Supreme Court of this state, and all of them enforce the doctrine, even though the action would not be barred if it were one at law.

In Fowler v. Sutherland, 68 Cal. 414, 9 Pac. 674, the complaint showed that a period of two years and three months had elapsed before specific performance was sought. No relief was granted, even though the party seeking specific performance had been let into possession.

In O'Donnell v. Jackson, 69 Cal. 622, 11 Pac. 251, relief was denied on the ground of laches where a period of a little over 3 years had elapsed. The party seeking specific performance had in this case also taken possession of the premises in controversy.

In Requa v. Snow, 76 Cal. 590, 18 Pac. 862, it was held that:

> "Specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, at the instance of the vendee, will be refused when there has been an unexplained delay by him of upwards of three years in performing the conditions of the contract with respect to the payment of the purchase price."

This case cites with approval the case of Green v. Covillaud, 10 Cal. 317, 70 Am. Dec. 725, where it was held that a delay of between twenty-one and twenty-two months was sufficient to bar the remedy on the grounds of laches.

The only explanation offered by the defendants for their delay herein is that in the summer of 1910 (date not stated) Rummelsburg left the state of California, and did not return until the spring of 1911 (date not stated), and that Rummelsburg never offered to convey, and that no time is fixed in the contract for its performance or for the payment of the purchase price.

As before stated, within two months after the execution of the option contract delivered to Grossman, Rummelsburg entered into an agreement of sale with other parties, and thereafter conveyed to them. The contract held by the defendants fixed no time for payment, in which case the law provides that it must be within a reasonable period.

The absence of Rummelsburg from the state of California was, at most, only for a few months, and offered no reason why the defendants did not promptly institute action to enforce their right to specific performance, if any existed under their contract, immediately after the agreement of sale entered into between Rummelsburg and Fleming, through whom the plaintiffs claim. During all the period referred to herein the plaintiffs, as appears from the pleadings and the judgment roll, were in possession of the premises in dispute, and their title should not be disturbed unless valid reasons exist therefor, especially where the cross-plaintiffs do not even allege that they have been injured.

For the reasons herein given, we are of the opinion that the defendants' cross-complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause for specific performance, and that the question of laches was properly raised by demurrer.

The judgment of the lower court is therefore affirmed.

BRAZIL v. AZEVEDO et al. (Civ. 1852.)

1. Bankruptcy 🔑391(1)—Effect on Other Actions—Jurisdiction of State Court.

While under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 11a, 30 Stat. 549 (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 9595), providing for stay of suits pending until adjudication on the petition in bankruptcy, where the claim is one for which a discharge would be a release, all such actions are stayed, the state court in which a suit on such a claim is pending is not deprived of jurisdiction.

2. Partnership 🔑212—Actions Against—Complaint—Ambiguity.

An amended complaint against several defendants constituting a partnership is not ambiguous and uncertain for alleging that each defendant became indebted to plaintiff for the goods furnished which were furnished at the special instance and request of each of the defendants, since the liability of any one defendant would be established by proof that the goods were supplied to the copartnership at the request of any copartner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 404–407, 410, 414; Dec. Dig. 🔑212.]

3. Partnership 🔑212—Actions Against—Complaint—Ambiguity.

A complaint in an action against a copartnership is not ambiguous for failure to disclose whether the partnership was formed within the state or whether the business was conducted and the goods sold in the state, where the action was brought in a court of general jurisdiction, and personal service was had upon one copartner who appeared in person and by counsel.

4. Damages 🔑68—Measure—Interest.

Under Civ. Code, § 3287, providing that every person entitled to recover damages certain, the right to which is vested on a particular day, can also recover interest from that day, the seller of goods to a partnership on contract at certain prices or current market value, who also has a claim for agreed rental or for money loaned with interest fixed by agreement, can recover interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 141–143; Dec. Dig. 🔑68.]

5. Assignments 🔑41 — Sufficiency—Compliance with Bankruptcy Act.

Though an assignment may not be sufficient in form to comply with the rule of the United States District Court in bankruptcy proceedings, that court has not laid down the requisites for a valid assignment of a chose in action generally.

6. Appeal and Error 🔑757(3)—Scope of Review—Record—Sufficiency.

The court on appeal does not always deem failure to comply with the rule, requiring evidence referred to by counsel in support of a point to be printed in the brief, a sufficient reason for refusing to consider a point that is apparently meritorious.

7. Partnership 🔑219(3)—Effect of Discharge in Bankruptcy — Judgment Against Solvent Partner.

Since a copartner while his obligation is joint is still liable to a creditor for the entire amount of the debt, where the creditor joined the partners and the partnership, but all save one partner had been discharged in bankruptcy, a judgment against the remaining partner alone was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by M. S. Brazil against Manuel Azevedo and others, as a copartnership operating the Melrose Central Creamery. From judgment for plaintiff, Azevedo appeals. Affirmed.

A. Q. Lomba and W. W. Moreland, both of Oakland, for appellant. Gonsalves & Keller, of Oakland, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This action was brought against Manuel Azevedo, John S. Marshall, J. Rodgers, and Melrose Central Creamery, the latter being a copartnership consisting of the three individual defendants named, and was for the recovery of the value of merchandise sold by the plaintiff to said copartnership, and also for the recovery of various amounts due other creditors and which had been assigned to the plaintiff. After trial judgment went in favor of the plaintiff and against defendant Manuel Azevedo, it having appeared by the answer of Azevedo's codefendants—and which was admitted to be true by the plaintiff—that in bankruptcy proceedings they had severally been discharged from the indebtedness upon which the plaintiff's claim was founded. The appeal is by Azevedo from the judgment, and the first point made by him is that his demurrer to the amended complaint should have been sustained. The demurrer was upon the ground of lack of facts, and particularly upon the ground that the trial court had no jurisdiction to proceed with the trial of the action because it was shown by the averments of the amended complaint that bankruptcy proceedings were pending in the United States District Court against the copartnership of which appellant and his other codefendants were members and against his said copartners.

[1] The pendency of these proceedings in bankruptcy did not deprive the superior court of jurisdiction of this cause. Section 11a of the United States Bankruptcy Act of 1898 provides that:

> "A suit which is founded upon a claim from which a discharge would be a release, and which is pending against a person at the time of the filing of a petition against him, shall be stayed until after an adjudication or the dismissal of the petition; if such person is adjudged a bankrupt, such action may be further stayed until twelve months after the date of such adjudication, or, if within that time such person applies for a discharge, then until the question of such discharge is determined."

It is apparent from this provision of the act that while a suit of the character mentioned is stayed until the adjudication or dismissal of the petition, and may be further stayed by the United States District Court as therein provided, a state court in which such a suit is pending is not deprived of jurisdiction. Speaking of the effect of this section of the Bankruptcy Act, it is said in Collier on Bankruptcy (6th Ed.) at page 145:

> "But the state court does not lose jurisdiction (citing Bindseil v. Smith, 5 Am. Bank. R. 40). The stay is directed to the suitor, not the court, and the latter may go on if the cause is moved by the person enjoined, and a judgment resulting will be valid. The remedy of a party thus aggrieved is in contempt proceedings."

[2] It is also urged that the amended complaint is ambiguous and uncertain for the reason that it is therein alleged that each of the defendants became indebted to the plaintiff for the goods furnished, and that they were so furnished at the special instance and request of each of the defendants. We do not see that such an allegation makes the complaint either ambiguous or uncertain. The allegation might or might not be susceptible of proof, but the appellant's liability would be established by proof that the goods were supplied to the copartnership at the request of any of the copartners. The apprehension that the plaintiff was seeking to recover his total claim against each of the partners was set at rest by the proof offered and by the amount of the judgment rendered.

[3] Another ground of ambiguity urged is that the complaint did not disclose whether the partnership was formed in the state of California, nor whether its business was conducted and the goods sold in this state. In view of the fact that the action was brought in a court of general jurisdiction, that personal service was had upon the appellant, who appeared in person and by counsel, these matters became immaterial. We think it evident that the court committed no error in overruling the demurrer to the amended complaint.

[4] Appellant next complains that the court allowed interest on the various amounts found to be due to the plaintiff. As the liability of the defendant was in each instance based upon contract for goods sold at certain prices or at current market value, or was for an agreed rental or for money loaned with interest fixed by agreement, the court was justified under section 3287 of the Civil Code in allowing interest as it did.

[5] The form of the assignment to the plaintiff of certain claims included in his demand is also criticized as not complying with a certain rule of the United States district court. As to this it is sufficient to say that while that court in bankruptcy proceedings might not recognize an assignment unless made in accordance with its rule, that court has not undertaken to lay down requisites for a valid assignment of a chose in action generally.

[6] Certain findings of the court as to the several amounts due on claims are also attacked as not supported by the evidence, and certain portions of the record are referred to in support of appellant's contention. The respondent in his brief, in answer to these objections of the appellant, has contented himself with saying:

> "As we understand the rules of this court and the law applicable to appeals under the alternative method, we do not believe that that portion of the brief headed 'The Evidence' contains any matters which we should be justified in taking up the time of this court in answering."

If by this the respondent alludes to the rule of the court requiring any evidence referred to by counsel in support of a point to be printed in the brief, and to the neglect of the appellant to follow this requirement, we would say that the court does not always deem the failure to comply with this rule a sufficient reason for refusing to consider a point that is apparently meritorious. In the present instance the court thought proper to pass upon the point raised, and, as the result of respondent's failure to answer it in his brief, we were required to devote considerable time to a minute examination of a complicated account, the evidence as to which had been introduced in a loose, disconnected, and haphazard manner; and our examination would have been greatly facilitated if respondent's counsel had applied to his opponent in less laconic fashion. As the result of our examination, we are of the opinion that the appellant's contention as to the findings in question is not borne out by the record.

[7] The remaining points raised by the appellant are all grounded upon the general proposition that a judgment was rendered against him alone upon a partnership liability. But a copartner, while his obligation is joint, is still liable to a creditor for the entire amount of the debt; and, as we have seen, in the case at bar the appellant's copartners and the copartnership were all joined as defendants, and the judgment would have gone against them but for the fact appearing in the record that they had been discharged by the bankruptcy court from their liability to pay the claims for which the appellant was held. We do not see how, under the circumstances, the trial court could have rendered any other judgment than the one it did, or how a judgment against his codefendants would have been of any benefit to the appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

KNIGHT v. ALL PERSONS et al.

(Civ. 1941.)

1. DEDICATION 🔑19(4), 35(1) — STREETS — PLATS—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the surveyor's map and plat extended streets beyond the city boundaries and the city council approved and adopted the map "for the location of streets within the city limits" and in a certain division, the map was not valid as a dedication or acceptance of the lands in the extended street beyond the city limits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 44, 45, 69, 71.]

2. EVIDENCE 🔑186(9) — DOCUMENTS — DOCUMENTS DESTROYED—HOW PROVED.

Where original record of suit and judgment quieting title was destroyed in the conflagration of 1906, an abstract of title, purporting to be correct and complete abstract and showing the filing of the complaint and entry of judgment in such suit, may be admitted to show such judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 1855a, as amended by St. (Ex. Sess.) 1911, p. 64.

3. JUDGMENT 🔑679 — CONCLUSIVENESS — PERSONS CONCLUDED.

Judgment quieting title against a city in lands claimed as a street is conclusive against all persons claiming easement in the land, depending on the city's title to use it as a public street.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William M. Conley, Judge.

Suit by Serena H. Knight against All Persons, etc., George L. Center, and others. Decree for complainant, and Center and others appeal. Affirmed.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck and Edward Lynch, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Percy E. Towne and Peter A. Breen, both of San Francisco, for respondent. Percy V. Long, of San Francisco, for City and County of San Francisco.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action to quiet title under the McEnerney Act (St. [Ex. Sess.] 1906, p. 78). The land in question is a rectangular lot lying at the southeasterly end of South Beach block No. 40 in the city and county of San Francisco, near the corner of Eighth and Channel streets, and which would be included within a prolongation of Alameda street. The plaintiff alleges that she is the owner of said lot deriving her title thereto by a deed from her husband, Thomas Knight, dated September 17, 1901, and from her alleged open, actual, peaceable, exclusive, and notorious possession of said property since said date. The defendants, George L. Center, Joseph B. Coryell, and William Matson, who are the appellants herein, and who appeared in the said proceeding to contest the plaintiff's claims, are the owners of premises adjoining that claimed by the plaintiff, and which would abut upon Alameda street if such street were prolonged so as to cover the property in dispute. These defendants in their answers deny that plaintiff is the owner of said premises through her deed thereto from Thomas Knight or otherwise, and deny that she has been in the actual, peaceable, or exclusive possession of the same since the 17th day of September, 1901, or since any other date than July 1, 1910; and in addition to said denials they affirmatively allege that the said tract of land was duly laid out, dedicated, and accepted to public use as a street by the city of San Francisco, the then owner of all the lands in that region, including said tract, by virtue of an ordinance duly and regularly adopted by the constituted authorities of said city on the 20th day of June, 1855, numbered 822, and also by an ordinance confirmatory of said ordinance 822 duly and regularly adopted on September 27, 1855, and numbered 845, under which said ordinances a certain official map of that portion of said city, known as the "Van Ness map," was made; and also by an act of the Legislature ratifying and confirming both of said preceding ordinances, duly adopted on March 11, 1858. The said defendants allege that they have an easement in the said premises thus claimed to have been dedicated as a public street, and pray that the plaintiff take nothing by her said action.

Upon the issues thus framed the cause proceeded to trial, whereupon it appeared that the lands in question were originally a part of the pueblo of said city lying within the exterior limits of South Beach block No. 40, and were part of a large area of tidelands within the charter limits of said city as defined in the charter act of April 15, 1851; that from a very early date in the history of the city these lands began to be gradually filled in by the dumping of earth and garbage, and also began to be the subject of occupation and adverse possession by various persons seeking to obtain title thereto by various and sometimes devious ways. It is not necessary to deal in detail with the tangled history of the several sorts of title thus sought to be imposed upon this property; but it sufficiently appears that in the month of August, 1865, Thomas Knight, the immediate predecessor in interest of the plaintiff herein, became the grantee of a deed to a tract of said land of which the property in question is a part, from one Henry B. Brooks, who had acquired his claim of title thereto from one E. C. Marshall, who in his turn had sought to gain title thereto by means of a pre-emption thereof under the federal laws. In the same year said Knight also received a deed to the same premises from the grantor, who had mediately gained color of title thereto through a conveyance by the state of California to one J. F. McDougald, dated November 7, 1855. From the time of the first of these conveyances to him said Thomas Knight had been and continued to be in possession of said premises claiming to own the same, and being engaged in almost continuous litigation with various and sundry sorts of claimants asserting hostile titles to the property. In the year 1868 said Knight commenced an action against the city and county of San Francisco to quiet his title to the whole of South Beach block No. 40, describing it by metes and bounds and claiming to be its owner. The city appeared and answered in said action, a trial was had, and a judgment rendered in plaintiff's favor to a portion of said block embracing the lands in question here. There is, in our opinion, sufficient evidence to have justified the trial court in its conclusion that the plaintiff through these various efforts of her immediate predecessor acquired title to these premises, and also through her own adverse possession of the same had become and was the owner thereof at the time of the institution of the present action, unless these efforts of her predecessor and herself to thus acquire title to the same had been rendered ineffectual by the action of the city amounting to a dedication of the property to public use as a street, accomplished through the passage of several ordinances and acts referred to in the answer of the defendants and appellants herein, and through the making and recordation of the so-called Van Ness map of that portion of the city.

The first of the ordinances relied upon by the defendants in support of their said claim is that numbered 822, known as the Van Ness ordinance, and dated June 20, 1855. It is needless to go afield in a search through reliable or unreliable historical records for the reasons underlying the passage of these ordinances, since they sufficiently speak for themselves as to the lands which under their direction were to be claimed and acquired by the city under the township laws of the United States, and were to be included in the survey and map of said lands so directed to be made. In both of these ordinances these lands are designated as being "that portion of the city lying west of Larkin street and southwest of Johnson street." It was these lands and these only of which the city surveyor was directed to make an official survey and map by the express terms of ordinance numbered 845. It is true that in the making of said map the city surveyor extended the lines of the streets delineated thereon beyond the limits prescribed for his official survey, and that in so doing he represented Alameda street upon said map as extended over the premises in question here; but in the certificate to said map signed by the said city surveyor, and also by the three commissioners appointed to assist in the making of said official survey and map, it is certified as having been made under and by virtue of said ordinance "for the location and dimensions of the streets to be laid out within the city limits west of Larkin and southwest of Johnson streets." This map was approved and adopted by the board of supervisors of said city in October, 1856; and in the ordinance approving and adopting the same it was declared to be the plan of the city in respect to the location of streets and avenues in that portion of the city named in said ordinances.

[1] It would thus seem to be perfectly clear that the only portion of the so-called Van Ness map which can be deemed official or effectual as amounting to a delineation, or as tending to lay the foundation for a dedication of any lands embraced therein as public streets, must be confined to those lands which lie west of Larkin and southwest of Johnson streets, and hence cannot be given effect as to that portion thereof which undertakes to cover the lands lying without said boundaries, which it is conceded the lands in question do. That it was so confined in its operation and effect we find to have been settled in the early case of San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 554, wherein the direct question was involved and decided. If said map is to be limited in its official operation and effect to the lands lying within said boundaries by virtue of the express terms of said ordinance authorizing the making of the same, it must follow that any acts of the Legislature or of Congress which refer to said ordinance or to said map cannot be held to have given to it a broader application than that to which it was limited by the original ordinance which authorized its creation.

It follows that the contention of the appellants herein that the extension of Alameda street over said lands as shown upon said map was effectual as working a dedication of said lands to public uses as an extension of said street, cannot be sustained.

The appellants have not pleaded and do not seriously contend that by any of the other or later ordinances or maps of the lands of said city such a delineation and dedication of the premises involved in this action as would constitute the same a public street was ever sufficiently made to prevent or defeat the acquisition of title thereto in the plaintiff or her predecessors by adverse possession.

[2] At the trial the plaintiff sought to rely upon a judgment obtained by her predecessor, Thomas Knight, in the year 1868, quieting his title to said premises against said city. The original record of said suit and judgment was destroyed in the conflagration of 1906, and hence in proof thereof the plaintiff offered in evidence an abstract of title made by the City Abstract and Title Insurance Company, purporting to be a correct and complete abstract of all matters appearing of record affecting the title to the property in question, and also purporting to show the filing of the complaint in said action and the entry of such judgment therein. We are satisfied from an examination of said abstract of title that it comes within the provisions of the act of 1911 (St. [Ex. Sess.] 1911 p. 64), amendatory of section 1855a of the Code of Civil Procedure, permitting secondary evidence of the records destroyed by said fire, and hence that such abstract was properly admitted in evidence. We are also of the opinion that the other objections which the defendants urged against the admission of said abstract, based upon alleged inaccuracies and omissions therein, went rather to the weight than to the admissibility in evidence of such secondary proof as to the existence and scope of said judgment.

[3] This judgment when proven must be held to be conclusive as to its effect in quieting the title to said premises in favor of the plaintiff's grantor and against the city and county of San Francisco, and hence also against all persons claiming an easement in said premises, depending upon the right and title of the municipality to the same, as a public street. Strand Improvement Co. v. City of Long Beach, 161 Pac. 975.

With respect to the evidence offered touching the adverse possession of said premises by the predecessor of plaintiff prior to 1901, and by herself thereafter, we think that it was sufficient to justify the finding of the trial court, resolving whatever conflicts there were therein in plaintiff's favor, and, this being so, its finding in that behalf will not be disturbed. We discover no error in the record which would justify a reversal of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

PROVIDENT GOLD MINING CO. v. HAYNES. (Civ. 1510.) (District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 16, 1916.) Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge. Action by the Provident Gold Mining Company against Dora L. Haynes and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Haynes appeals. Affirmed. Thomas C. Job and Joseph E. Hannon, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Robert Young, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action plaintiff seeks to enforce a liability of defendant and appellant Dora L. Haynes and others, as stockholders of the Manhattan Securities Company, an Arizona corporation, for an indebtedness of that corporation. Judgment having been rendered against the respective defendants in several amounts, some of the defendants appealed to the Supreme Court. The judgment against Dora L. Haynes being for less than $2,000, her appeal is to this court. The appeals in each instance are from the judgment and from orders denying motions of the defendants for a new trial. The appeals of the other defendants to the Supreme Court involved the same questions upon which the appeals of Dora L. Haynes depend. Those appeals were decided by the Supreme Court July 11, 1916, and the judgments and orders were affirmed as to them. Provident Gold Mining Co. v. Haynes et al., 159 Pac. 155. Upon the authority of that decision, the judgment and order appealed from herein are affirmed.

RAILROADS ⟜33(1) — LICENSE FEES—"DOING INTRASTATE BUSINESS."

Where a railroad was operated wholly within another state, but its general offices were located and all business conducted in this state, held, that it was "doing intrastate business" within the state and was liable for the license tax prescribed in such cases by St. 1915, p. 422.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 70.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Doing Business.]

In Bank. Application for writ of mandate by the Bullfrog, Goldfield Railroad Company against Frank C. Jordan, Secretary of State of the State of California. Writ discharged.

C. O. Whittemore, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Raymond Benjamin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Petitioner, a railroad corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the state of Nevada, made tender to respondent, Secretary of State of the state of California, and offered for filing in the office of that official a certified copy of its articles of incorporation, and a certified copy of a resolution of its board of directors designating an agent for the state of California upon whom process issued out of the courts of this state might be served, and with these papers tendered the fee of $75 as a prerequisite to such filing. Respondent refused to accept and file the papers until, in addition, petitioner paid the license tax contemplated by the statute adopted in 1915 (Stats. 1915, c. 190). Petitioner then sued for and obtained this alternative writ of mandate.

The facts are not in controversy. The single question presented is the legal one whether or not, under those facts, petitioner should be called upon to pay this additional license tax. The petitioner owns and operates a steam railroad which begins and ends entirely within the state of Nevada. In the city of Los Angeles, state of California, it maintains the general offices of its company. At these offices directors' meetings are held, the books, records, and accounts of the business of the corporation are kept, all of its general clerical work is performed, all vouchers and checks in payment of its bills, wages, and salaries are prepared and issued. All moneys earned in the operation of its railroad are there received and deposited in the banks of Los Angeles, and all disbursements are made by checks and drafts issued from these general offices in that city. In that city also is the purchasing department of the company, where its fuel oil and other supplies and material necessary for use in the operation of its railroad are purchased and transported from California into Nevada. The conduct and policy of the road is controlled from these California offices, though the physical operation of the road itself is of necessity intrusted to superintendents and their subordinates located in the state of Nevada.

Section 1 of the act of 1915 above referred to requires a filing by this corporation with the Secretary of State of a copy of its articles of incorporation, and exacts a fee for this filing. These were the papers and this the fee which petitioner tendered. Section 3 of the same act further provides that no corporation, domestic or foreign, "shall do or attempt to do any intrastate business within this state * * * without a state license therefor." Section 4 requires every corporation "now doing intrastate business within this state, or which shall hereafter engage in intrastate business in this state, to procure annually from the Secretary of State a license authorizing the transaction of such business in this state, and to pay therefor the license tax prescribed herein." This is the tax which petitioner has refused to pay, and this is the tax without the payment of which the Secretary of State has refused to accept for filing the tendered papers.

The one legal question presented is whether under these admitted facts the corporation petitioner was "doing intrastate business" within the meaning of our statute. We are fully satisfied that it was. The facts here admitted differentiate this case entirely from cases like General Conference of Free Baptists v. Berkey, 156 Cal. 466, 105 Pac. 411, where a single act by a religious incorporation in selling its land was held to be the mere exercise of power and not the transaction of business as contemplated by our law; and Caesar v. Capell (C. C.) 83 Fed. 403, where it was held that a foreign corporation which had not complied with the statutes of Tennessee by filing its charter could not successfully be charged with doing business in Tennessee in making a single loan of money to a citizen of that state. And equally do these facts differentiate this case from those like Bertin & Lepori v. Mattison, 69 Or. 470, 139 Pac. 330, where the mere taking of orders through a traveling salesman within the state, subject to the acceptance by the corporation at its home office, was held not to be the transaction of business within the meaning of the Oregon statute; and Fuller v. Allen (Okl.) 148 Pac. 1008, where but a single act of business had been done and it was declared that the phrase "doing business" as employed in the statute contemplated the "doing a series of acts to secure a livelihood, profit or pleasure"; and Cockburn v. Kinsley, 25 Colo. App. 89, 135 Pac. 1112, where a foreign corporation operated a mine in Mexico and borrowed money in Colorado to pay its landlord in Mexico, and all else that was done by the corporation in Colorado was the issuance of some stock to a nonresident and the causing to be printed by the treasurer of letter heads designating the main office of the corporation at a place in the state. More nearly akin to the facts in the present case are the Illinois cases, Bradbury v. Waukegan & Washington M. & S. Co., 113 Ill. App. 600, and Mandel v. Swan Land & Cattle Co., 154 Ill. 177, 40 N. E. 462, 27 L. R. A. 313, 45 Am. St. Rep. 124. In the first of these cases the court seems to construe its statute touching "doing business" as meaning the doing directly of the primary business for which the corporation was organized. Thus, if it be a manufacturing corporation, the manufacturing must be done within the state; if a mining corporation, the mining must be done within the state; if a railroad corporation, the railroad must be operated within the state, herein the court saying:

> "Opening an office in Waukegan and placing a safe and some office furniture therein for the convenience and use of the secretary and treasurer where he issued certificates of stock, kept the books, and the holdings of directors' meetings there, together with the other acts charged to have been done in Lake county, bear no resemblance to the powers and objects of this corporation, as set forth in the articles of incorporation. There is no pretense that the company owned any mining properties in this state, or that it was doing a mining or smelting business here. All of its mining properties were in the state of Washington and not in Illinois."

Similar in effect, though involving the consideration of an entirely different question, is the other Illinois case, where it is declared that:

> "The statute, by the term 'doing business,' has reference to the business for which the corporation was organized, and not to the form of its by-laws with reference to its relations to its own members, or a resort to the courts of this state to recover a contract liability."

In the case at bar the business transacted in this state was both continuous and vital to the well-being of the corporation. It could no more successfully operate its business without doing somewhere what it was doing in California than it could successfully operate its business without actually running its railroad. Much more closely in point are such familiar cases as People v. Horn Silver Mining Co., 105 N. Y. 77, 11 N. E. 155, and Baltic Mining Co. v. Massachusetts, and the S. S. White Dental Co. v. Massachusetts, 231 U. S. 68, 34 Sup. Ct. 15, 58 L. Ed. 127, where are affirmed the decisions of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in the same cases (207 Mass. 381, 93 N. E. 831; 212 Mass. 35, 98 N. E. 1056, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 805); while almost precisely in the point are Sleicher v. Pullman Co. (C. C.) 170 Fed. 365, where it is declared that a foreign railroad corporation which maintains offices in New York and there employs freight and passenger agents to solicit business, which also holds directors' meetings, disburses dividends, and keeps an office for the transfer of its stock there, with an assistant secretary, is doing some substantial business in the state, though that particular railroad, the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, had no trackage within the state of New York, and Stegall v. American Pigment & Chemical Co., 150 Mo. App. 251, 130 S. W. 144, where a foreign corporation owned a manufacturing plant in Illinois, but the directors' meetings were held in Missouri, the executive management was there conducted and its funds kept, and it was held that such corporation was doing business in Missouri.

It is manifest that the Secretary of State was justified in his refusal to accept the proffered papers without payment of the license tax, and the writ is therefore discharged.

LEWIS v. LEWIS. (S. F. 7850.)

1. DIVORCE 🔑308—DECREE—POWER TO MODIFY.

Under Civ. Code, § 138, providing a court granting a divorce may modify its judgment at any time during the minority of children of the marriage, by providing for their custody, education and support, the judgment may be modified, though it did not expressly reserve power to do so.

2. DIVORCE 🔑308—CUSTODY AND SUPPORT OF CHILDREN—STATUTES.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 137, 138, 196, 199, 203, 206, as to custody and support of children, etc., when there has been a decree of divorce, vesting the custody of minor children in the mother, the father is under no obligation to provide for such children any support or education beyond that which may be directed by the court granting the divorce, either in its decree or by subsequent modification.

3. DIVORCE 🔑308—DUTY OF FATHER TO SUPPORT CHILD.

Civ. Code, §§ 196, 207, confining the declared duty of support of his or her child to the parent entitled to the child's custody, apply only in the absence of any order for the child's support in a divorce action, or for maintenance or control of the child without divorce under Civ. Code, §§ 137, 199.

4. DIVORCE 🔑309—DUTY OF DIVORCED FATHER TO SUPPORT CHILD NOT IN HIS CUSTODY.

Where a divorce decree gave a child's custody to her mother and made inadequate provision for her support and maintenance, the remedy of the child to compel her father to contribute adequately to her support was not by action by her guardian ad litem against the father, but by proceeding in the original divorce suit to modify the decree to provide for such support under Civ. Code, § 138, allowing such modification.

5. DIVORCE 🔑309—SUPPORT OF CHILD—MODIFICATION OF DECREE—AGREEMENT.

The right of a child to have divorce decree modified under Civ. Code, § 138, to enforce its proper support by divorced father could not be barred by prior stipulation or agreement of the mother that she would not ask further allowance for the child, for the exercise of the statutory authority so to modify the decree could not be limited or abridged by the parties.

6. DIVORCE 🔑309—SUPPORT OF CHILD—MODIFICATION OF DECREE—REPRESENTATION OF CHILD.

Such modification of the divorce decree in the interest of the child might be ordered on application of the mother herself, notwithstanding her prior agreement that the father should not be required to contribute further.

7. DIVORCE 🔑309—SUPPORT OF CHILD—MODIFICATION OF DECREE—REPRESENTATION OF CHILD.

In case the child's mother should fail to act for her in such proceeding, the court's power might be invoked by a proper representative of the child or exercised by the court of its own motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 803.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by Jane Ellen Lewis, a minor, by her guardian ad litem, against John B. Lewis. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Herbert Choynski and James Raleigh Kelly, both of San Francisco, for appellant. C. W. Eastin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff is the minor daughter of the defendant John B. Lewis. Appearing by guardian, she brought this action to compel her father to contribute toward her support and education during her minority. Judgment was given, requiring the defendant to pay to the plaintiff, until the further order of the court, the sum of $15 per month, and also to pay $50 as counsel fees. The defendant appeals from the judgment. The record for review consists of the judgment roll alone.

The plaintiff is the issue of a marriage between John B. Lewis and Ruth A. Lewis. On July 3, 1911, Ruth A. Lewis obtained a final decree of divorce from the appellant herein. The decree awarded the "permanent and exclusive" custody and control of Jane Ellen Lewis, the plaintiff in this action, to the wife, Ruth A. Lewis. Prior to the making of the decree, the parties to the divorce suit had entered into an agreement which provided, among other things, that the wife should have the custody and control of the minor child, and that the husband should pay to the wife for the maintenance and support of herself and said minor child the sum of $1,050, in installments of $50 per month for five months, and $40 per month thereafter until the whole was paid. The wife waived all other claims against the husband or his estate. These payments had been made in full before the commencement of the present action. It is alleged and found that the plaintiff is without means, is unable by reason of her tender age to maintain, support, or educate herself, that her mother has not sufficient means or earning ability to enable her to adequately provide for the plaintiff, and that the defendant is well able to provide for her. The findings declare that in the judgment of divorce the court reserved to itself no authority to modify the terms of said judgment, and that said court "has now no jurisdiction to alter, modify, or vary the final judgment therein so as to make any other, further, or future provision for the maintenance, support, or education of the minor plaintiff herein in said action."

[1] The conclusion embodied in the language just quoted is not, as a matter of law, to be sustained. Since the decision in Harlan v. Harlan, 154 Cal. 341, 98 Pac. 32, there can be no doubt of the power of the court which has granted a divorce to modify its judgment, at any time during the minority of children of the marriage, by providing for the custody, education, and support of such children, even though the judgment may have contained no provision on the subject. No reservation in the decree itself is necessary to the exercise of this power. The authority of the court rests upon the express provisions of section 138 of the Civil Code, and was ample even before the amendment of 1905 to that section. Harlan v. Harlan, supra.

Section 196 of the Civil Code provides that:

> "The parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances. * * *"

Section 203 of the same Code declares that:

> "The abuse of parental authority is the subject of judicial cognizance in a civil action brought by the child, or by its relative within the third degree, or by the supervisors of the county where the child resides; and when the abuse is established, the child may be freed from the dominion of the parent, and the duty of support and education enforced."

Section 206 states that:

> "It is the duty of the father, the mother, and the children of any poor person who is unable to maintain himself by work, to maintain such person to the extent of their ability. * * *"

These are the sections upon which both parties have put the main stress of their argument, and it will not be necessary, for present purposes, to refer specifically to the many other sections of the Civil Code dealing with the subject of custody and support of children.

Under familiar rules of construction, the various statutory provisions are to be read together, and effect must be given to each, so far as this may fairly be done. Section 203 provides a remedy for parental abuse and for enforcing the duty of support and education. It does not, however, define the nature and extent of the duty thus to be enforced. Section 206 does declare or establish a duty or obligation. This duty runs in favor of adult children (Paxton v. Paxton, 150 Cal. 667, 89 Pac. 1083), but it may well be questioned whether the provision is intended to declare the duties of parents to their minor children. On the other hand, sections 203 and 196 are clearly limited in their application to minor children, as are numerous other sections like 136, 137, 138, 139, 199, and 207, all of which use the word "child" or "children" without the qualifying adjective "minor." See Anderson v. Anderson, 124 Cal. 48, 56 Pac. 630, 57 Pac. 81, 71 Am. St. Rep. 17. But it is not important to decide here whether the obligation defined in section 206 is one owing to minor children. As a general proposition, no one would doubt that parents are under an obligation to support their minor children. This duty rests on fundamental natural laws, and has always been recognized by the courts in the absence of any statute declaring it. Even if section 206 be taken as covering the case of minor children, its general terms are modified and controlled by the more specific provisions of section 196. And section 196, in its turn, is limited by the provisions of sections 137, 138, and 199, under which the court may give the custody of minor children to one of the spouses, and impose the burden of support on the other.

[2] Interpreting and applying the several provisions of the Code, the decisions of this court are clear to the effect that when there has been a decree of divorce, and such decree vests the custody of the minor children in the mother, the father is under no obligation to provide for such children any support or education beyond that which may be directed by the court which has granted the divorce, either in its decree or by subsequent modification. In Ex parte Miller, 109 Cal. 643, 648, 42 Pac. 428, 429, Temple, J., in a concurring opinion, used this language:

> "When a parent is deprived of the custody of his child, and, therefore, of the right to its services and earnings, * * * he is no longer liable for its support and education. This is true as a general proposition of law, and it is recognized by our Code. Section 196 of the Civil Code provides that a parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances, plainly implying that the parent does not owe that duty to a child when he is not entitled to its custody."

In Selfridge v. Paxton, 145 Cal. 713, 716, 79 Pac. 425, 426, the court quotes sections 196 and 207 of the Civil Code, and says:

> "By these sections the duty to support a child, and the liability to the third person for necessaries furnished it, are clearly confined to a parent 'entitled to the custody' of the child, and having it 'under his charge'; and no such liability attaches to a parent who has been deprived of such custody and charge."

[3] This does not mean that the natural duty of a father to provide for his minor child is, under our law, finally and absolutely terminated by an award of the custody of the child to the mother. Where such an award is made by a decree of divorce, or in an action for custody of children without divorce (Civ. Code, § 199), the court may, as we have already pointed out, provide at any time during the minority of the children for their support and education by the father who is deprived of their custody. That is what was meant, and all that was meant, by the statement in the opinion in Harlan v. Harlan, supra, that a decree of divorce "does not destroy the obligation of either parent toward the children." The obligation referred to is one to be enforced by the court which granted the divorce, and in the divorce action itself. In the absence of any order for the support and education of the children in the action for divorce, or for maintenance or control of children without divorce (sections 137, 199), the rule declared by section 196 remains, i. e., that the obligation to support the child rests only upon the parent entitled to its custody.

The distinction which we have indicated is well illustrated by two criminal cases recently decided in this court. In each the defendant had been charged, under section 270 of the Penal Code, with willfully omitting to furnish his minor child with necessary food, clothing, etc. In People v. Schlott, 162 Cal. 347, 122 Pac. 846, the custody of the child had been awarded to its mother by a decree in which she was granted a divorce from the defendant. The decree required the defendant to pay to his wife $50 per month for the support of herself and the child, and these payments the defendant had not made. The holding was that the decree of divorce imposed upon the defendant the obligation of supporting the child, although he had been deprived of its custody, and that his willful failure to comply with this obligation justified his conviction upon the criminal charge. In Matter of McMullin, 164 Cal. 504, 129 Pac. 773 (on habeas corpus), the petitioner had been held for trial for an alleged violation of the same section of the Penal Code. There the wife had obtained a divorce in the state of Nevada. The decree granted her the custody of the minor child, and required the petitioner to pay for its support. But since there had been no personal service of summons, the Nevada court had no jurisdiction to impose upon him the liability to make such payment. The result, as this court viewed it, was that the custody and control of the child had been given to the mother, without charging upon the father its support. "Under section 196 of the Civil Code," says the opinion, "this situation prima facie relieves the husband of the duty of support and casts it on the wife." The petitioner was discharged from custody.

[4-7] The authorities cited leave no avenue of escape from the conclusion that the judgment here appealed from cannot be sustained. The decree of divorce gave the custody of the plaintiff to the mother and made no provision for plaintiff's support, beyond a requirement for the payment by the defendant of sums which have been fully paid by him. The defendant is therefore under no legal obligation to support the plaintiff. The plaintiff is not, however, without remedy. The court which granted the divorce has full power to modify its decree by making such orders as may be just and proper in view of the conditions shown to exist at the time application may be made to it. The agreement of the mother that she would not ask any allowance beyond that heretofore paid her cannot bar the right of the child to have an order for proper support. "The statute conferred the authority, and its exercise could not be limited or abridged by the parties." Wilson v. Wilson, 45 Cal. 399, 405. Any proper modification of the decree of divorce, in the interest of the child, might be ordered on the application of the mother herself, even though she had agreed that the father should not be required to contribute further. Wilson v. Wilson, supra. See, also, Parkhurst v. Parkhurst, 118 Cal. 18, 22, 50 Pac. 9; Black v. Black, 149 Cal. 224, 86 Pac. 505. The suggestion that the mother might fail to seek provision for the child in the divorce action does not seem to have a very direct bearing here, since the mother is the guardian representing the minor in this action. But if the mother should fail to pursue the remedy, we do not doubt that the child's interest is such that the power to make adequate provision for it may be invoked by a proper representative of the child itself, or may be exercised by the court of its own motion. Ex parte Gordan, 95 Cal. 374, 30 Pac. 561.

EUCALYPTUS GROWERS ASS'N v. ORANGE COUNTY NURSERY & LAND CO.

SAME v. ORANGE COUNTY NURSERY & LAND CO. et al.

1. New Trial 🔑79—Grounds—Unsupported Findings—Support by Other Facts.

That the court's finding is not sustained by the evidence supports order granting new trial, unless there are other facts found, supported by evidence, on which the judgment of the trial court may rest without aid from the unsustained finding.

2. Contracts 🔑346(1)—Breach—Matter of Excuse—Pleading.

In an action for breach of contract plaintiff's failure to perform, nonexistence of or defects in subject-matter, and either a mutual mistake or a mistake of defendant's which was known or suspected at the time by plaintiff, were matters of defense, and, to be available to defendants, should have been set up in the answer.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Consolidated actions by the Eucalyptus Growers Association against the Orange County Nursery & Land Company and the American Surety Company. There was judgment for defendants, plaintiff moved for new trial, and from an order granting its motion defendants appeal. Order affirmed.

Williams, Goudge & Chandler, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Jones & Evans and Earl T. Miller, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The two actions above entitled relate to the same contract and the same controversy. With the consent of the parties and by order of the court they were consolidated for the purposes of trial, findings, and judgment. The judgment being for the defendants, the plaintiff moved for a new trial. The motion was granted, and the defendants appeal from the order.

The object of the action was to recover damages alleged to have been caused to plaintiff by the failure of the defendant, Orange County Nursery & Land Company, to perform a contract with the plaintiff whereby it agreed to plant, irrigate and cultivate eucalyptus trees in parcels of not less than 80 acres at one time, on a certain tract of land belonging to the defendant. The American Surety Company is made a party defendant to the second action solely for the reason that it became surety for the nursery company on a bond in the sum of $9,500, executed by it to the plaintiff for the faithful performance of the contract. Otherwise the two actions are based on the same facts.

The contract sued on provided that the nursery company should plant 550,000 eucalyptus trees, at least six inches in height, on section 17, township 29 south, range 25 east, in Kern county, the same to be planted in parcels of not less than 80 acres each, one parcel to be completely planted before another was begun, to irrigate, cultivate, and care for such trees for one year from the time of planting, the irrigation to include the running of the water through the main and lateral ditches to be made by the plaintiff on the land, from the pumping plants to be installed thereon by the plaintiff, and that the nursery company would guarantee that there should be standing in good condition on the land so planted, at the end of one year from the planting thereof, an average of at least 817 trees per acre. The plaintiff thereby agreed to install the necessary pumping plants and machinery and dig the main and lateral ditches required for the irrigation of the trees, to plow the land, to level it so far as was necessary to render it practically irrigable from such main and lateral ditches, and to pay the Nursery Company at the rate of $30 per acre for each acre so planted and cultivated, for the planting and care thereof for said year.

The complaint alleged that the nursery company planted the trees on only 160 acres of said tract, that it then abandoned the contract and refused further performance, that it failed properly to care for or cultivate the trees planted, or to have standing and in good condition at the end of the year 817 trees per acre thereon, that not more than 30 acres had as many as 300 trees to the acre remaining alive, that when so abandoned the land was worth less than if no trees had been planted thereon, and that the plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $19,200, besides certain moneys expended by reason of the failure of said nursery company to fulfill said contract.

The answer admits the execution of the contract and the planting of the trees on 160 acres of the land, but denies the want of care on the part of the nursery company in the cultivation or irrigation thereof, and the other allegations as to its failure to perform and as to damages. As an affirmative defense it alleges that at the time the contract was made, and ever since, the 640-acre tract of land was so impregnated with alkali that it was unfit for the culture and raising of eucalyptus trees; that plaintiff then well knew said fact, but concealed the same from said defendants, and represented to said nursery company that a thorough expert examination of the soil had been procured by plaintiff, and that the same was suitable and fit for the raising and culture of eucalyptus trees; that after the Nursery Company began the irrigation of the trees so planted, and about September 1, 1909, the alkali in the soil killed the trees; and that this rendered the further planting of trees in said soil useless.

The court found that prior to the execution of the contract the plaintiff to induce the nursery company to execute the same, stated to said nursery company that said plaintiff "had had said land examined for alkali; that it was suitable for eucalyptus trees, and did not contain alkali in sufficient quantities to affect such trees"; that both parties in good faith believed that said land was suitable for such trees, and did not contain sufficient alkali to affect them, and they both acted on that belief; that in fact plaintiff had obtained no analysis of the soil, and had no information sufficient to warrant it in making said statements to the nursery company; that the land was so fully impregnated with alkali that it was impossible to grow eucalyptus trees thereon, as required of the nursery company by the contract.

[1] These findings tend to establish the defense that the contract had been procured by fraud on the part of the plaintiff. It may here be observed that the answer does not allege that the defendants believed these representations to be true, nor that they relied on them in executing the contract, and there is doubt if the fraud is well pleaded. In an opinion included in the transcript the court below stated that the new trial was granted on the ground that the evidence did not show that the above-quoted misrepresentation was made to induce execution of the contract. The defendants, as we understand their brief, concede that the statement in question was not made until after the contract was made, and hence that it did not induce its execution, and that the finding that it was made for that purpose is not sustained by the evidence. This would support the order granting the new trial, unless as defendants contend, there are other facts found which are supported by the evidence, upon which the judgment in their favor may rest, without aid from the finding as to fraud.

Giving the findings a liberal interpretation in favor of the defendants these facts are as follows: Both parties, when they executed the contract, believed that the soil was suitable for eucalyptus trees, and they knew nothing to the contrary. The contract was made by both parties on the faith of the assumed fact that eucalyptus trees would grow well on the land, if planted, irrigated, and cared for after the usual manner of good husbandry. In fact it was so full of alkali that such trees would not grow thereon, unless the alkali were eliminated from the soil. This could not be done except by grading the surface and then flooding it with a large body of water so as to dissolve the alkali and then to carry it away by allowing the water to run off. Under the terms of the contract, interpreted by the aid of surrounding circumstances and the subsequent conduct of the parties with reference to it, the plaintiff was to furnish pumping plants, including the wells, of capacity sufficient to obtain the water that would be required to enable the nursery company to carry out the contract. Plaintiff was also to do the leveling of the land necessary for that purpose. It did not level or grade the land so that it could be flooded to dissolve the alkali, nor did it install pumping plants that would supply the water to do the flooding. The water the pumps would raise was barely enough to moisten the soil of the 160 acres that was planted. With the means at hand, including everything that was to be done by the defendants, and without the other things aforesaid to be done and furnished by plaintiff, but which it did not do or furnish, it was impossible to grow eucalyptus trees on the land and have them standing in good condition at one year from the planting, or at all.

[2, 3] The defendants cite no authorities, nor do they clearly state their position. Apparently, as we surmise, they rely on one or more of three propositions:

(1) That where one party to a contract, by the failure to perform his part thereof, renders the subsequent performance by the second party impossible, the second party is excused from further performance, and is not liable in damages for any breach on his part thus brought about. Civ. Code, § 1511; Griffith v. Happersberger, 86 Cal. 613, 25 Pac. 137, 487; Houghton v. Steele, 58 Cal. 425; Antonelle v. Kennedy, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 309, 73 Pac. 966; Tuohy v. Moore, 133 Cal. 523, 65 Pac. 1107.

(2) Where parties contract with respect to a subject-matter, upon the assumption that it exists and is of the character necessary to the doing of the things agreed to be done upon it, and it turns out that it does not exist at all, or that it has not the qualities supposed and necessary, so that the doing of the thing contracted for is, in the real state of the case, impossible, neither party is bound to its performance. Thus, in Clifford v. Watts, L. R. 5 Com. P. 585, the defendant had leased plaintiff's land, believed to contain pipe clay, and had agreed to dig annually therefrom 1,000 tons of pipe clay. To a suit for the royalties upon the clay which defendant had agreed, but failed, to dig, the defendant pleaded that it was impossible to do so, for that the land did not contain so much, and that this was not known to him at the time of contracting. This was held to be a good defense. Willis, J., said:

> "I am not prepared to say that there may not be cases in which a man may have contracted to do something which in the present state of scientific knowledge may be wholly impossible, and yet he may have so contracted as to warrant the possibility of its performance by means of some new discovery, or be liable in damages for the nonperformance, and cannot set up the defense that the thing was impossible. But, before we arrive at such a conclusion, we must be satisfied, if no other reasonable construction suggests itself, that the party really did intend to warrant that to be possible which was impossible."

And Brett, J., said:

> "Here both parties might well have supposed that there was clay under the land. They agree on the assumption that it is there; and the covenant is applicable only if there be clay; it does not amount to a warranty on the part of the grantee that there was clay, or to an engagement to pay the royalty although it should turn out that there was none."

See, also, Mineral, etc., Co. v. Howard, 172 Cal. 291, 156 Pac. 458; Nordyke v. Kehlor, 155 Mo. 643, 56 S. W. 287, 78 Am. St. Rep. 600; Stewart v. Stone, 127 N. Y. 507, 28 N. E. 595, 14 L. R. A. 215; Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 65, 7 Am. Rep. 415.

(3) That the contract and guaranty was executed in consequence of a mistake as to the quality of the soil, either a mutual mistake, or a mistake of the nursery company which was known or suspected at the time by the plaintiff. Civ. Code, §§ 3399, 1577.

These propositions do not aid the defendants as the case now stands. Assuming them to be sound in law, which we need not decide, they fall within the category of excuses for nonperformance, and they are excuses not apparent on the face of the contract, nor embraced within the facts alleged in the complaint. They are therefore matters of defense, and, to be available to the defendants, they must be set up in the answer. The answers contain no allegations of the facts necessary to support either of these propositions. It follows that they cannot be advanced in support of this appeal, or as reasons why a new trial should not have been granted. The court below was correct in granting the new trial because of the failure to prove the only matter of defense which the defendants had attempted to plead.

Before proceeding with the new trial the defendants should have leave to amend their answers as they may be advised.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

NORTHWESTERN PORTLAND CEMENT CO. v. ATLANTIC PORTLAND CEMENT CO. et al. (S. F. 7048.)

1. Corporations 🔑123(11), 149 — Stock — Ownership—Pledge—Trustee—Existence —Evidence.

The affixing of the word "trustee" to the name of holder of shares of stock in a corporation does not, in and of itself, impart to any one dealing with such holder notice that he is not the owner of the stock, or at least that he has not authority to sell or hypothecate it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 539–546.]

2. Courts 🔑93(1) — Previous Decisions as Controlling—Rule of Property.

Where decisions have established the rule that the affixing of the word "trustee" to the name of the holder of shares of corporate stock does not impart notice that such holder has not authority to deal with the stock, they must be considered as establishing a rule of property, and a change of decision is precluded by the doctrine of stare decisis.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 336.]

3. Notice 🔑15 — Constructive Notice — Statute—Questions of Fact.

Whether a party has notice of "circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact," and whether "by prosecuting such inquiry he might have learned such fact," which are elements of constructive notice as defined by Civ. Code, § 19, are questions of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Notice, Cent. Dig. § 41.]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑996 — REVIEW — FINDINGS.

Findings of ultimate facts are binding on appeal, not only when there is direct conflict regarding the probative facts, but when those facts are fairly susceptible to opposing inferences.

5. CORPORATIONS 🔑123(16)—STOCK—PLEDGE —TITLE—CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE—EVIDENCE.

In an action involving beneficial title to corporate stock pledged with the defendant, evidence held to show that the defendant acted in good faith and in the reasonable belief that the pledgor, although described as trustee, was the actual owner of the stock and authorized to pledge it.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1071(6)—HARMLESS ERROR—FINDINGS—CONFLICTING EQUITIES.

In an action involving the beneficial title to corporate stock, as the defendant's rights as the pledgee of the stock in good faith from the holder and apparent owner are superior to those of plaintiff, the owner of an undisclosed equity, failure of the court to find upon the issue of plaintiff's beneficial ownership is immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4239; Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 940, 942.]

7. CORPORATIONS 🔑123(11) — STOCK TRANSFERRED AS PLEDGED—TITLE.

Although Civ. Code, § 2888, provides that a lien or a contract for a lien transfers no title to the property subject to the lien, the transfer of corporate stock in pledge does vest in the pledgee a "special property" in the stock pledged, which is a legal interest sufficient to invoke the rule protecting bona fide purchasers.

8. CORPORATIONS 🔑123(4)—STOCK TRANSFERRED AS PLEDGE—TITLE.

Although Civ. Code, § 324, provides that the transfer of shares of stock is not valid except as to the parties until it is entered upon the books of the corporation, the delivery of an indorsed certificate passes title, except as against purchasers or incumbrancers without notice, and a transfer upon the books of the corporation is not essential in the creation of a valid pledge.

9. ESTOPPEL 🔑75 — CLOTHING ANOTHER WITH APPARENT TITLE.

Where a pledgee took stock in good faith from the owner of the legal title, the beneficial owner of the stock who had permitted the pledgor to hold apparent title and power of disposition is estopped from asserting its title as against the pledgee, as the pledgee has the superior equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 192–195.]

Action by the Northwestern Portland Cement Company against the Atlantic Portland Cement Company and others. From a judgment for defendant American Bridge Company, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco (Geo. J. Hatfield, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. J. C. Campbell and Walter Shelton, both of San Francisco (J. C. Campbell and Weaver, Shelton & Levy, all of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff brought this action to establish its ownership of, and to recover, 2,800 shares of the capital stock of Bellingham Bay & British Columbia Railroad Company, evidenced by certificate number 67. The action was dismissed as to all of the defendants except American Bridge Company of New York, which claimed to hold said certificate and shares as a pledge. Under stipulation of the parties, the 2,800 shares of stock were sold for $28,000, and the purchase price deposited in savings banks to abide the final outcome of this litigation. The trial resulted in a judgment that defendant American Bridge Company was entitled to the payment of the sums so deposited, with interest thereon. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Prior to the transaction which led to this suit, William J. Dingee was the principal stockholder in, and the president of, several corporations engaged in the manufacture of cement. Among these were the Northwestern Portland Cement Company, the plaintiff, Atlantic Portland Cement Company, a California corporation, Atlantic Portland Cement Company, a Pennsylvania corporation, and Santa Cruz Portland Cement Company. Bellingham Bay & British Columbia Railroad Company was a corporation operating a line of railroad in the state of Washington. Twenty-eight hundred and eighty-one shares of its stock stood on the books of said railroad company in the name of "William J. Dingee, trustee," and certificates had been issued to him by that designation. In February, 1908, the Atlantic Portland Cement companies were indebted to the defendant American Bridge Company in the sum of $247,000, or thereabouts, a balance, due for labor and materials furnished to said Atlantic companies in the construction of their plant in Pennsylvania. Payment of this obligation had been guaranteed by William J. Dingee and I. J. Bachman. The bridge company was pressing for payment of the account, and on the 10th of February, 1908, an agreement was entered into, which provided that in consideration of the extension of time for the payment of said obligation, the Atlantic companies, Dingee, and Bachman agreed to turn over and deliver to the bridge company certain securities, consisting of bonds of various companies and 2,800 shares of the capital stock of Bellingham Bay & British Columbia Railroad Company. The securities were delivered in pursuance of this agreement, a certificate for 2,800 shares of stock in the railroad company having been issued in the name of "William J. Dingee, trustee," and indorsed by Dingee in that form.

The complaint alleged that the plaintiff was the real owner of said stock, and that Dingee held the same in trust for plaintiff, and had no real interest therein except as such trustee; that the bridge company, at the time of taking said certificate, had full knowledge and notice that said certificate and the shares of stock evidenced thereby were not owned by Dingee, that Dingee had no right or authority to deliver the same to the bridge company, and that the plaintiff was the owner of such stock. These allegations were denied by the answer. The court made no finding on the issue of plaintiff's ownership, but found that the bridge company had no knowledge or notice whatsoever of any ownership, equity, right, or claim in said certificate or shares by plaintiff, or by any person except Dingee, and had no knowledge or notice of any fact sufficient to put it on inquiry as to any right or claim of plaintiff or of any other person than said Dingee.

[1] The appellant's main attack is upon the finding that the bridge company took the stock in pledge without notice or means of knowledge of plaintiff's equitable claim. Whatever may be the law in other jurisdictions, it has long been settled in this state that the affixing of the word "trustee" to the name of the holder of shares of stock in a corporation does not, in and of itself, impart to any one dealing with such holder notice that he is not the owner of the stock, or, at least, that he has not authority to sell or hypothecate it. Brewster v. Sime, 42 Cal. 139; Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 99; Fletcher v. Kidder, 163 Cal. 769, 127 Pac. 73.

[2] Even if we were inclined to question the soundness of these decisions, they must be considered as establishing a rule of property, on the faith of which, no doubt, many transactions have been entered into. Under these circumstances, a change of decision is precluded by the doctrine of stare decisis.

[3] It is, however, argued by the appellant that there were other circumstances which, together with the fact that the stock stood in the name of William J. Dingee, trustee, force the conclusion that the bridge company took with constructive notice of plaintiff's claims. It appears that the demand of the American Bridge Company against the Atlantic companies was long overdue. Mr. Connell, the treasurer of the bridge company, came to San Francisco to obtain payment or satisfactory security. Together with Mr. J. C. Campbell, attorney for the bridge company, he entered into negotiations with Mr. Dingee, who, apparently, was regarded as the person principally interested in the ownership and management of the several cement companies. Mr. Dingee owned certain real estate in Redwood City. Mr. Campbell, acting for the bridge company, demanded that Mr. Dingee give the bridge company a mortgage on this property. To this demand Mr. Dingee, under the advice of his counsel, refused to accede, taking the position that the recording of a mortgage on his property would seriously injure his credit and thus be detrimental to his interests. Mr. Campbell stating that, unless the mortgage were given, the bridge company would institute suit, Mr. Dingee said that he had other security which he could furnish. He thereupon offered to give to the bridge company, as collateral for its claim, the bonds above mentioned, together with the 2,800 shares of Bellingham Bay & British Columbia Railroad Company stock. This was accepted, and the agreement providing for the extension of payment and the pledge of these securities was entered into. The securities were delivered, and they were held thereafter by the bridge company as security for its claim, a large part of which remains unpaid. Mr. Dingee, at the time of offering these securities, requested Mr. Connell to say nothing about the fact of his having offered or given them. It is upon these facts, coupled with the further circumstance that the bridge company knew that Dingee was president of the plaintiff, Northwestern Company, and of various other cement companies, that the appellant makes its claim that the creditor took the security with notice. There is no suggestion that any officer or agent of the defendant was actually aware that plaintiff was interested in the stock. The testimony of those who took part in the transaction is that they assumed and believed that Dingee owned the shares, or that he had the right to pledge them. We need not here decide whether a trial court or a jury might have found that the circumstances were such as to put the bridge company upon inquiry. The finding was the other way. Whether a party has notice of "circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact," and whether "by prosecuting such inquiry, he might have learned such fact" (Civ. Code, § 19), are themselves questions of fact to be determined by the jury or the trial court. Brewster v. Sime, supra; Thompson v. Toland, supra; Renton, Holmes & Co. v. Monnier, 77 Cal. 449, 456, 19 Pac. 820.

[4] Findings of ultimate facts are binding upon appeal, not only when there is a direct conflict regarding the probative facts, but when those facts are fairly susceptible to opposing inferences. The circumstances upon which the appellant relies, mainly, to show notice are the form of the certificate, the fact that Dingee was in financial difficulties, and that he requested that the transaction remain undisclosed. Certainly it cannot be said that these circumstances would necessarily raise a suspicion that Dingee was not the owner of the stock which he was asserting his right to pledge. In view of the holding in Brewster v. Sime, supra, it may well be doubted whether any weight whatever is to be attached to the form of the certificate, either alone or in connection with the other facts.

[5] But, granting that this circumstance may be regarded in connection with others, we find nothing in the whole transaction which would prevent the conclusion that the bridge company acted in entire good faith and in the belief, reasonable under the circumstances, that Dingee was the actual owner of the stock and authorized to pledge it. It is not unusual for a debtor to possess and furnish security for a claim, although he may be unable to pay it at maturity. Nor is a request for secrecy regarding the transaction necessarily inconsistent with an honest purpose on the debtor's part, or good faith on that of the creditor.

[6] Under the foregoing views, the failure of the court to find upon the issue of plaintiff's beneficial ownership (which is assigned as error) becomes immaterial. The defendant's rights depend upon its acquiring the stock in good faith from the holder and apparent owner, and such rights are superior to those of the owner of an undisclosed equity.

[7] The appellant makes the point that the rule protecting bona fide purchasers is applicable only where the later claimant has acquired a legal, and not a mere equitable, title. Dupont v. Wertheman, 10 Cal. 354, 368; Taylor v. Weston, 77 Cal. 534, 537, 20 Pac. 62. It is urged that the bridge company acquired no more than an equitable right in the shares of stock because: (a) It was only a pledgee; and (b), the transfer to it in pledge was not entered on the books of the corporation. On the first proposition it is said, and truly said, that a pledge does not transfer title to the property. Civ. Code, § 2888; Haber v. Brown, 101 Cal. 445, 452, 35 Pac. 1035. But it does vest in the pledgee a "special property" in the chattels pledged (Williams v. Ashe, 111 Cal. 180, 43 Pac. 595), and this is a legal interest (Wells v. Archer, 10 Serg. & R. [Pa.] 412, 13 Am. Dec. 682; Douglas v. People's Bank, 86 Ky. 176, 5 S. W. 420, 9 Am. St. Rep. 276).

[8] Nor is it correct to say that a legal title or right is not vested under a sale or pledge of stock by delivery of a certificate duly indorsed without entry in the corporate books. The provision of section 324 of the Civil Code is that shares of stock "may be transferred by indorsement by signature of the proprietor, his agent, attorney, or legal representative, and the delivery of the certificate; but such transfer is not valid, except as to the parties thereto, until the same is * * * entered upon the books of the corporation. * * *" The effect of this provision, as construed by this court, is analogous to that of the statutes with reference to the recording of instruments affecting real property. The delivery of the indorsed certificate passes title, but such title cannot be asserted against purchasers or incumbrancers who have no notice of the transfer. Ashton v. Zeila M. Co., 134 Cal. 408, 410, 66 Pac. 494. "It is not the law of this state, nor is it the law generally, that a transfer upon the books of the corporation is essential to the creation of a valid pledge." Spreckels v. Nevada Bank, 113 Cal. 272, 278, 45 Pac. 329, 331 [33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348]; Weston v. Bear River, etc., Co., 6 Cal. 425; People v. Elmore, 35 Cal. 653.

[9] But beyond all this, if we assume that defendant's rights are equitable merely, the equities of the parties are not equal. The defendant having taken the stock in good faith from the owner of the legal title, the appellant, which had permitted Dingee to hold the apparent title to, and power of disposition over, the shares, is estopped from asserting its title as against the defendant. Fowles v. National Bank of California, 167 Cal. 653, 140 Pac. 271; McNeil v. Tenth National Bank, 46 N. Y. 325, 7 Am. Rep. 341.

It may be added that in the various cases (Brewster v. Sime, supra; Thompson v. Toland, supra; Arnold v. Johnson, 66 Cal. 402, 5 Pac. 796; Fowles v. National Bank of California, supra), in which this court has upheld the right of a bona fide pledgee to hold stock as against the undisclosed beneficial owner, the pledge had apparently been accomplished by a mere delivery of the indorsed certificate without transfer upon the corporate books. It is true that the precise point here urged, i. e., that the pledgee was the holder of a mere equity, was not specifically considered, but the decision, in each case, amounted to a ruling that the delivery of the indorsed certificate was sufficient to vest the pledgee with a right which he could assert against one who claimed to be the real owner of the shares standing in the name of the pledgor.

Ex parte BARMORE. (Cr. 2040.)

1. Municipal Corporations 🔑589—Police Power—Regulation of Business.

Under the police power the legislative authority may restrict the use of the property or the conduct of business to the extent reasonably thought necessary to promote the public health, safety, or comfort, but arbitrary or oppressive restrictions having no reasonable adaptations to these ends will be condemned as in conflict with fundamental constitutional rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1308, 1319.]

2. Municipal Corporations 🔑63(1)—Police Power—Judicial Review.

The legislative determination that a given regulation of the use of property or the conduct of business is necessary in the public interest will be given great weight in any judicial inquiry into the validity of the enactment, and the courts will not interfere with the discretion of the lawmaking body unless it is plain that needless oppression is worked and constitutional rights invaded.

3. Municipal Corporations ⟹611—Police Power—Regulation of Business.

Under Const. art. 11, § 11, giving the city of Los Angeles authority to make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, an ordinance making it unlawful to solicit custom or patronage upon any boat or in any depot for any hotel or for the transportation of persons or baggage, etc., for hire was a valid exercise of the police power, since even lawful occupations are subject to reasonable regulations, and one of the recognized modes of regulation is by prescribing the places where such occupation may or may not be conducted.

4. Municipal Corporations ⟹589—Police Power—Question of Fact.

The question whether a limitation upon the conduct of a business has a reasonable relation to the accomplishment of a legitimate public purpose is largely one of fact which must be decided in view of the particular legislation and the circumstances to which it is applied.

5. Constitutional Law ⟹154(1) — Police Power—Obligation of Contracts.

The exercise of the police power is neither abridged nor delayed by reason of existing contracts.

In Bank. Application of E. H. Barmore for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Gray, Barker & Bowen, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Warren L. Williams and Erwin W. Widney, both of Los Angeles, for respondent. Henry T. Gage and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

SLOSS, J. The petitioner is held in custody on a charge of violating an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, and seeks his release by means of a writ of habeas corpus.

The ordinance is one "regulating the business of soliciting custom or patronage upon the public streets, boats, railway trains and depots, and providing for the issuance of permits therefor." The provision here in question is contained in section 9 of the ordinance, which, so far as it need be quoted, declares that:

"It shall be unlawful for any person to solicit custom or patronage upon any boat, * * * or in any depot, * * * for any hotel, * * * or for the transportation of persons or baggage, goods, wares, or merchandise for hire. * * *"

The petitioner, E. H. Barmore, is the president of the Los Angeles Transfer Company, a corporation, which has a contract with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company under which said transfer company and its agents are authorized to enter the cars and the depot of said railroad company to solicit custom and patronage. The complaint under which Barmore is held charges that he solicited custom and patronage for the transportation of persons and baggage in the Southern Pacific depot in the city of Los Angeles.

[1] The petitioner contends that section 9 of the ordinance is unreasonable and void, and this is the only question presented for decision. Under the direct grant of article 11, § 11, of the Constitution, the city of Los Angeles has authority to "make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." The nature, extent, and limitations of the police power have been so frequently and so exhaustively discussed by this court and others that a mere statement of a few well-settled principles will suffice. It is familiar law that under this power the legislative authority may restrict the use of property or the conduct of business to such extent as may reasonably be thought necessary to promote the public health, safety, or comfort. Arbitrary or oppressive restrictions, having no reasonable adaptations to these ends, will be condemned by the courts as in conflict with fundamental constitutional rights.

[2] But the legislative determination that a given regulation of the use of property or of the conduct of a business is necessary in the public interest will be given great weight in any judicial inquiry into the validity of the enactment, and the courts will not interfere with the discretion of the lawmaking body "except where the case be plain that needless oppression is worked and constitutional rights invaded." In re Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 372, 77 Pac. 180, 182.

[3] Section 9 of the ordinance under review is designed to regulate the business of transporting passengers or goods, by prohibiting solicitation of patronage therefor in certain public places, including railroad stations. The business is, no doubt, a legitimate and useful one. But even lawful occupations are subject to reasonable regulation, and one of the recognized modes of regulation is by prescribing the places where a given occupation may or may not be conducted. Ex parte Quong Wo, 161 Cal. 220, 118 Pac. 714. The comfort and convenience of the many persons who have occasion to pass through railroad stations are directly affected by the manner in which transfer facilities for themselves and their baggage are offered. In enacting this ordinance the city council may well have thought that active solicitation of patronage within depots would interfere unduly with the peaceable and convenient use of such depots by arriving and departing passengers. We cannot say that such a view is unreasonable, or that the prohibition of such solicitation is not a proper means of promoting the comfort and convenience of the traveling public and protecting it from the annoyance of importunate requests for employment.

This court has not heretofore had occasion to pass upon restrictions of this precise kind. Similar ordinances and statutes have, however, come under judicial review elsewhere, and the decided weight of authority, particularly that of more recent date, supports the validity of such enactments. Emerson v. McNeil, 84 Ark. 552, 106 S. W. 479, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 715; Williams v. State, 85 Ark. 464, 108 S. W. 838, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 482, 122 Am. St. Rep. 47; Chillicothe v. Brown, 38 Mo. App. 609; Ladonia v. Poor, 73 Mo. App. 465; Seattle v. Hurst, 50 Wash. 424, 97 Pac. 454, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 169; Seattle T. & T. Co. v. City of Seattle, 86 Wash. 594, 150 Pac. 1134. The case of Williams v. State, just cited, was reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error. The judgment of the Supreme Court of Arkansas was affirmed. Williams v. Arkansas, 217 U. S. 79, 30 Sup. Ct. 493, 54 L. Ed. 673, 18 Ann. Cas. 865. The higher court quoted approvingly from the opinion of the state court, and a part of the passage quoted is appropriate for repetition here:

> "The Legislature clearly has the power to make regulation for the convenience and comfort of travelers on railroads, and this appears to be a reasonable regulation for their benefit. It prevents annoyance from the importunities of drummers. * * *
> " 'This statute is not an unreasonable restriction upon the privilege one should enjoy to solicit for his lawful business, which, it is rightly urged, is an incident to any business. It does not prevent any one from advertising his business or from soliciting patronage, except upon trains, etc. This privilege is denied him for the public good. It is a principle which underlies every reasonable exercise of the police power that private rights must yield to the common welfare.' " Williams v. Arkansas, 217 U. S. 89, 30 Sup. Ct. 495, 54 L. Ed. 673, 18 Ann. Cas. 865, quoting from Williams v. State, 85 Ark. 470, 108 S. W. 840, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 482, 122 Am. St. Rep. 47.

We think the sound view is that declared by the cases which we have cited, although there are a few decisions holding to the contrary. Napman v. People, 19 Mich. 352; Cosgrove v. Augusta, 103 Ga. 835, 31 S. E. 445, 42 L. R. A. 711, 68 Am. St. Rep. 149.

[4] The petitioner cites a number of cases in which this court has overthrown municipal ordinances or statutes which sought to prohibit the carrying on of business in a certain place or in a given manner. There is no occasion to review these cases in detail. They dealt with occupations and with restrictions bearing no resemblance to those here involved. The question whether a limitation upon the conduct of a business has a reasonable relation to the accomplishment of a legitimate public purpose is one that must be decided upon a view of the particular legislation and the circumstances to which it is applied. The question presented is largely one of fact.

[5] It is of no importance in this inquiry that the Los Angeles Transfer Company had a contract with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company under which its agents were authorized to solicit in the depot of the railroad company. If the city was authorized, in the exercise of its police power, to prohibit solicitation within the depot, its right to so legislate could, of course, not be limited by any contract made between private parties.

> "All contracts are subject to this power, the exercise of which is neither abridged nor delayed by reason of existing contracts." Seattle v. Hurst, supra.

See, also, Chillicothe v. Brown, supra.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

In re HUNTOON'S ESTATE. (S. F. 7473.)

1. Executors and Administrators ⇨231—Mortgage Debt of Estate.

Where decedent's mortgage debt had not been presented as a claim against her estate, though it still remained a lien on the land, her executor was under no obligation to pay it out of the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 804, 828, 829.]

2. Executors and Administrators ⇨295—Payment of Legacy.

Where the executor of a will had on hand about $25,000 of the estate in cash, though his own cash legacy of $10,000 should be paid out of it, another cash legatee was entitled to the immediate payment of $8,000 of her legacy, which would leave more than enough cash on hand to meet all probable expenses of administration.

3. Executors and Administrators ⇨314(8)—Valuation of Estate.

The valuation of a decedent's estate in the executor's inventory and appraisement was prima facie evidence of the value of the property on a legatee's petition for partial distribution.

4. Executors and Administrators ⇨314(11)—Allowance to Legatee of Portion of Interest.

On petition for partial distribution by a residuary legatee, where the court was warranted in inferring from the evidence that it would be necessary to sell all of the property of the estate, and to make a final distribution of the residue in cash, it was proper to allow petitioner, who had been diligent in the assertion of her rights, a portion of her interest out of the idle cash on hand.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thos. C. Denny, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Laura M. N. Huntoon, deceased. Petition by Mary Emma Williams, a residuary legatee, asking for partial distribution to her of an amount on hand in cash, opposed by Ernest D. Woodman, as residuary legatee and devisee. From a decree distributing a sum to petitioner on account of her interest as residuary legatee, Woodman appeals. Decree affirmed.

Wilson & Wilson, of San Francisco, and Rolfe L. Thompson, of Santa Rosa, for appellant. James W. Oates, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Laura M. N. Huntoon died, leaving a will which was admitted to probate in the superior court of Sonoma county, and letters testamentary thereon were issued to Ernest D. Woodman. By her will the testatrix bequeathed to her sister, Mary Emma Williams, the respondent herein, the sum of $10,000. There was a bequest of the same amount to Ernest D. Woodman, a nephew of the testatrix, and the executor of her will. The residue of the estate was devised and bequeathed in undivided seventh parts, one part to said Mary Emma Williams, one to Ernest D. Woodman, and the others, respectively, to two brothers of the testatrix, to a niece, to the children of a deceased brother, and to the children of a deceased sister. Notice to creditors was published, and the time for presentation of claims expired without any claims having been presented against the estate. The executor filed an inventory and appraisement, which showed personal property valued at $74,726.16, and real estate valued at $42,344.28, a total of $117,070.44. Among the items of personal property were two deposits in savings banks, aggregating $11,467.72. Mrs. Williams claimed the ownership of these deposits as a gift from the decedent, and commenced action against the executor and the savings banks to recover said deposits. These actions are still pending on appeal. The money legacy of $10,000 to Mrs. Williams has been paid by order of court. The executor's first annual account was settled and allowed on June 8, 1914. It showed payments of $1,000 to the executor on account of his commissions, and of $1,000 to his attorneys on account of their fees.

On March 9, 1915, Mary E. Williams filed her petition, asking for partial distribution to her of the sum of something over $11,000, which, as she alleged, was on hand in cash, and could be distributed to her without loss or injury to the creditors of the estate. Woodman, appearing as residuary legatee and devisee, opposed the application. The court made its decree, reciting that the estate is of the value of over $100,000, and is but little indebted; that all claims have been paid; that the executor has in his hands the sum of $25,000 in cash that is not needed in the administration; that the interest of petitioner as a residuary legatee will be more than $8,000; that the estate is in litigation, and will not be ready to finally settle and distribute for considerable time; and that $8,000 can be paid out of the estate to the petitioner on account of her interest as residuary legatee without loss or injury to the creditors of said estate or to said estate. The decree accordingly distributed such sum of $8,000 to the petitioner on account of her interest as residuary legatee. From this decree Woodman appeals.

[1, 2] It appeared in evidence that a part of the personal property of the estate had been converted into cash. Certain shares of stock had been sold and some promissory notes collected. At the time of the hearing the executor had on hand about $25,000. It is contended that the court was not justified in finding that this sum of money was "not needed in the administration." The appellant claims that out of this sum his own cash legacy of $10,000 should be paid, and that there is a mortgage debt of $10,000 on a parcel of real property belonging to the estate. But the mortgage debt had not been presented as a claim, and, while it still remained a lien on the land, the executor was under no obligation to pay it out of the estate. In fact, he testified that in his judgment it would not be advisable to pay the mortgage. So far as the appellant's legacy is concerned, he has not applied for an order directing its payment. But assuming that it should be paid, there will still remain on hand the sum of $15,000, and the payment of $8,000 to the respondent will leave more than enough cash to meet all probable expenses of administration.

[3, 4] The appellant also contends that the finding that the estate is of the value of over $100,000 is not sustained by the evidence. But the inventory shows a value of over $100,000, after deducting the deposits in litigation. Furthermore, it was testified that the income of the estate during the two years prior to the filing of the petition for partial distribution had been about $5,000 per annum. It is true that the executor testified that the real property had depreciated in value. The valuation in the inventory was, however, prima facie evidence of the value of the property (Estate of Carver, 123 Cal. 102, 106, 55 Pac. 770), and even though some allowance were made for the decline in value of the real estate, the evidence still warranted a conclusion that the residue would amount to enough to make it proper to distribute to the petitioner the sum of $8,000 without affecting the shares of the other residuary legatees and devisees. Her ultimate interest will undoubtedly be worth considerably more than this sum, and we see no objection to the partial distribution to her on account. It does not appear that such distribution would be in any way injurious to other persons interested in the estate, as was the case in Estate of Glenn, 153 Cal. 77, 94 Pac. 230. There might be some ground for objecting to the payment of one residuary legatee and devisee in cash, if the others would thereby be compelled to take their shares in undivided interests in real property. No one of the beneficiaries to whom the residue is given has a right superior to that of the others. But the court was warranted in inferring from the evidence here introduced that it would be necessary to sell all of the property and to make a final distribution of the residue in cash. This being so, it was not improper to allow the petitioner, who had been diligent in the assertion of her rights, a portion of her interest out of the idle cash on hand.

RIVERSIDE LAND CO. v. JARVIS et al.

1. Waters and Water Courses ⇒249—Irrigation—Water Dedicated to Public Use.

Water dedicated to public use cannot lawfully be converted into a private use so as to create a private preferential right thereto for the benefit of a special parcel of land.

2. Waters and Water Courses ⇒252—Irrigation—Water Dedicated to Public Use—Conversion to Private Use.

The articles of incorporation and by-laws of a water company whose predecessors had dedicated the water to public use provided that certificates of its stock should express on their face the number of shares for which and the tract of land to which they should be attached, on the basis of two shares of stock to each acre of land, the tract being in the possession and ownership of the person to whom the certificates should be issued, and the by-laws provided that certificates of stock should be transferable only with the land to which they were attached, and that the party asking for a transfer of stock should present to the secretary his conveyance of the land before the issuance of the new certificate. Held, that the articles and by-laws did not create a private preferential right for the benefit of a special parcel of land in the water so dedicated.

3. Waters and Water Courses ⇒253—Irrigation—Private Rights—Appurtenances to Land.

Private rights in water dedicated to public use by a water company would be appurtenances to the land, entitling it to receive water from the system, and the service of the water to the land must have been continued by the company in any event, as after a sale, since it was the owner's right to have it so continued.

4. Waters and Water Courses ⇒249—Irrigation—Dedication of Water to Public Use—Diversion.

If a water right was a public right pertaining to land by reason of the fact that it was a part of the territory to which a public use for irrigation had attached, it was the duty of the water company, whose predecessors had dedicated the water to public use, to continue to supply to the land a reasonable proportion of the water so dedicated, and, whether dedicated to public use upon a class of lands not all contiguous, or upon all lands within a defined territory, such water could not lawfully be diverted to other lands by the agent in charge of the use, but could only be supplied to the land to which it was dedicated.

5. Waters and Water Courses ⇒234—Irrigation Company—Stock—Validity—Restraint on Alienation.

An agreement, between persons entitled to the first right to the use of water, to form a corporation to acquire the supply and distributing canals, and that the articles of incorporation shall provide that stock is to be issued only to the owners of the land entitled to the water, two shares of stock for each acre of land, that the stock shall be attached to such land and shall be transferable only with the land and upon the presentation of a conveyance thereof from the former holder, and that such stockholder shall have the first right to the water, is not unreasonable, so that the articles and by-laws made to carry the agreement into effect are not an unreasonable restraint on alienation of the stock, do not violate Civ. Code, § 324, as amended by St. 1895, p. 118, providing that shares of stock may be transferred by indorsement and delivery of the certificate, and are not contrary to the general policy of the law, in view of the amendment of 1895 to the section, providing that a corporation to sell or distribute water for irrigation or domestic use may declare in its by-laws that the water shall be distributed only to stockholders, that the stock shall be appurtenant to the land described in the certificate, shall only be transferred with such land, and shall pass with a conveyance thereof.

6. Specific Performance ⇒70—Contract to Transfer Stock.

A suit for specific performance of a contract to transfer corporate stock may be maintained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 203.]

7. Waters and Water Courses ⇒234—Corporations — Stockholder's Agreement — Construction.

The articles of incorporation, by-laws, and certificates of stock of a water company, organized to acquire a water supply and distributing canals, provided that certificates of stock should express on their face the number of shares for which and the tract of land to which they should be attached, on the basis of two shares of stock to each acre of land, the land being in the possession and ownership of the person to whom the certificates are to be issued, that certificates of stock should be transferable only with the land to which they were attached, that the party asking for a transfer of stock should present to the secretary his conveyance of the land before the issuance of the new certificate, and that the certificates were transferable only on the books of the company by indorsement on the certificates and their surrender. Held that, taken together, the articles, by-laws, and certificates of stock were in effect an agreement between the stockholder and the company that the stock should be transferable only with the land, and, conversely, that a transfer of the land by sale or foreclosure should pass to the grantee the right or equitable title to the stock.

8. Waters and Water Courses ⇒234 — Contracts—Enforcement by Third Party.

The grantee of the land, becoming the equitable owner of the stock, may enforce the contract under Civ. Code, § 1559, providing that a contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him.

9. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⟹315(5)—SUCCESSION OF HUSBAND TO WIFE'S PROPERTY—ACQUISITION OF RIGHTS.

Distribution to a husband, on the settlement of his wife's estate, of her shares in a water company gave him no right additional to those she possessed therein.

10. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⟹188(2), 232—OPERATIONS OF WATER COMPANY—OPERATION OF DISTINCT SYSTEM.

A water company may lawfully carry on at the same time two or more separate and distinct systems of public service in different places or for different uses in the same territory, as by operating an irrigation system and a pipe system to furnish water for domestic use, and its so doing cannot affect the rights of stockholders with regard to stock issued pursuant to charter and by-laws.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by the Riverside Land Company against Joseph Jarvis and the Riverside Water Company. From the judgment and an order denying its motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Purington & Adair, of Riverside, for appellant. T. T. Porteous, McFarland & Irving and A. H. Winder, all of Riverside, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The object of the action is to obtain a judgment directing the defendant Riverside Water Company to transfer to the plaintiff 154 shares of the capital stock of said defendant water company. The certificates outstanding, representing these shares, are in the control and possession of the defendant Joseph Jarvis, and he refuses to deliver the same to the plaintiff, though requested so to do. The right which the plaintiff claims to these shares is based on the following facts:

The Riverside Water Company was organized as a corporation in 1885. By its articles of incorporation it was empowered to take, acquire, buy, own, sell, and lease water and water rights, ditches, canals, dams, reservoirs, and structures connected therewith "and all easements and rights in respect of water and the uses of water appurtenant to any lands in this state, together with all lands and rights of way necessary or proper for any of the purposes aforesaid, or for other purposes," to use the water or dispose of the same to others to be used, and to control, manage and use the ditches, canals and other works aforesaid. Subdivisions 4 and 6 of article 2 further describe the purposes of the corporation as follows:

"4. To furnish, sell, lease, give and supply water to all lands represented by stock of this corporation, and thereafter for use for mechanical, agricultural, irrigation and other purposes, in such manner and upon such terms as it may deem fit, or as may be prescribed by law."

"6. To make such by-laws, rules and regulations as it may deem proper and necessary for the management and preservation of its works, and for the use and distribution of the water under its control."

Article 8 is as follows:

"To issue certificates of stock of such form and device as the board of directors may direct, and such certificates shall express on their face the number of shares for which and the tract of land to which they shall be attached, upon the basis of two shares of stock to each acre of land, the said tract of land being in the possession and ownership of the person to whom the certificates are to be issued."

Articles 9 and 10 of the by-laws contain provisions of like effect as said article 8, and the further provision that certificates of stock should be "transferable only with the land to which they are attached," and that the party asking for a transfer of stock should present to the secretary his conveyance of the land before the issuance of the new certificate.

The certificates of stock here sought were issued by the Riverside Water Company while the aforesaid provisions were in force. Certificate 1038 for 100 shares was issued to Mary A. Jarvis, wife of Joseph Jarvis, on October 13, 1894. Certificate 1007 for 14 shares was issued to Mary A. Jarvis on May 19, 1894. Certificate 711 for 40 shares, only 20 of which are here claimed, was issued to Joseph Jarvis on May 7, 1889. Certificate 2292 for 80 shares, of which only 20 shares are here claimed, was issued to Joseph Jarvis on February 15, 1907. They were all of the same form. The following copy of the one last mentioned shows the form of all of them.

"No. 2292. 80 shares.

"Incorporated under the Laws of California, January 2, 1885.

"Riverside Water Company.

"Capital Stock. $240.000. 24,000 Shares. $10 Each.

"Riverside, County of Riverside, State of California, Feby. 15, 1907. This certifies that Joseph Jarvis is entitled to eighty shares of the capital stock of the Riverside Water Company, which are attached to the following described tracts of land situated in the city of Riverside, to wit: Lots 9, 13, 14 and 16 block 7, lands of the Riv. Land & Irrigation Co., containing 40 acres of land, and transferable only on the books of the company by indorsement hereon and surrender of this certificate."

At the time of the issuance of the certificates to Mary A. Jarvis and Joseph Jarvis, respectively, they each owned the tract of land to which the shares are therein respectively declared to be attached. After the issuance of said certificates both Mary A. and Joseph Jarvis, by foreclosure proceedings and conveyances, were divested of the title to the 77 acres of the land here involved, and, through mesne conveyances, the plaintiff, on April 21, 1911, became the owner thereof. By virtue of this ownership, and under said articles of incorporation and by-laws, it claims to be the owner of the 154 shares of the stock declared by said certificates to be attached to the 77 acres of land. The certificates for these shares were retained by Jarvis and his wife, respectively, when their titles to the lands were divested, and they have never been in possession of the plaintiff. Mary A. Jarvis afterwards died, and the decree of final distribution of her estate purports to distribute the aforesaid certificates issued in her name to Joseph Jarvis. Thus the title to the land and the manual possession of the certificates have passed to different persons, plaintiff having the title to the land and the defendant Joseph Jarvis the possession of the certificates.

It will aid in the interpretation of these articles and by-laws to state briefly some conditions of fact and of law existing at the time of the incorporation of the company.

The Riverside water system had its origin in 1869. In that year the California Silk Center Association appropriated water from the Santa Ana river near San Bernardino, and carried it by canals and flumes to the plateau at Riverside, to be there used for the irrigation of farm lands. The system was thereafter owned and carried on successively by several other corporations. The Southern California Colony Association owned and operated it from September 15, 1870, to March 3, 1877; the Riverside Land & Irrigating Company from that date to July 26, 1879, and the Riverside Canal Company thereafter until June 1, 1885, when it was transferred to the Riverside Water Company. These companies appropriated more water and extended the system considerably from time to time. In some cases they sold to the respective landowners so-called water rights for their lands. By a water right we mean a contract by the water company with the landowner by which it agreed to furnish water to the land each year, forever, for its irrigation, either at a fixed annual rate or for a lump sum. In other cases the landowner did not buy such water right, but bought water from the company from year to year, as needed. The respective companies owned large tracts of land on the plateau under the flow of the canals. They sold and conveyed parcels of this land to farmers with a water right from the canal system attached thereto. In other instances they sold water rights for lands which the company had not sold to the owner. In still others they sold parcels of the land without a water right, but afterwards furnished water to irrigate the same as demanded. The lands here involved were of the latter class, except that the parcel described in certificate 1038 has never received any water. In the early part of this period a question arose concerning the permanency of the right of the landowners to the water thus furnished, where no water right agreements were executed, and to settle such question, at the instance of Mr. Satterwhite, member from San Bernardino, the Legislature, on April 3, 1876, enacted section 552 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

> "Whenever any corporation, organized under the laws of this state, furnishes water to irrigate lands which said corporation has sold, the right to the flow and use of said water is and shall remain a perpetual easement to the land so sold, at such rates and terms as may be established by said corporation in pursuance of law. And whenever any person who is cultivating land on the line and within the flow of any ditch owned by such corporation, has been furnished water by it with which to irrigate his land, such person shall be entitled to the continued use of said water, upon the same terms as those who have purchased their land of the corporation."

Under this section the landowners who had been furnished with water by said companies to irrigate lands which such companies had sold to them, or which were on the line and within the flow of the ditches of the system, became entitled to receive such water permanently for that purpose. As to the land sold by such companies the right would be an easement attached to the land sold. As to other lands so furnished it would be, at least, a right to the continued use of the water thereon.

The water system owned and operated by the Riverside Canal Company in 1885 had grown up and was operated under the conditions stated. A large area of land, devoted to orange culture, was irrigated and kept productive by the use of this water. The rights of the several landowners to the use of the water were of various origins; some had gained a private right by prescription, some had acquired a private right under a water right agreement, some had rights under section 552, and others no well-defined right except as beneficiaries of a public use. The board of supervisors of the county had fixed the rates to be charged for water for irrigation, and, so far as appears, the users and the company acquiesced therein, and the rates fixed were charged and paid. All the interested parties seemed to agree that the water of the system was devoted to public use, that the particular lands to which the water was furnished comprised the territory to which the water was dedicated, that the owners thereof were the beneficiaries of the use, and that the canal company was the administrator thereof, at least so far as the establishment of water rates was concerned. It is probable that they were mistaken in this as to a part of the water and particular tracts of land. As the landowners are not parties to the action, it would not be proper to decide the question, and we find it unnecessary to do so. It is sufficient for the purposes of the case to declare that the respective owners of land irrigated from the system had, while they owned the land, rights to the use of the water in control of the company, either private rights, or rights as members of the "public" to whose use the water was dedicated; that these rights were either appurtenant to the land as private rights, or they were attached to the land because of the dedication thereto for public use; that the private easements were burdens or servitudes upon the water system; that the public use was a burden on the system as to the remainder of the water; and that it was not within the power of the company, without the consent of the users, to divest the private rights or to shift the public use to other lands. This is a correct statement of the law as we conceive it to be.

The Riverside Water Company was organized by the persons who were at the time receiving and using the water of the system thus owned by the Riverside Canal Company. The latter company also owned a large body of vacant land which it held for sale. The water users desired to separate the ownership and control of the water system from the ownership of the land. They, therefore, formed two corporations, the Riverside Land Company, plaintiff herein, to acquire the land of the canal company and deal in land, and the Riverside Water Company, to acquire the said water system and operate the same. One of the chief objects, with regard to the water company, was to get all the persons who owned land within the flow of the canals and who had been using water therefrom to irrigate such lands, to become stockholders in the new water company in proportion to the area irrigated, and to provide some method by which the control of that company would be kept in the hands of those who rightfully used the water. It was mainly for the latter purpose that the above provisions were framed and inserted in the articles and by-laws.

The water company was accordingly formed, and it thereupon acquired said water system by conveyance from the Riverside Canal Company on July 1, 1885. All but a very few (all but two, Jarvis testified), of the previous water users become stockholders of the water company in pursuance of this plan. Thereafter the water company continued the distribution of the water as before. It conceded that the right of the few users who did not take stock was not divested by that fact, and it has continued the service to them at the established rates.

The water company in its answer joins in the prayer of the complaint. The active defense is made by Jarvis. He claims that the stock belongs to him, although he does not own the land to which it is declared to be attached, nor any other land. On his behalf it is contended: (1) That the water was dedicated to public use, and that the provision that the stock should be attached to the lands described in the certificate therefor constituted an attempt to give that land a preferential right to receive a part of the water so dedicated, to convert, to that extent, the public use into a private right, which, under the principles laid down in Leavitt v. Lassen Irr. Co., 157 Cal. 82, 106 Pac. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213, Southern P. Co. v. Spring V. W. Co., 173 Cal. ——, 159 Pac. 865, and other decisions of this court, may not be done. (2) That the provisions of the articles and by-laws of the water company, to the effect that its stock should only be transferred with the land to which it was declared to be attached, constitute an unreasonable restraint on alienation, which is beyond the power of the corporation, and that the provisions are consequently void. (3) That the articles, by-laws, and certificate of stock do not constitute a contract between the corporation and the stockholder whereby the stockholder agrees that a transfer of the land described in the certificate shall operate as a transfer of the right to the shares represented by the certificate, or that the stock shall be transferred only with said land.

[1] 1. That water dedicated to public use cannot lawfully be converted into a private use so as to create a private preferential right thereto for the benefit of a specific parcel of land is a well-established proposition, and is laid down in the cases referred to.

[2] But we do not think that this is the effect of the articles and by-laws of the company. So far as the validity of a provision that a conveyance of the land carries to the grantee a right to the stock which "represents" the land, as the articles put it, is concerned, it is immaterial whether the right of the owner to receive water for the land, at the time the water company acquired the system, was a public right or a private right.

[3] As to the private rights, if any, they would be appurtenances to the land, entitling it to receive water from the system, and the service of that water to that land must have been continued by the company, in any event, since it was the owner's right to have it so continued. In such a case a sale of the land after the acquisition of the system by the company would carry the right to the water as an appurtenance. There would obviously be no conversion of a public right into a private right, but the private right would continue as before.

[4] If the right was a public right pertaining to the land by reason of the fact that it was a part of the territory to which the public use for irrigation had attached, as must have been the case if it was at that time lawfully receiving the water dedicated to public use, then it would be the duty of the water company to continue to supply to that land a reasonable proportion of the water so dedicated to the public use. Whether dedicated to public use upon a class of lands not all contiguous, or upon all lands within a defined territory, such water could not lawfully be diverted to other lands by the agent in charge of the use, but must be supplied to the land to which it is dedicated. Fellows v. Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 64, 90 Pac. 137; Hewitt v. San Jacinto, etc., Dist., 124 Cal. 186, 56 Pac. 893; South Pasadena v. Pasadena, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 587, 93 Pac. 490; Del Mar, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 591, 948. It would be to the interest of the landowner benefited by such a public use to have a voice in the control of the company in charge of the use, as well as to the interest of those having a private right. It would therefore be to the interest of all the shareholders, under the plan devised, and, consequently, to the interest of the company, that none but users of the water, entitled as beneficiaries, should have stock of the company, or a voice in its control. The continuance of the service, under these circumstances, would not be a conversion of a public use into a private use but would be a mere continuance of a public use already existing. In such a case it would be entirely reasonable to provide that a sale of the land so beneficially entitled should carry the stock which is evidence for the owner of the land of his right to participate in the use of the water and in the control of the corporate agent in charge of the use. Such corporate agent would remain subject to the regulation and control of the public authorities thereafter, as before, notwithstanding the arrangement that stock therein would pass with the land to which it was declared to be attached.

It may be that the 50 acres represented by certificate 1038, which was never supplied with water, is not now entitled to any unless there should be a surplus in the control of the company after supplying all lands which have heretofore lawfully received water. The issues in this case do not require us to decide the question as to the right to water. We are concerned only with the right to the stock, and that right is not affected by the fact, if it be a fact, that the company has no water to furnish to that particular parcel of land.

2. There are decisions holding that restrictions upon the sale or transfer of corporate stock which are unreasonable cannot be imposed by provisions in its articles or by-laws. A provision that the transferee of stock should vote for every increase of capital stock proposed by the directors has been held to be unreasonable and void. McNulta v. Bank, 164 Ill. 427, 45 N. E. 954, 56 Am. St. Rep. 203. Of a by-law which required 30 days' previous notice of a proposed transfer and of the price thereof, and gave the company or other stockholders the preferred right to buy it at that price, the court said that it was an unreasonable restraint upon alienation "when invoked by the company." Bloede Co. v. Bloede, 84 Md. 129, 34 Atl. 1127, 33 L. R. A. 107, 57 Am. St. Rep. 373. The decision in New England Tr. Co. v. Abbott, 162 Mass. 152, 38 N. E. 432, 27 L. R. A. 271, seems to be opposed to the last-named case, and to hold that such contracts are valid. And a provision in the articles that stock should not be transferred until all debts of the holder to the corporation were paid, although inconsistent with the general law giving the right to transfer property, has been held to be valid, and not contrary to public policy nor in contravention of express law. Gibbs v. Long Island, etc., Co., 83 Hun, 92, 31 N. Y. Supp. 406; Mechanics' Bank v. Merchants' Bank, 45 Mo. 516, 100 Am. Dec. 388; St. Louis I. Co. v. Goodfellow, 9 Mo. 149. In Lum v. American, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 661, 133 Pac. 303, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 816, a provision in the articles, and stated in the certificates, that the paid-up capital stock should not be assessed was declared to constitute a valid contract between the corporation and its stockholders. The court said:

> "A corporation may enter into an agreement * * * to do or to refrain from doing something when such action * * * is not contrary to express law, or to public policy. * * * Such contracts may even go so far as to provide for a surrender by one of the parties of some privilege otherwise granted by law."

[5] An agreement between persons who are entitled to the first right to the use of a certain supply of water to form a corporation to acquire such supply and distributing canals, and that the articles of incorporation shall provide that stock is to be issued only to the owners of land entitled to the water, 2 shares of stock for each acre of land, that the stock shall be attached to such land, and shall be transferable only with the land and upon the presentation of a conveyance thereof from the former holder, and that such stockholders shall have the first right to the water cannot be said to be unreasonable. If not, the articles and by-laws made in pursuance of and to carry into effect such agreement are not unreasonable. On the contrary, it is founded on prudence and reason, designed, as it would obviously be, to keep the control of the distributing company in the hands of those entitled to the use of the water. The beneficial effects in this case are shown by the fact that the water company has kept the rates down to the sum required to provide for expenses of distribution and maintenance, and has not attempted to make profits in any other manner.

That it is not contrary to the general policy of the law is shown by the amendment of 1895 (St. 1895, p. 118) to section 324 of the Civil Code, providing, in substance, that a corporation organized to sell or distribute water for irrigation or domestic use may declare in its by-laws that the water shall be distributed only to stockholders, that the stock shall be appurtenant to the land described in the certificate, shall only be transferred with such land, and shall pass with a conveyance thereof, a plan not essentially different from that adopted by the incorporators of the Riverside Water Company. It does not violate the provision of section 324 that shares of stock "may be transferred by indorsement" and "delivery of the certificate." This language does not forbid the making of agreements to transfer, nor the making of contracts, good between the parties, that a certificate shall pass with the transfer of certain other property. Corporate stock would be transferable without such provision. Civ. Code, § 1044. The provision merely prescribes a mode by which the transfer may be made. It does not prohibit a transfer by other methods, nor declare that, when made in another manner, a transfer may not be enforced by the party entitled to the shares.

[6] Specific performance lies in such cases. Feckheimer v. National Exch. Bank, 79 Va. 83; New England T. Co. v. Abbott, supra. The articles and by-laws of this company do purport to prevent a lawful transfer, except with the land, without the consent of the corporation. But the agreement not to transfer the stock except with the land is voluntarily made by the person taking the stock. As it is not unreasonable or immoral, nor expressly forbidden, it is a contract which a person may lawfully make concerning his property and which may be enforced against him.

[7, 8] 3. The articles, by-laws, and certificate constitute the evidence of the contract between the parties. Taken together, they are, in effect, an agreement between the stockholder and the company that the stock shall be transferable only with the land, and, conversely, that a transfer of the land shall pass to the grantee thereof the right to the stock, that is, the equitable title thereto. Respondent admits that it was an agreement on the part of the stockholder that the stock should be transferable only with the land. Its language to that effect is too clear for dispute. This being so, it must follow, either that a transfer of the land carries the equitable title to the stock, or that the ownership thereof will forever remain in the original holder of the certificate, which seems absurd. But the agreement went further, and provided that the stock should be "attached" to the land. It is not provided that it shall be detached by a sale of the land. The plain intent is that it shall remain attached, and that the ownership thereof shall follow the ownership of the land to which the water must be furnished. If it is to remain attached after the land is conveyed, it must pass with the land. This is the natural effect and the clear meaning of the provision. It is a contract made by the landowner for the benefit of the company, the other stockholders, and also of the grantee of the land. The grantee becomes the owner of the equitable title to the stock, and he may enforce the contract made for his benefit. Civ. Code, § 1559.

[9] The distribution of the shares, issued to Mrs. Jarvis, to her husband upon the settlement of her estate gave him no right additional to those she possessed therein. The obligation may be enforced against him as to all the shares.

[10] After the water company had acquired the water, canals, and works of the canal company, it also acquired another water supply and system of pipes installed to furnish water for domestic uses to the inhabitants of the city of Riverside. It has ever since operated said domestic system, furnishing water therefrom to all persons without regard to their ownership of land or stock. The court found these facts, as we suppose, in support of its theory of the case that if the water company was engaged in public service of water, the land could not be attached to its stock. The two water systems were wholly separate and distinct, and the water furnished for domestic use was obtained from a source not acquired from the canal company. A water company may lawfully carry on at the same time two or more separate and distinct systems of public service in different places, or for different uses in the same territory. The fact that this company was also engaged in the public service of selling and distributing water for domestic use in Riverside does not affect the reciprocal rights and obligations of the stockholders and the company with regard to the stock issued in pursuance of the articles and by-laws. The finding is immaterial to the case.

The finding that the water company had allowed persons to vote as stockholders and to act as directors who did not own stock attached to land owned by them is not sustained except by evidence to the effect that in some instances where the land was conveyed the stock was not at once brought in by the parties for transfer to the grantee, and in the meantime the original stockholder appeared on the books to own the stock, and was permitted to vote the same; no objection being made by the grantee. These facts are also of no importance to the questions decided.

For the reasons we have given, we are of the opinion that the court below erred in holding that the certificates of stock were held by Jarvis free of any claims of the plaintiff. It is unnecessary to declare that the certificates are appurtenant to the parcels of land described. It is sufficient for the plaintiff's purpose that the conveyance of the land, either directly, or upon foreclosure, creates an implied contract by the grantor, or former owner, to yield up the certificate to the grantee and that plaintiff is entitled to enforce such agreement and have the certificates transferred on the books of the company.

The judgment and order are reversed.

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT 🔑38—DISBARMENT—"MORAL TURPITUDE."

The publication by an attorney by a circular misrepresenting the facts of an action to recover money, and concluding with the statement that the judge "used his judicial office to enable said bank to keep that money," such accusation being without foundation, was the willful making of a false charge, which, since it could not, under Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, as to privileged publications, be justified because the judge was at that time a candidate for reelection to a judicial office, nor as a mere conclusion from facts stated, amounted to moral turpitude within Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 5, authorizing disbarment therefor; "moral turpitude" being misconduct by an attorney in reference to his duties and obligations as such attorney—conduct, in fact, contrary to justice, honesty, modesty, or good morals.

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT 🔑38—DISBARMENT—CRITICISMS OF COURT.

While attorneys have the widest latitude in differing with, and criticizing the opinions of, the courts, yet when they resort to misrepresentation and unwarranted assaults upon the courts whose officers they are, they violate their duty and obligation.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

William Humphrey, an attorney, was suspended for two years from practicing, and appeals from such judgment. Affirmed.

Wm. Humphrey, of San Diego, in pro. per. E. H. Lamme and Dempster McKee, both of San Diego, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The appeal herein was decided by the District Court of Appeal for the Second District. An application was made to this court for a hearing. It was granted for the reason that we entertained some doubt whether the misconduct of the appellant amounted to "moral turpitude," within the meaning of subdivision 5, § 287, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Upon a consideration of that question we have reached the conclusion that the District Court correctly disposed of it. The opinion, which is written by Mr. Presiding Justice Conrey, is, in part, as follows:

"In this proceeding respondent was tried before the superior court upon an accusation preferred against him by the Bar Association of San Diego. The court found that the allegations of the accusation were true, and that the conduct of the respondent in the premises constituted an act of moral turpitude. Thereupon it was ordered and adjudged that, for a period of two years, his name be stricken from the roll of attorneys and counselors at law, and that for that period he be precluded from practicing as such attorney and counselor at law in any court of this state. From that judgment the respondent prosecutes this appeal.

"In October, 1914, Hon. W. R. Guy, a judge of the superior court in and for the county of San Diego, was a candidate for re-election. Respondent caused to be printed and published a circular or card containing an article prepared under a heading, 'W. R. Guy's Conduct as Judge Disclosed.' Then followed a purported statement of proceedings had and judgments rendered by Judge Guy in two cases. In the first case, following a purported statement of the facts, the circular closed as follows: 'Do you want that kind of a man for Juvenile Judge? What will be the effect on young lawyers who look to the Judge for example? Answer with your votes November 3d.' In the second case, following a purported statement of facts, the circular closed as follows: 'Any person who has the intelligence of a common monkey knows that said fund could not become the property of the Justice of the Peace, or the bank, or any other person without the consent of the owner. Observe that the money was released from custody of the Justice and the bank notified of it and a request made for its return by the owner. Judge Guy used his judicial office to enable said bank to keep that money and also refused a new trial and refused to allow any other Judge to try the case. Do you want that kind of a man for Judge of Juveniles? What example will be set to the young who look upon a Judge of a Superior Court as some great personage? Answer with your votes November 3d.'

"Answering the accusation, respondent admits that he published the circulars or cards in question, and asserts that they contain only the truth. He denies that the cards were printed wrongfully or unlawfully or maliciously, or with any other thought than to properly advise voters at the election. Appellant has brought up with his appeal a bill of exceptions, showing the proceedings at the trial upon this accusation against him, and including the evidence upon which the court below has based its finding that the publication made by respondent was false and malicious and involved moral turpitude on the part of the publisher. Bearing in mind the rule that the findings of the superior court upon matters of fact are not subject to review where they have any substantial support in the evidence, we will briefly compare the charges printed by the respondent concerning the two cases above mentioned with the facts as they occurred in the trial of those cases.

"As to the first case, we find that the statement of facts in the circular of respondent is as follows: 'The administrator of David A. Smith brought action against an attorney-at-law to recover $350.00. The facts stated by the administrator and admitted by demurrer of said attorney were: That said defendant was the attorney and confidential advisor of said Smith. That while said Smith was in a dying condition, under the effect of opiates and incapable of transacting business or comprehending the nature thereof, said attorney, in conspiracy with a confidential nurse of said Smith, induced said Smith to deliver to said attorney $350.00, which sum said attorney and said nurse falsely pretended to said Smith was for the defense to an action which would be commenced against said nurse. That said false representations were made to said Smith for the purpose of obtaining said sum without consideration and that no consideration was received by said Smith for said money. That said administrator demanded of said attorney the return of said sum but no part of it was ever returned.' The real title of the above-mentioned case was O. K. Bullard, Administrator, v. L. E. Dadmun. The first count in that complaint contains a statement of facts which evidently is the statement of facts referred to in the circular, although there are differences between the two statements of facts. For instance, although the complaint alleges that Dadmun was an attorney at law, it does not allege that he was the attorney of said Smith; and, although the complaint says that Dadmun had the confidence of decedent, and that decedent relied upon his representations, it does not say or show in any manner that Dadmun was 'confidential advisor' of Smith, or engaged to advise him at all about the affairs of said Smith. The second count of the complaint is pleaded as a common count for money had and received by defendant for the use of the decedent. A demurrer, both general and special with respect to each count of the complaint, was filed by the defendant Dadmun and came on for argument before Judge Guy, who sustained the demurrer. The court did not refuse to the plaintiff the right to further amend his complaint, but the plaintiff, who was represented by Mr. Humphrey, elected to stand on said amended complaint. Thereupon the court, as was necessary under its ruling on the demurrer, ordered dismissal of the action.

"We are not called upon to say whether the order sustaining the demurrer was or was not legally correct. It is sufficient to say that debatable questions were presented; that the judge in the performance of his official duty rendered his decision thereon; and that there is absolutely nothing to show, or tending to show, that the conduct of the judge therein was such as to call for the suggestion or intimation that this conduct showed him to be the kind of a man whose incumbency in the judicial office would have injurious effect 'on young lawyers who look to the judge for example.'

"But while the portion of respondent's published article which referred to the Smith Case does not appear to have been justifiable in so far as it was intended as a reflection upon the character of the judge, we are inclined to the opinion that it would not alone be sufficient to show moral turpitude on the part of the publisher or constitute cause for disbarment. As to that case the respondent avoided the use of language necessarily charging the judge with a willful misuse of his office.

"This leads us to the next case described in said published circular, concerning which the circular reads as follows: 'Here's Another Case: The undisputed evidence in a case tried in Judge Guy's court July 8th, 1913, was as follows: A defendant under arrest in Justice Court deposited $25 for bail, which case came before the Justice of the Peace of National Township. Said Justice deposited in his name as Justice of the Peace said fund with the People's National Bank of National City, and told said bank that said fund was left with him as bail money and also told said bank from whom he received said fund. Said Justice died shortly thereafter. The successor, Justice Sherman, set said case for trial and on the hearing thereof Feb. 4th, 1913, dismissed the case, made an order releasing said bail money and notified said bank in writing of such release and dismissal. Said defendant delivered to said bank in person said written notice, requested payment to him of said bail money; said bank refused payment. Said defendant, after waiting four days, brought suit and obtained judgment in the Justice's court for said money. Said bank appealed. Judge Guy tried the case on appeal and on the above undisputed evidence gave judgment for said bank with costs of both trials. Said bank by Guy's decision got the money and said defendant who owned the money lost it with cost of two trials.' Then followed the language which we have quoted heretofore, beginning with the words, 'Any person who has the intelligence of a common monkey,' etc. The evidence shows that William Humphrey, being under arrest in a justice's court, deposited $25 for bail, which sum was deposited in bank in an account which the justice kept in his own name as justice of the peace; that the justice died while the action against Humphrey was pending; that the case was later tried by another justice, and the court made an order dismissing the action against Humphrey and ordering that his bail money be released. Thereupon the respondent filed his action against the bank to recover from it the sum of $25, thereby attempting to establish direct responsibility of the bank to him as owner of that sum. Judgment having been rendered in favor of Humphrey and against the bank in the justice's court where the case was tried, the bank appealed to the superior court, and the case came on for trial before Judge Guy. That judge appears to have reached the conclusion that the plaintiff in that action had no cause of action against the bank, and that his claim should have been presented to the administrator of the estate of the deceased justice. Here again we are not called upon to determine whether the judgment rendered by Judge Guy was legally right, although we do not observe in it any ground for criticism. For present purposes, it is, however, sufficient to say that the conduct of Judge Guy in rendering the judgment which he did render in that case, as shown by the record here produced, is not subject to the slightest criticism which could in any way affect his character as a judge. Nevertheless, the respondent took it upon himself to publish a statement purporting to set forth the facts of that case and accompanied such statement with a distinctly libelous charge which, in our opinion, amounted to a statement that Judge Guy, with full knowledge that plaintiff Humphrey was entitled to a judgment in his favor, had 'used his judicial office to enable said bank to keep that money.' In other words, the respondent being then and there an attorney at law and under an obligation and sworn duty 'to maintain the respect due to the courts of justice and judicial officers' (Code Civ. Proc. § 282), wantonly charged that a judge of the superior court before whom he was practicing had knowingly misused his judicial office for the purpose of bringing financial gain to a litigant. * * *"

[1] The making of such a charge, under the circumstances here existing, was manifestly the willful making of a false charge, and cannot be justified as a privileged publication under the claimed excuse that the subject of attack was at that time a candidate for reelection to a judicial office. Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3.

[2, 3] It is contended by the respondent, in his petition for a hearing by this court, that he "had the undoubted right to state his conclusions; others could draw their conclusions as to whether the respondent or Judge Guy's conclusions were the more logical, reasonable, or honest." But the concluding statements of the circular are obviously charges, at least by innuendo, against the integrity and fitness of the judge, and must be presumed to have been so intended. "While attorneys have the widest latitude in differing with, and criticizing the opinions of, the courts, yet when they resort to misrepresentation and unwarranted assaults upon the courts whose officers they are, they violate their duty and obligation." 6 C. J. 594, § 54. Moral turpitude is misconduct by an attorney in reference to his duties and obligations as such atttorney—conduct, in fact, which is contrary to justice, honesty, modesty, or good morals. Bouvier Law Dict. See In re Coffey, 123 Cal. 522, 56 Pac. 448. "An attorney," it has been stated, "is guilty of misconduct whenever he so acts as to be unworthy of the trust and confidence involved in his official oath, and is found to be wanting in that honesty and integrity which must characterize members of the bar in the performance of their professional duties." 2 Thornton on Attorneys at Law (Ed. 1914) § 774. We are aware that there is a line of authorities which place no limit to the criticism members of the bar may make regarding the capacity, impartiality, or integrity of the courts, even though it extends to the deliberate publication by an attorney capable of correct reasoning of baseless insinuations against the intelligence and integrity of the highest courts. See State Board, etc., v. Hart, 104 Minn. 88, 116 N. W. 212, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 585, 15 Ann. Cas. 197, and note; Ex parte Steinman, 95 Pa. 220, 40 Am. Rep. 637. In the first case mentioned it was observed, for instance:

> "It may be (although we do not so decide) that a libelous publication by an attorney, directed against a judicial officer, could be so vile and base and of such a nature as to justify the disbarment of its author."

Yet the false charges made by the attorney in that case were of a graver character than those made by the respondent here. But, in our view, the better rule is that which requires of those who are permitted to enjoy the privilege of practicing law the strictest observance at all times of the principles of truth, honesty, and fairness, especially in their criticism of the courts, to the end that the public confidence in the due administration of justice be upheld, and the dignity and usefulness of the courts be maintained. In re Collins, 147 Cal. 8, 19, 81 Pac. 220; 2 Thornton, etc., c. XXIX; 2 R. C. L. pp. 1089, 1092. In the case entitled In re Thatcher, 80 Ohio St. 492, 89 N. E. 39–90, and 2d (C. C. & D. C.) 190 Fed. 969–1015, affirmed 212 Fed. 801, 129 C. C. A. 255, rehearing denied 219 Fed. 173, 135 C. C. A. 71, whose facts, in many respects, parallel those shown here, the Supreme Court of Ohio and the federal court thoroughly considered the authorities and reached conclusions in accord with our own. As remarked in the Ohio case:

> "As an attorney, or as a citizen, he had the right to criticize the judgments and conduct of the judges in a decent and respectful manner; but no man has a right at any time to degrade and intimidate a public officer, and bring his office into contempt, by the publication of libelous matter imputing to him impeachable offenses, and the fact that the officer is a candidate for re-election does not remove the ban."

And again:

> "Nobody knows better than a lawyer that, while judicious criticism is a necessary and effective means when used to keep the judges mindful of their duties and to prevent the selection of inefficient judges when judges are chosen by the people, yet, when carried beyond the limit of truth and fairness, nothing is more certain to destroy the judicial balance of timid judges and to effectually impair the impartial administration of justice."

See, also, Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265–325, 2 Sup. Ct. 569, 27 L. Ed. 552. It is our opinion that the trial court was warranted in finding that the publication of said articles constituted moral turpitude.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Harriett Lininger against Monimia L. Botsford and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, and R. H. Cross, of San Francisco, for appellant. Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondents Frederick P. Cutting, Alfred D. Cutler, and William H. Chickering, as executors of the last will and testament of Francis Cutting, deceased, F. G. Noyes, and A. C. Wier. Trippet, Chapman & Biby, of Los Angeles, and John T. York, of Napa, for respondent Monimia L. Botsford, as executrix of the last will and testament of William Botsford, deceased. Guy C. Earl, of San Francisco, and John T. York, of Napa, for respondent James Irvine. Trask, Norton & Brown, of Los Angeles, and John T. York, of Napa, for respondent H. Prenzlauer. John T. York, of Napa, for respondents Frank C. Bolt, C. E. Crary, C. B. Jones, Mark G. Jones, Elizabeth Perry, Price Estate Co., a corporation, Jaro Van Schmidt, Geo. Mitchell, Mamie B. Wood, Charles M. Wood, and Elizabeth Perry, as trustees of the last will and testament of W. H. Perry, deceased, and Mamie B. Wood, Florence Johnson, and Charles F. Perry, as beneficiaries of said trust. Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondents Monimia L. Botsford, as executrix of the last will and testament of William F. Botsford, deceased, James Irvine, H. Prenzlauer, Frank C. Bolt, C. E. Crary, C. B. Jones, Mark G. Jones, Elizabeth Perry, Price Estate Co., a corporation, Jaro Van Schmidt, George Mitchell, Mamie B. Wood, Charles M. Wood, and Elizabeth Perry, as trustees under the last will and testament of W. H. Perry, deceased, and Mamie B. Wood, Florence Johnson, and Charles F. Perry, as beneficiaries of said trust. Frank J. Solinsky, of San Francisco, for respondent H. R. McGuinn.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought by plaintiff against the defendants as stockholders in the San Francisco, Vallejo & Napa Valley Railroad (hereinafter referred to as the Napa Valley Company), for damages for personal injuries sustained by her in a collision between one of the cars of said company and the automobile in which she was riding. The defendants demurred to the third amended complaint, and moved to strike out certain parts thereof. The demurrer was sustained and the motion granted, and upon the refusal of plaintiff to further amend her complaint, judgment was entered for defendants, from which judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The questions involved in the appeal are as follows: (1) Whether or not a stockholder's statutory liability extends to the payment of damages for personal injuries; (2) if so, does such liability survive? and (3) in such an action can the stockholders of a corporation be held directly liable on stock in such corporation held by another corporation virtually all of whose capital stock in turn is held and owned by the former company.

At the outset we desire to say that in the solution of these questions we have been afforded little or no assistance by the numerous counsel for the respondents, none of them having filed a brief, although requested so to do; and it would seem that they have practically abandoned the contentions that they urged in the trial court.

[1] With reference to the first question, the Civil Code and the Constitution of this state provide, in substance, that each stockholder of a corporation shall be liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred during the time he was such stockholder as the amount of stock owned by him bears to the subscribed capital stock of the corporation. Const., art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322.

In different jurisdictions where this character of legislation exists the statutes are not uniform with regard to the character of debts or liabilities as to which this stockholders' liability is imposed. In some it is limited to debts of the corporation, and the preponderance of authority perhaps in such cases is that liabilities ex delicto are excluded (Avery v. McClure, 22 L. R. A. [N. S.] 256, note; 7 Ruling Case Law, 375, 376), but see Rider v. Fritchey, 49 Ohio St. 285, 30 N.

E. 692, 15 L. R. A. 513. However this may be, our constitutional and statutory provisions do not so limit the liability. In express terms they include debts and liabilities, and its language, in our opinion, is broad enough to embrace involuntary obligations imposed upon corporations for negligent or tortious acts, and is too plain to warrant the court in holding that it does not include liability for wrongful acts not arising from contract. In this state the word "liability" has been held to apply to the obligation arising from the commission of torts as well as from breaches of contract. Miller & Lux v. Kern County Land Co., 134 Cal. 586, 66 Pac. 856. The provisions here involved are remedial in character, and should receive a liberal construction, one which will include within its scope as well a demand for damages for a tort as a claim for a debt arising upon contract. Rider v. Fritchey, supra. We conclude, therefore, that the language of the Constitution and Code plainly covers liability on the part of a stockholder for claims against the corporation for damages consequent upon torts of this character. Kelly v. Clark, 21 Mont. 291, 53 Pac. 959, 42 L. R. A. 621, 69 Am. St. Rep. 668; Buttner v. Adams, 236 Fed. 105, 149 C. C. A. 315 (U. S. Ct. of Appeals, Ninth Cir.), decided September 5, 1916.

[2] As to the second question, it has been said that whether a cause of action against a stockholder for a tortious act of the corporation survives depends upon its nature. Accordingly many cases can be found to the effect that a cause of action which is penal in character does not survive the wrongdoer's death; and therefore a cause of action against a stockholder for such tort, being penal in its nature, does not survive the stockholder's death. 1 Ruling Case Law, 44. But we are not here concerned with the question of the liability of a stockholder in actions purely penal. The cause of action here involved is not of such a character, but is in the nature of a contractual obligation, and, being so, it does not die with the stockholder, but survives, and may be enforced against his estate. Major v. Walker, 23 Cal. App. 465, 138 Pac. 360; 10 Cyc. 668, 684, 719; 1 Corp. Jur. § 410; Cochran v. Wiechers, 119 N. Y. 399, 23 N. E. 803, 7 L. R. A. 553; Flash v. Conn., 109 U. S. 371, 3 Sup. Ct. 263, 27 L. Ed. 966; Buttner v. Adams, supra.

[3] Finally, as to the third point, as before stated, the action was brought against defendants as stockholders in the Napa Valley Company. It is alleged in the complaint that at the time of the commencement of the action there was subscribed some 12,500 shares in said company, of which 5,000 were owned by the Vallejo, Benecia & Napa Valley Railway Company, another corporation, virtually all the stock of which (4,986 out of a total issue of 5,000 shares) was owned by the Napa Valley Company. In other words, the substance of the allegations in this particular is that the Napa Valley Company owned 40 per cent. of its own stock then outstanding, holding the same through the Benicia Company, a subsidiary corporation. The record does not disclose under what conditions or for what purpose the stock was so held. The action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer, so far as it relates to the question now being considered, and granting the motion to strike out parts of the third amended complaint, was based upon the theory that in pleading facts showing that the Benicia Company was the holder of 40 per cent. of the stock of the Napa Valley Company, the remaining stockholders of the latter company were thus shown to hold only 60 per cent. of its subscribed capital stock, and that the liability of each stockholder must be calculated accordingly, which would bring the sum recoverable from certain of the defendants below the amount requisite to give jurisdiction to the superior court; and, further, that the pleading of facts, showing that the Napa Valley Company owned stock in the Benicia Company, showed a liability on the part of the defendants, on account of such stock holding by the Napa Valley Company, separate and distinct from their liability upon the 60 per cent. of the stock not held by the Benicia Company; and that consequently the complaint improperly united two causes of action.

It is conceded by plaintiff that if the stock standing in the name of the Benicia Company is to be regarded as subscribed capital stock of the Napa Valley Company, the stockholders' liability upon which cannot be charged directly to the remaining stockholders of the latter company, the amount that can be recovered in this action against certain of the defendants is less than $400, and that therefore as to them the trial court was without jurisdiction.

It must be conceded that as to the 40 per cent. of the stock of the Napa Valley Company held by the Benicia Company the ultimate stockholder's liability thereon rests upon the holders of the remaining 60 per cent.; for the liability of the Benicia Company as a stockholder of the Napa Valley Company is in its turn a liability of the Napa Valley Company by reason of its ownership of the capital stock of the Benicia Company, and that liability correspondingly is a statutory liability of the defendants as stockholders of the Napa Valley Company.

Both by the Constitution and section 322 of the Civil Code the proportionate amount of a stockholder's liability is based upon the amount of the subscribed capital stock; and it will not be denied that if the 40 per cent. of the stock of the Napa Valley Company held by the Benicia Company still remained in the treasury of the Napa Valley Company, it would not be subscribed capital stock, and the whole stockholders' liability to creditors would be that incident to the remaining 60 per cent. It must also be conceded that since the ownership of this 40 per cent. rests in the Napa Valley Company by reason of its ownership of the stock of the Benicia Company, the situation of that 40 per cent. is logically and legally the same as if it were mere unissued treasury stock. For that reason—and also upon the well-recognized legal principles: (1) That courts look to the substance rather than to the form; and (2) that they regard with disfavor a multiplicity of actions for the purpose of attaining a single end—we see no reason why the plaintiff could not, by pleading all the facts of the situation, directly charge the defendants here as the ultimate owners of all the subscribed capital stock of the Napa Valley Company; nor why she should be compelled to split her demand into two parts, one of 60 per cent. and the other of 40 per cent., when the individuals liable for the 60 per cent. are ultimately liable for the 40 per cent. also.

There are cases holding that where one person or one corporation owns all the stock of another corporation, the separate entity of the latter cannot be ignored, and the stockholder or holding corporation held liable for its debts. 2 Cook on Corporations (5th Ed.) §§ 663, 664, and cases cited. But these cases deal with obligations of the corporation where it was sought to hold what might be termed the "equitable" debtors where no constitutional or statutory liability had been imposed upon them for the corporation's debts. In this state such liability is direct and primary; and an action lies directly against the stockholders, and need not be based upon a judgment against the corporation. Western Pacific v. Godfrey, 166 Cal. 346, 136 Pac. 284, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 825; Eva v. Andersen, 166 Cal. 420, 137 Pac. 16. Here the action is against the ultimate stockholders of the corporation whose liability is primary, and is conditional or contingent only upon the fact that there must be a subsisting debt or liability of the corporation. It seems to us that it makes no difference through what channel the ownership of the stock may be traced, whether through a holding company or an individual. It is here alleged that the Benicia Company owns 40 per cent. of the stock of the Napa Valley Company, which in turn owns virtually the entire stock of the Benicia Company, and that the defendants are the owners of the remaining 60 per cent. of the Napa Valley Company's stock, which, as we have seen, is the only stock which can be truly designated as subscribed capital stock.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff had the right to sue the defendants directly as the only persons charged with the statutory liability sought to be reached; that the 60 per cent. of the stock of the Napa Valley Company held by them was for the purpose of computing the stockholders' liability, or, at least, might, at the option of the plaintiff, be regarded as the only subscribed capital stock, and was chargeable with the total debts and liabilities of the issuing corporation, and that while it was proper for plaintiff to plead all the facts by which the ownership of stock by the two corporations in one another was disclosed, the setting forth of those facts did not, as claimed by respondents, constitute an improper joining of two causes of action, and that therefore the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the third amended complaint and in striking out portions thereof.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the trial court, with instructions to overrule the demurrers, deny the motion to strike out, and permit the defendants to answer.

CALLAHAN v. DANZIGER. (Civ. 2066.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 27, 1916.)

1. PARTNERSHIP 🔑55—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in a suit for services held to sustain a finding that defendants were partners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 75, 78, 79, 81.]

2. WITNESSES 🔑400(1) — CONTRADICTING OWN WITNESS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2049, while one may not impeach his witness by evidence of bad character, he may contradict him by other evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1268.]

3. PARTNERSHIP 🔑49—EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH.

To establish partnership of defendants in an action for services, letters from one to another of defendants and their actions in any regard connected with the affairs of the enterprise are admissible.

4. JUDGMENT 🔑17(4)—PART OF DEFENDANTS SERVED.

By provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 414, where action is against several jointly or severally liable on contract, plaintiff may proceed against those served as if they were the only defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by W. H. Callahan against J. M.

Danziger and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 172 Cal. 738, 158 Pac. 760.

Geo. E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, for appellant. E. F. Brittan and Rowen Irwin, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff, the respondent here, sued appellant, Danziger, E. A. Wiltsee, J. M. Kent, and the Lost Hills Syndicate, the latter being alleged to be, upon the information and belief of the plaintiff, a corporation. The suit was to recover $1,170.73 for services performed and money paid out on account of the defendants. Service was made upon this appellant and Kent, who answered in the case, and upon trial being had before a jury a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount prayed for, upon which verdict judgment was thereafter entered. This appeal is taken by Danziger from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] It is urged, under the contention principally argued on behalf of the appellant, that the evidence was insufficient to support the judgment. A recovery was had under the claim that the individual defendants were copartners. The business in which it appears they were engaged was that of exploring prospective oil territory. The plaintiff did not show that the Lost Hills Syndicate was a corporation, but the evidence offered went principally in the direction of establishing a copartnership existing between Kent, Danziger and Wiltsee. Defendants Kent and Danziger, being the only two who appeared at the trial, were not very specific in defining the relations existing between the three, which fact may be accounted for by the loose method of doing business which was followed in the handling of their enterprise. At the outset it may be said that, in our opinion, the facts and circumstances shown in evidence were amply sufficient to authorize a conclusion to be drawn that the relation of general partners did exist between Kent, Wiltsee, and Danziger. Plaintiff testified that Wiltsee, Danziger, and Kent composed the Lost Hills Syndicate; that he, the plaintiff, went into the Lost Hills for the persons named in October, 1910; that he was to receive $5 a day and board as superintendent for all their work in that locality; that he continued in that employment until December 18, 1911, at which time he was informed by Kent that Danziger would be no longer responsible for any debts of the concern, and that Kent was going to cease activities also. He testified to the different amounts of money which he had paid out, which, together with balance of wages claimed to be due, made up the total sum sued for. Kent appeared to be the man most accessible to Callahan, and it was mainly through Kent that Callahan received remittances. He also received remittances through Wiltsee, and in some of the letters written by Wiltsee along in the year 1911, when money appeared to be short, Wiltsee assured Callahan that he would be personally responsible for the reimbursement and payment of the plaintiff. Callahan also testified that just after he started work in 1910 Danziger was on the ground, and that he (Callahan) told Danziger that it was a little tedious working there, as many of the men carried guns, to which Danziger replied:

> "Go right on, Mr. Callahan, pay no attention; I am behind you."

One letter only was received by Callahan from Danziger, and that was in November, 1911, when Callahan testified he wrote to Danziger regarding the action of some strangers who were cutting timber on the ground, and Danziger replied to him, giving advice about the matter. Danziger in his testimony claimed that this was a matter of friendly advice only, and that he was not writing to Callahan as a person interested otherwise. It appeared without dispute that at various times during the year 1911 drilling rigs were furnished for use on the property in charge of Callahan, and that Danziger paid for several or all of these. About the middle of the year 1911 Danziger wrote to Kent that he would not pay any more money, saying:

> "I thought I made it clear to you the last time I talked to you that I was not going to put up any more money on this account. I talked with Wiltsee some time ago, and he said he would take care of all matters from then on, and I will give up my interest there before I will put up another cent, so you will have to look to Wiltsee, who gives you your orders for the salary and other bills due. I regret very much taking this position, but I am away ahead of Wiltsee in putting up money, and I would put up more if I was in a financial position to do so, but I am not, so that ends the matter."

Kent, when called on behalf of the plaintiff, in the course of his testimony said that shortly after he received this letter from Danziger he informed Callahan of Danziger's declaration that he would not be responsible for any more bills. Callahan testified that the conversation to which Kent referred occurred in December, and that he immediately thereafter quit the employ of the concern and made an attachment to secure his debt. Appellant did testify that his arrangement was that he was to furnish money for rigs, indicating that that was to be the extent of his liability. But, taking the history of all of the transactions as illustrated by the testimony and letters, it seems a logical inference that the individual defendants were operating under a plan of copartnership. In the letter of Danziger to which we have last referred he said that he was then ahead of Wiltsee in putting up money, indicating that each man was to furnish an equal amount of capital. We are not here permitted to sit as a trial court and judge of the weight of the testimony, and cannot concern ourselves beyond determining that there was some evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment.

[2] It is argued on behalf of the appellant that Callahan could not enforce a claim against Danziger after the date in July, 1911, when Danziger wrote to Kent that he had put up more money than Wiltsee and would not longer be responsible for any of the debts; that, as plaintiff's own witness Kent testified that he communicated this information to Callahan immediately after receiving that letter, the plaintiff is bound by the testimony; and that Callahan's statement that the conversation in which this notice was given to him occurred in December must be disregarded. This is not the true rule applicable to the matter. Section 2049, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a party producing a witness may contradict the witness by other evidence. In Norwood v. Kenfield, 30 Cal. 393, it is said:

> "A party calling a witness is not precluded from proving the truth of any particular fact by any other competent evidence in direct contradiction to what such witness may have testified; and this not only where it appears that the witness was innocently mistaken, but even where the evidence may collaterally have the effect of showing that he was generally unworthy of belief. This is one of the exceptions to the general rule that a party cannot impeach his own witness. 1 Greenl. Ev., § 443."

Danziger in fact did continue to participate in the adjustment of matters connected with the so-called syndicate down to the end of the year 1911, all of his actions showing a continued interest in the enterprise.

[3] All of the letters to Kent from Danziger and the actions of Danziger in any regard connected with the affairs of the syndicate were properly admitted in evidence. Other letters written by Wiltsee or Wiltsee's agent may not have been strictly admissible, but under the rule of the Constitution we do not think that any error predicated upon the ruling of the trial court in allowing the evidence can be said to have worked a miscarriage of justice.

[4] We think, too, that it was proper for the court to allow the trial to proceed as against the two defendants. There was no claim that any service had been made upon the so-called corporation syndicate, and all of the proof tended to show that no such corporation existed; that the so-called "syndicate" consisted merely of Kent, Wiltsee, and Danziger, who were associated together in the way that has been described. Section 414 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, where an action is against two or more defendants jointly or severally liable, the plaintiff is permitted to proceed against such of the defendants as have been served in the same manner as if they were the only defendants. The instructions of the court seem to have fairly stated the law applicable to the condition of fact illustrated by the evidence.

[5] The partnership, as it must be assumed the jury found to exist, was not a mining partnership as defined by section 2511, Civil Code, where the members are associated together for the purpose of working a mining claim, but in its very nature was of general scope.

MEYER v. JONES et al. (Civ. 1853.)

1. JUDGMENT ⟹844 — ASSIGNMENT — OPERATION AND EFFECT.

Sureties on an undertaking for the release of an attachment, a judgment thereunder having been assigned to plaintiff, without assignment of any right or benefit of the undertaking, are liable to the plaintiff thereon, the undertaking being an incident of the judgment and by assignment passing with it.

2. ATTACHMENT ⟹337—DISCHARGE OF SURETIES ON BOND.

A stipulation that no appeal shall be taken does not release sureties on an undertaking for the release of an attachment, where sureties have, by terms of the bond, agreed to pay on demand the amount of whatever judgment may be rendered; the party to the action being under no obligation to take an appeal from the judgment of the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1213–1222.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. H. Donahue, Judge.

Action by Sophia Meyer against C. W. Jones and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Peck, Bunker & Cole and Henry G. Tardy, all of Oakland, for appellants. Clinton G. Dodge, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this case the defendants executed an undertaking in the sum of $460 for the release of an attachment which had been levied on the property of the C. L. Decker Company in an action in which that company was defendant, and the plaintiff's assignor, Samuel Meyer, was plaintiff, and in which judgment went in favor of plaintiff. In the trial of that action it was stipulated by the parties thereto in open court that the judgment to be rendered therein should be final. Judgment was duly rendered, and no motion for a new trial was made nor any appeal taken, and at the time of the commencement of the present suit the judgment therein was final. Subsequent to its entry Samuel Meyer, without having made any demand for payment of the same, assigned it to the plaintiff herein, who three days later notified the C. L. Decker Company of the assignment. She also caused a writ of execution to be issued, which was returned unsatisfied, whereupon she demanded of the defendants herein payment of the judgment, together with interest and costs, and upon their failure to comply with such demand commenced this action against them upon their bond.

[1] While the judgment was assigned to the plaintiff, there was no assignment of any right or benefit accruing from the defendants' undertaking; and the appellant now contends that the plaintiff acquired no rights under the bond by virtue of their assignment of the judgment. We cannot agree with this contention. We are of the opinion that the undertaking was an incident to the judgment, and that the assignment of the latter entitled the assignee to maintain this action on the bond against the sureties. Heisen v. Smith, 138 Cal. 216, 71 Pac. 180, 94 Am. St. Rep. 39; King v. Miller, 53 Or. 53, 59, 97 Pac. 544.

It is stated in 4 Cyc., at page 72, that the claim upon which a judgment is founded and all the remedies carried by it pass by an assignment of the judgment as an incident thereto. In Schlieman v. Bowlin, 36 Minn. 198, 30 N. W. 879, the assignment of a judgment in replevin was held to operate as an assignment of the bond given to obtain a return of the property. See, also, 2 Freeman on Judgments, § 431; Ullmann v. Kline, 87 Ill. 268; notes to Com. Use of Vicars v. Wampler, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 149. In the present case the contract of the sureties cannot be regarded as giving the assignee a collateral right of action. It was given as security for the debt, which was the foundation of the original action, and it was an incident of the judgment.

[2] Nor do we think that the stipulation that no appeal should be taken, and that the judgment to be rendered by the trial court should be accepted as final, operated to release the sureties on the undertaking. By the terms of the bond the defendants contracted to pay on demand the amount of whatever judgment might be rendered in the action. A party to an action is under no obligation to take an appeal from the judgment of the trial court, which may well be accepted as an authoritative determination of the questions involved therein; and, in the absence of fraud or collusion, the mere fact that the right to move for a new trial or to appeal has been waived in no way affects the liability of the sureties upon an undertaking such as the one here involved. It will not be denied that a surety may stand upon the exact terms of his contract; but we are unable to perceive that the demand made upon the surety in this case is outside the obligation of his contract. All he is asked to do is to pay the amount of the judgment recovered against the defendant in the action in which the bond was given, and which is the precise extent of his undertaking.

In Preston v. Hood, 64 Cal. 405, 1 Pac. 487, it was held that sureties on a bond given to prevent the levy of an attachment are not released by the entry of a judgment by consent with execution stayed for 60 days. In Jaffray v. Smith, 106 Ala. 112, 17 South. 218, it was held that an agreement between counsel, representing parties to several suits by which the result of the several suits was made to depend upon and follow the issue of one of them, which only was actually tried, was not an unauthorized modification of the contract of suretyship, and therefore did not discharge the sureties. Other authorities tending to support this position are Train v. Gold, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 380; Cunningham v. Howell, 23 N. C. 9; First Nat. Bank v. Eureka Lumber Co., 123 N. C. 24, 31 S. E. 348; 32 Cyc. 191.

The judgment is affirmed.

McCLAY et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2165.)

CERTIORARI ⚿5(1)—ERRONEOUS JUDGMENT—REVIEW.

Though it is error for the superior court on appeal, even though it has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action and has acquired jurisdiction of the person of the wife, to issue process for the husband, living with the wife, and to enter a judgment against her, but a judgment so entered cannot be annulled in a proceeding by writ of review, the court not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, and such writ being reviewable only on appeal, and not at all where no further appeal is permitted by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. § 5.]

Writ of review to inquire into the validity of a judgment entered by the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County and John W. Shenk and another, Judges, against Margaret E. McClay and C. E. McClay, petitioners. Judgment affirmed.

Hyman Schwartz, of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Schauer & Schauer and B. Rey Schauer, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. A writ of review was issued herein for the purpose of inquiring into the validity of a judgment rendered by the superior court against the petitioner Margaret E. McClay. The action was commenced in a justice's court to recover against Mrs. McClay and one Lloyd as sureties upon an undertaking executed by them. One C. E. McClay, husband of Margaret E. McClay, was named as a defendant in the amended complaint filed in the justice's court, but the summons was not served upon him. Judgment having been rendered in favor of Mrs. McClay, the plaintiff appealed to the superior court. In both courts Mrs. McClay insisted that the action could not proceed against her until her husband was brought before the court by sufficient process. The superior court allowed an amendment to the complaint and caused an alias summons to issue, which summons, with a copy of the complaint as amended, was served upon C. E. McClay. The latter made a special appearance and moved to quash the service of summons and the summons on the ground that the superior court had no jurisdiction over him. That motion was denied, and thereafter judgment was entered, as above stated, against Mrs. McClay.

The action being against the wife of C. E. McClay to recover on her express contract, the judgment against her is a judgment enforceable only against the separate property of the wife. Terry v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 85, 42 Pac. 464. The husband is not in his own right interested in the action. The judgment is not against him and effects no property right belonging to him.

Doubtless it is erroneous to enter judgment against a wife who is living with her husband, without making the husband a party defendant and causing service of summons to be made upon him. McDonald v. Porsh, 136 Cal. 301, 68 Pac. 817; Horsburgh v. Murasky, 169 Cal. 500, 147 Pac. 147. Assuming for the purposes of this case that the appellate jurisdiction of the superior court was not sufficient to authorize it to cause service of summons to be made upon C. E. McClay, who was not before the court from which the appeal was taken, it does not follow that on account of that error the judgment against defendant Margaret E. McClay is void. For the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and it had acquired personal jurisdiction over Mrs. McClay, against whom judgment was rendered. See Emery v. Kipp, 154 Cal. 83, 97 Pac. 17, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, 129 Am. St. Rep. 141, 16 Ann. Cas. 792; Bogart v. Woodruff, 96 Cal. 609, 31 Pac. 618. Where the husband and wife are sued together, "the wife may defend for her own right," although the husband may defend for her. Code Civ. Proc. § 371. The process by which jurisdiction of the person is acquired is separate and independent as to each defendant, even though the defendants be husband and wife. Where the plaintiff has failed to have summons served upon the husband, the wife is entitled to have the prosecution of the action abate until the husband has been brought in; and if the proceeding as against him be too long neglected she may have the action dismissed, as was done in Horsburgh v. Murasky, supra. But if judgment be entered against her alone, notwithstanding her objection thereto, the error is reviewable only by appeal, and not at all where no further appeal is permitted by law. As the court did not act in excess of its jurisdiction, its judgment will not be annulled in a proceeding by writ of review. Code Civ. Proc. sec. 1068.

The judgment is affirmed.

DONOVAN v. BOARD OF POLICE COM'RS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 1685.)

1. Certiorari 🔑49 — Proceedings — Issuance of Writ—Matters for Review.

On petition for writ of certiorari to review the determination of the board of police commissioners of a city and county, the clerk of the defendant board made no return accompanied by a transcript of the proceedings sought to be reviewed as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1070, and the writ applied for was never allowed, nor did the court grant an order to show cause why it should not be allowed as permitted by section 1069. Uncertified excerpts from the proceedings before the board were received in evidence, and defendants in due course appeared by a purported answer to the petition, which admitted some and denied others of its allegations. Held, that the court was without jurisdiction to proceed to a final hearing and determination of the only questions justiciable under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1068, 1074, which were, Did the defendant board exceed its jurisdiction in making the order complained of, and did it regularly pursue the authority conferred?

2. Certiorari 🔑44 — Writ — Issuance — Evidence.

While the final hearing and determination in certiorari is had upon the writ itself and the return thereto, nevertheless, on an application for the issuance of a writ of certiorari, the court may, in its discretion, consider evidence without the record in determining whether the writ should be issued.

3. Certiorari 🔑44—Hearing—Evidence.

That defendants filed a purported answer to a writ of certiorari does not deprive the court of the right, in determining whether the writ should be issued, to consider evidence outside the record.

4. Certiorari 🔑53—Pleadings—Answer.

An answer in the sense used with reference to ordinary civil proceedings has no place in certiorari, but the defendant should make return stating the rulings and proceedings, the return constituting not only an answer but evidence.

5. Certiorari 🔑57 — Proceedings — Petition.

As the final hearing in certiorari is upon the writ and the return, the petition upon which the writ is issued serves no function after the issuance.

6. Certiorari 🔑40—Return—Necessity.

The required return or its equivalent is an indispensable prerequisite to a final hearing in certiorari.

7. Certiorari 🔑49 — Proceedings — Answer.

Where the petition for a writ of certiorari was not accompanied by a certified copy of the proceedings sought to be reviewed, and defendants filed no return, but only a purported answer, admitting some and denying others of the averments of the petition, the case cannot be treated as one in which the court had jurisdiction on the theory of a return or its equivalent, notwithstanding that the issuance of a writ of certiorari may be waived by stipulation of the parties, or impliedly by an appearance in anticipation of its issuance; there being no certified copy of the proceedings sought to be reviewed or agreed statement of facts.

8. Certiorari 🔑9 — Issuance — Right to Writ.

The writ of certiorari is not one of right, and does not issue as of course, but only in the sound discretion of the tribunal to which application is made.

9. Certiorari 🔑70(4) — Petition — Dismissal.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1077, declaring that a copy of the judgment filed by the clerk, entered upon or attached to the writ and returned, shall constitute the judgment roll in certiorari, a judgment of dismissal in certiorari will be treated as a dismissal of the application and not of the writ; no return having been made and the judgment roll not showing the issuance and existence of a writ.

10. Certiorari 🔑41—Defenses—"Laches."

A petition for certiorari, being addressed to the sound discretion of the court, is very similar to an injunction, and laches, which is the neglect or omission to assert a right which, taken in connection with lapse of time more or less great and other circumstances causes a prejudice to an adverse party barring relief, may be asserted as a defense to an application for certiorari.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. § 59.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Laches.]

11. Municipal Corporations 🔑185(13) — Public Officers—Policemen—"Laches."

While mere delay short of that prescribed by the statute of limitations will not, in itself, constitute laches, barring relief, nevertheless, a 14 months' delay by a police sergeant in seeking certiorari to review his dismissal by the board of police commissioners must be deemed laches barring relief, for it is the duty of a public servant, wrongfully removed, to promptly seek reinstatement to protect a municipality from paying double salaries, etc.

12. Certiorari 🔑68—Matters Reviewable—Weight of Evidence.

The weight of the evidence in any given case is never rightfully reviewed on certiorari.

13. Municipal Corporations 🔑185(13) — Policeman—Dismissal.

In proceedings to review the dismissal of a police sergeant, evidence to the effect that the sergeant, though knowing that robbery was being perpetrated, gave his revolver to another, and allowed such other to interfere and kill the robber warranted dismissal on the ground that the sergeant was guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer.

14. Municipal Corporations 🔑185(13) — Police Officers — Punishment — Review —Discretion of Lower Court.

Where the punishment of a police officer for unbecoming conduct was a matter within the discretion of the board of police commissioners, its determination will not be reviewed on certiorari.

15. Municipal Corporations 🔑185(1)—Police — Police Commissioners — Authority of.

San Francisco Charter, c. 3, § 1, subdiv. 2, declares that the board of police commissioners shall have power to prescribe penalties for violations of any of the rules of the department, and chapter 7, § 2, declares that any member of the department guilty of any offense or violations of the rules and regulations shall be liable to punishment by reprimand or by fine to be fixed by the commissioners or by dismissal. Rule 21, § 46, adopted for the regulations of the department, declares that any conduct unbecoming an officer or offense against the rules and regulations shall subject the offender to such penalty as, in the judgment of the board, may be proper. Held, that it is unnecessary that the board prescribe a particular penalty for the violation of each separate rule, although it is given the power to do so, hence the board may order dismissal of an officer for unbecoming conduct, though no such penalty had been previously prescribed.

16. Municipal Corporations 🔑185(3)—Police — Proceedings for Punishment — Waiver of Irregularities.

Though the charter of a municipality declared that no member of the police department should be subject to punishment for any breach of duty or misconduct except after trial upon a verified complaint, the defective verification of the complaint may be waived by proceeding to trial thereon without objection.

17. Municipal Corporations 🔑185(13) — Review of Removal of Police—Record—Evidence.

Where, on certiorari to review an order of police commissioners dismissing an officer, the record contained no objections by the officer to the verification of the complaint upon which proceedings were had and such objections, had they been made, should have appeared of record, extraneous evidence to show that the objections were made is inadmissible.

18. Municipal Corporations 🔑185(13) — Certiorari Proceedings — Evidence — Admissibility.

On certiorari to review an order of the board of police commissioners dismissing an officer, evidence showing the prejudice of one of the commissioners cannot be received, such matter not appearing in the record below, even though the officer did not, until after hearing, discover the prejudice of the commissioner.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Certiorari by James T. Donovan, to review an order of the Board of Police Commissioners of the City and County of San Francisco and others. From a judgment and order of dismissal, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Dunne, of San Francisco, for appellant. Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Harry G. McKannay, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. In the court below the plaintiff in this proceeding sought a writ of certiorari reviewing and annulling an order of the defendants, sitting as the board of police commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, whereby the plaintiff was dismissed from the police department of the city and county after a trial upon charges preferred against him, which were in effect (1) neglect of duty in failing to discover and suppress a gambling resort existing and operating in the district assigned to him for patrol as a sergeant of police; and (2) neglect of duty in failing to initiate immediate and effective measures for the arrest of a person actually engaged in the commission of a crime, a felony, coupled with conduct unbecoming an officer of the department in voluntarily delivering his revolver to a stranger, who was present at or near the place where said felony was being committed, and who, armed with the defendant's revolver thus abandoned to him, attacked the criminal, and shot and killed him.

Plaintiff's second amended petition for the writ prayed that the defendants be commanded to certify fully to the court below a transcript of the record and proceedings made and had, including the testimony taken, in the matter of his dismissal, and that "upon said certification of said record and proceedings the same be reviewed," and that the judgment or order for the plaintiff's dismissal be thereupon annulled and vacated.

[1] The record before us does not disclose that the clerk of the defendant board made the return accompanied by a transcript of the proceedings sought to be reviewed, as required by section 1070 of the Code of Civil Procedure; in fact the record fails to show that the writ applied for was ever allowed and issued, or that in lieu thereof the court below granted an order to show cause why it should not be allowed, as provided and permitted by section 1069 of the same Code. True, uncertified excerpts from the proceedings had upon the trial of the plaintiff before the board were offered and received in evidence upon the hearing in the court below, but such detached and unauthenticated portions of the record assailed cannot be considered a full or any return in the sense required by the statute. The defendants, however, in due course appeared in the proceeding by a purported answer to the plaintiff's petition for the writ, wherein they admitted some and denied the other allegations of the petition, and at the same time pleaded laches on the part of the plaintiff as a ground for the denial of the writ.

Confronted by this condition of the record, we are constrained to hold that the court below was without jurisdiction to proceed, as indicated by its findings and judgment, to a final hearing and determination of the only questions which could be litigated upon the hearing of the writ, viz. (1) Did the defendants, as the board of police commissioners, exceed their jurisdiction when making the order complained of? and (2) Did they, in the matter before them, regularly pursue the authority conferred upon them? Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1068, 1074; Miller v. Board of Supervisors, 25 Cal. 93.

[2] There is a decided difference between the hearing and determination of an application for the issuance of a writ of certiorari, and the final hearing and determination had upon the writ itself and the return made thereto. In the first case no particular procedure is prescribed; and it is the usual course to allow the writ, or to grant an order to show cause why it should not issue, if the petition upon its face discloses merit. However, the court to whom the petition is addressed may, it seems, in the exercise of its discretion, and for the purpose of determining whether or not, despite the irregularities complained of, injustice may be done by the issuance of the writ, resort to evidence from without the record sought to be reviewed (Harris on Certiorari, § 15; White v. Commissioners, 70 Me. 317, 326; Smith v. County Commissioners, 42 Me. 395, 400; In re Westbath, 36 Me. 74; Stevens v. Commissioners, 97 Me. 121, 53 Atl. 985; Hewett v. County Commissioners, 85 Me. 308, 27 Atl. 179); and in so far as the record before us shows, virtually that is what the court below did in the present case.

[3] The fact that the defendants saw fit to make and file an answer to the plaintiff's petition, unaccompanied by a return of the record, does not alter the situation.

[4] An answer in the sense usually understood in civil pleading is neither necessary nor proper upon a final hearing in certiorari, for the issue ultimately involved therein is presented by and determined from the writ itself and the return made thereto. "Upon certiorari the terms 'answer' and 'return' are sometimes inaccurately used interchangeably. Strictly speaking, the lower tribunal or board should not answer, but should make return, stating its ruling and proceedings, as the return to the writ constitutes an answer as well as evidence." 4 Standard

Cyclopedia of Procedure, 935; Stumpf v. Board, 131 Cal. 364, 63 Pac. 663, 82 Am. St. Rep. 350; Lowell v. Commissioners, 146 Mass. 403, 16 N. E. 8; Tewksbury v. Commissioners, 117 Mass. 563; Woodin, Adm'r, v. Phœnix, 41 Mich. 655, 2 N. W. 923, 32 Am. Rep. 172.

[5, 6] The only purpose of the petition is to procure the issuance of the writ; and when it has served that purpose, it has ceased to be a factor in the proceedings. Taylor v. Bissell, 1 Minn. 225 (Gil. 186). This is so because the settled general rule in certiorari is that the trial and judgment therein must be had solely upon an inspection of the record of the proceedings assailed, and not upon any ulterior issue of fact. Tewksbury v. Commissioners, supra; Gerdes v. Champion, 108 Ill. 137; McManus v. McDonough, 4 Ill. App. 180; Roe v. Superior Court, 60 Cal. 93; Harris on Certiorari, §§ 120–130. Clearly, therefore, the required return or its equivalent is an indispensable prerequisite to a final hearing in certiorari. Leroy v. Mayor, 20 John. (N. Y.) 430, 11 Am. Dec. 289; Ex parte Dugan, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.) 134, 17 L. Ed. 871; McManus v. McDonough, supra.

[7] We are not unmindful of the many cases which might be cited tending to support the proposition that the issuance of the writ may be waived by stipulation of the parties, or impliedly by an appearance in anticipation of its issuance and then proceeding to a hearing without objection. We are also aware that it has been held that the return may be made upon an agreed statement of facts, and that when a transcript of the record of the proceedings assailed is attached to and made a part of the petition for the writ, the parties may, either expressly or impliedly, waive the formal return. Of course when this is done there can be no need for the writ nor any necessity for a formal return. While the appearance of the defendants in the present case may be construed as a waiver of the issuance of the writ, nevertheless the petition for the writ was not accompanied by a certified copy of the proceedings sought to be reviewed; and that the purported hearing and judgment upon the ultimate merits of the controversy were not had upon an agreed statement of facts of the case is indicated by an inspection of the record as a whole, and particularly by a ruling of the trial court which, in the face of objection, permitted in evidence "subject to its being verified" an excerpt from the proceedings assailed, which had been made by counsel for the plaintiff and which, in so far as the record shows, was not subsequently verified. Consequently it cannot be said that the proceedings had in the court below were based upon the required return or its equivalent; and, that being so, there is no escape from the conclusion that the court was without jurisdiction to fully and finally review the validity of the proceedings attacked. Code Civ. Proc. 1070, 1075; McKay v. Jones, 30 Ark. 148; Phillips v. Desha, 58 Ark. 250, 24 S. W. 249; Marshall v. Ramsauer, 30 Ark. 532; Dicus v. Bright, 23 Ark. 107; Deans v. Wilcoxon, 18 Fla. 531; People v. McCraney, 21 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 149; Derton v. Boyd, 21 Ark. 264; Rightor v. Gray, 23 Ark. 228; Stemble v. Hewling, 2 Ohio St. 229; Vance v. Goudy, Wright (Ohio) 307; Brownwell v. Skinner, Id. 682; Walker v. Dist. of Columbia, 6 Mackey (17 D. C.) 352.

Stripped of the purported findings, conclusions of law, and final formal judgment which, as we have shown, the court below was without jurisdiction to make, the record shows, as we have previously indicated, no more than a mere hearing of the plaintiff's petition, presumably upon notice, as is permitted by section 1069 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the issuance of the writ.

[8, 9] The writ of certiorari is not one of right, and therefore does not issue as of course, but only in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion; and, construing the so-called judgment as tantamount to a denial of the petition for the writ, it must stand affirmed if it can be said that the court below was justified in refusing the writ for the reason, among others, as declared in its so-called conclusions of law, that the plaintiff had "not established grounds for the issuance of the writ." Incidentally it may be noted in passing that this conclusion of law strengthens the idea that the proceedings had in the court below were in limine, and involved but the single question of the propriety of issuing the writ; and our conclusion in that behalf is further fortified by the fact that the judgment roll certified to us does not exhibit, as required by section 1077 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the issuance and existence of a writ and a return. The requirement of the Code in this behalf rests doubtless upon the theory that, inasmuch as the return to the writ is the basis of the judgment reviewed by the court, it should appear as a part of the record on appeal. McManus v. McDonough, supra.

This brings us to a consideration of the question of whether or not, upon the showing made upon the hearing of the application for the writ, the court below was justified in refusing it.

[10, 11] In this connection we note at the outset that the petition on its face discloses that the plaintiff was guilty of laches in seeking redress through the medium of certiorari. A petition for a writ of certiorari is addressed to the discretion of the court or judge to whom the application is made, and therefore is very much akin to a prayer for an injunction in equity (Harris on Certiorari, § 2); and "Laches is defined as such neglect or omission to assert a right as, taken in conjunction with the lapse of time, more or less great, and other circumstances causing prejudice to an adverse party, operates as a bar in a court of equity." Cahill v. Sup. Ct., 145 Cal. 42, 46, 78 Pac. 467, 469. It appears from the petition in the present case that the plaintiff was dismissed from the police department by an order of the defendants on the 9th day of February, 1911, and the indorsements on the petition show that it was not filed in the court below until the 18th day of June, 1912, more than 14 months after the order of dismissal. In the absence of a showing sufficient to excuse this delay it certainly constituted laches. While it is true, as counsel for the plaintiff contends, that mere lapse of time short of that prescribed by a statute of limitations in any given similar case will not, in itself, suffice to constitute laches so as to bar a remedy, nevertheless, if in addition it appears from all the circumstances of the case that prejudice must, or from the very nature of the case may, be reasonably expected to result, the remedy will be denied (Cahill v. Sup. Ct., supra; Cook v. Ceas, 147 Cal. 614, 82 Pac. 370; McGibbon v. Smith, 172 Cal. 70, 155 Pac. 460); and, whenever public inconvenience might result from the annulment of the proceedings sought to be reviewed the rule of laches relative to applications for the writ is applied and enforced with particular strictness (4 Standard Ency. of Law and Proc. 912). As was stated in the case of Murphy v. Keller, 61 App. Div. 145, 70 N. Y. Supp. 405:

> "In all proceedings of this character, where a person removed from office is entitled to receive from the public compensation for the services he performs, if he intends to insist that his removal was illegal, or that the law entitles him to be reinstated, his application for reinstatement should be promptly made, so as to protect the city from the necessity of paying two persons for the same services."

It would be contrary to common knowledge of the needs of the police department of a great city, and the well-known practice of the appointing powers to fill vacancies created in such department, to suppose that the defendants in the present case allowed the vacancy created by the dismissal of the plaintiff to long remain unfilled; and therefore it may fairly be said that the particular circumstances of the case as disclosed by the petition for the writ show with sufficient certainty that prejudice as a result of the plaintiff's laches would follow the granting of the writ.

This opinion might with propriety, and in strictness should, end here with an affirmance of the judgment (Knorp v. Board of Police Com'rs, 161 Pac. 12); but a due recognition of the labor and research evidently expended by the very able counsel for the petitioner in the preparation of most excellent briefs in support of the points made for a reversal constrains us to say that, even if the record before us justified the assumption that the proceedings in the court below were had upon an inspection of the record, or its equivalent, of the proceedings sought to be reviewed, nevertheless we are of the opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled upon the showing made to the relief prayed for.

[12, 13] One of the allegations of the plaintiff's petition was that the evidence received by the defendants sitting as the board of police commissioners upon the trial of the plaintiff did not justify the finding of his guilt of the charges preferred against him, nor warrant the punishment of dismissal meted out to him. In support of this phase of the controversy there was offered and read in evidence in the court below a purported, but nevertheless unauthenticated, transcript of the testimony taken at the trial of the plaintiff, which showed, in substance, that on and prior to the 27th day of January, 1911, the plaintiff was a duly appointed and acting sergeant of police in the police department of the city and county of San Francisco. On that date one Gustav Postler "held up" the Saratoga Club, a gambling house in said city. Postler was accompanied to the scene of the robbery by his son Paul, a boy of about 15 years of age, who, however, was unaware of the unlawful mission of his father. Leaving the boy in a buggy in which they had driven to the scene, Postler entered the elevator of the building, and was taken to the floor where the rooms of the club were situated. Shortly thereafter the son observed three men attempted to leave the building by means of a fire escape, one of whom, E. L. Kripp, succeeded in reaching the sidewalk. Upon observing the action of the men upon the fire escape young Postler informed the plaintiff, who was standing in front of the premises, that there was trouble in the building, and pointed out Kripp as a man who had left the building by means of the fire escape. When questioned by plaintiff Kripp informed him that some one was trying to rob the place upstairs, whereupon he requested Kripp to guard the elevator until the plaintiff obtained assistance. Kripp thereupon asked plaintiff for his pistol. Plaintiff complied with this request, and immediately left for assistance. Returning, he learned from young Postler in the presence of Kripp that the man attempting the robbery upstairs was the boy's father. Kripp requested the boy to go upstairs with him. This young Postler did, and, upon meeting his father, he asked him not to shoot and to give back the money which he had taken from the keeper of the game. The father did not answer his son, but requested Kripp to go to the door of the rooms, and then, according to the testimony of the boy, Kripp turned and fired a shot at the elder Postler, which was followed by several other shots; and when the smoke of battle cleared away Postler, the elder, was found dead. At the time young Postler and Kripp entered the elevator plaintiff was present, but did not ascend with them because, as he explained, the elevator operator refused him permission to do so. However, upon plaintiff's order Police Officer O'Connell, who had been summoned by plaintiff, ascended to the gambling rooms by means of the stairway, and it was not until he had reported the elder Postler dead that the plaintiff went to the scene of the robbery and killing.

The weight of the evidence in any given case is never rightfully reviewed upon certiorari; but, apart from this, we are satisfied that the circumstances above narrated show something more than a mere mistake of judgment which any police officer is likely to make when confronted with a sudden and wholly unexpected emergency, and therefore we cannot agree with the contention of counsel for plaintiff that the evidence did not show him to have been guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer, nor warrant the extreme penalty of his dismissal.

[14] Moreover, the fixing of the penalty was a matter within the discretion of the board, which, when exercised within the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the charter of the municipality, will not be disturbed upon certiorari.

[15] The contention that the defendants were without jurisdiction to order the dismissal of the plaintiff because no penalty had been previously prescribed for the violation of the particular rule which he was charged with violating is elaborately argued; but it is fully and effectively answered, we think, by the provisions of the charter and the rules of the board. Thus, subdivision 2, of section 1, of chapter 3, of the charter provides that the board shall have power to prescribe penalties for the violation of any of the rules of the department; and section 2 of chapter 7 provides that:

> "Any member of the department guilty of any offense or violation of the rules and regulations shall be liable to punishment by reprimand, or by fine to be fixed by the commissioners, or by dismissal from the department."

Section 46 of rule 21, enacted and adopted for the regulation of the department, provides that:

> "Any conduct unbecoming an officer, and offenses against the rules and regulations of the department, shall subject the offender to such penalty as in the judgment of the board may be proper under the law."

Reading this rule in conjunction with the charter provisions above referred to, we have no doubt that under it the offense charged against the plaintiff might, in the judgment of the board, be punished by reprimand, a fine, or by dismissal, and it was not necessary that a particular penalty should be prescribed for the violation of each separate rule of the department, although under the charter the board was given power to do so; nor was it essential to the jurisdiction of the board to inflict punishment for a violation of the rules of the department that it should have expressly prescribed a penalty according to the gravity of the offense. The wide latitude allowed to the defendants in the matter of fixing punishment does not, as counsel for the plaintiff in effect contend, operate to render the rule of the board in that behalf unjust, unreasonable, and oppressive, and therefore void, for, as was said in the case of Cleu v. Board of Police Commissioners, 3 Cal. App. 174, 84 Pac. 672:

> "A wide discretion must be lodged in the board in determining what conduct on the part of members of the department is injurious to the efficiency of the department. * * * It must be presumed that the board, in enforcing such a rule, will act in good faith for the welfare of the service, and not for purposes of oppression."

[16, 17] One of the provisions of the charter is that no member of the department shall be subject to punishment for any breach of duty or misconduct except after a trial upon a verified complaint; and because the complaint filed against the plaintiff in the present case was verified before the chief of police, who, it is claimed, is not one of the officers authorized by law to administer oaths, it was urged in the court below, and it is urged here, that the board was without jurisdiction to try the plaintiff. Conceding that the chief of police was not authorized to take the verification to the complaint, and granting that an improper verification is no verification, and therefore a quasi jurisdictional defect, nevertheless it is a defect which may be waived by proceeding, as did the plaintiff in the present case, to a hearing without objection. True, upon the hearing had in the court below plaintiff produced several witnesses who testified that, before proceeding to trial upon the charge preferred against him, the plaintiff by his attorney made the objection that the complaint was not properly verified; but as against this testimony it was an admitted fact in the case that the record of the proceedings before the board was silent on that subject; and the secretary and stenographer of the defendants both testified that if such an objection had been made, they would have heard it, and both would have noted it and made it a permanent part of the record of the proceedings.

Aside from the fact that the court below should not have permitted evidence from without the record as to a fact which, if it existed, should have been made a part of the record, we are satisfied that the evidence sustains the court's finding that the plaintiff waived the defect in the verification by failing to object thereto.

[18] The final ground urged for the issuance of the writ is to be found in the allegation of the plaintiff's petition, which, in effect, avers that one of the commissioners who sat in judgment upon the plaintiff had, prior to the latter's trial, expressed to a fellow commissioner a determination to "break" the plaintiff "because he was a rich man," and because of the fact that the newspapers were condemning the commission for its past favorable attitude towards policemen charged with violation of the rules of the department. Upon the hearing had in the court below this allegation of the petition was fully supported by uncontradicted testimony, which, upon the whole, tended strongly to show that the commissioner in question was so far prejudiced against the plaintiff and his cause as to be utterly disqualified to sit in judgment upon him. The court below, nevertheless, made its finding to the effect that the commissioner in question was neither prejudiced nor disqualified by reason of his expressed determination to "break" the plaintiff; and it is now insisted that a finding in keeping with the evidence would have warranted and required a judgment in plaintiff's favor, annulling the order of his dismissal, upon the theory that he was not accorded the fair and impartial trial expressly guaranteed him by the charter.

The weakness of this contention is to be found in the circumstance that the disqualification of the commissioner in question is not made to appear upon the face of the record of the proceedings sought to be reviewed; and, as we have previously pointed out, in certiorari the reviewing court is confined to an inspection of the record assailed (Ross v. Sup. Court, supra), and it will not look beyond the record nor hear anything out of it. True the prejudice of the commissioner in question was not known to the plaintiff until a year after his dismissal, and consequently could not have been taken advantage of at the trial before the commission so as to make it appear of record in the proceedings. Nevertheless the fact remains that it does not appear of record, and cannot be made to appear of record save and except by evidence outside of it. Therefore, even conceding that a prejudiced judge participated in the trial of the plaintiff, nevertheless the latter's remedy, if any, is not to be found in certiorari. White v. Commonwealth, 70 Me. 317, 326; Walker v. Dist. of Columbia, 6 Mackey (17 D. C.) 352.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

NORTH PACIFIC S. S. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 7398.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 3, 1917. Rehearing Denied March 5, 1917.)

1. Courts 🔑489(1) — Jurisdiction — Maritime Accidents—Admiralty.

By Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2, par. 1, the judicial power of the United States extends to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and such jurisdiction is exclusive in federal courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 1325.]

2. Admiralty 🔑1—Jurisdiction—Enlargement or Abridgment.

Since jurisdiction of federal courts in admiralty rests on the Constitution, it cannot be enlarged or abridged by Congress, nor by the states.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Admiralty, Cent. Dig. §§ 1–17.]

3. Admiralty 🔑1 — "Jurisdiction" — Enlargement or Abridgment.

"Jurisdiction," as used in cases holding that federal admiralty jurisdiction cannot be enlarged or abridged, means only general jurisdiction over cases of admiralty cognizance, and does not preclude creation of new rights and remedies in maritime matters by the states, enforceable in state courts or by Congress.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Admiralty, Cent. Dig. §§ 1–17.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Jurisdiction.]

4. Admiralty 🔑1 — Jurisdiction — Enlargement or Abridgment.

In view of Judiciary Act Sept. 24, 1789, c. 20, 1 Stat. 73, granting admiralty jurisdiction to the federal District Court and saving to suitors common-law remedies where common law was competent to give a remedy, while the state Legislatures cannot in terms enlarge the jurisdiction of admiralty, they may pass laws creating new rights over matters within the jurisdiction of admiralty, and may enforce those rights in the state courts, upon the theory that Congress has been remiss in its failure to pass similar enactments covering the same subject-matter.

5. Admiralty 🔑2—Jurisdiction—Common-Law Remedies.

Assuming that Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) comes within the scope of a remedy afforded by the common law, it is entitled to efficacy by all tribunals, and Admiralty must respect it if it is within the saving clause of the Judiciary Act, even though it creates a new right and a new remedy therefor.

6. Admiralty 🔑2 — Jurisdiction — "Common-Law Remedy."

Since "common-law remedy," as employed in Judiciary Act, means any remedy with or without action or jury which is a substitute for a suit at law, whereby a liability is imposed after due process of law, the Workmen's Compensation Act is within its saving clause, although the common law knew no right of action for a death without tort; the language of the judiciary act not being limited to remedies at common law then existing, but including rights and remedies subsequently created by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Admiralty, Cent. Dig. §§ 18–28.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Common-Law Remedy.]

7. Admiralty 🔑2 — Jurisdiction — "Common-Law Remedy."

Touching torts committed on the high seas, a state may create on behalf of the injured person, his heirs or representatives, new rights and new remedies, and provide for the maintenance of those rights and the enforcement of those remedies in her own courts, without the slightest regard to admiralty, under the construction which has been put upon the saving clause of the Judiciary Act.

8. Commerce 🔑80 — Powers of States — Workmen's Compensation Acts.

Workmen's Compensation Act, giving seamen a right to compensation, is not an unwarranted interference with foreign commerce.

9. Master and Servant 🔑394—Workmen's Compensation—Seamen.

Workmen's Compensation Act, as applied to seamen, limiting the right to compensation to proceedings under the provisions of the act itself, imports no more than that, if a seaman is injured and seeks recovery in personam, he can proceed only under the act before the Accident Commisssion.

10. Master and Servant 🔑347 — Courts —"Common-Law Remedy."

Rev. St. §§ 4283, 4289 (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, §§ 8021, 8027), limiting liability of vessel owner for damages occurring without his privity to the amount of his interest in the vessel and her freight, create no irreconcilable conflict with Workmen's Compensation Act, since, giving them full force, it would result only that the Accident Commission would be in duty bound to limit its award to the amount of the federal limitation.

In Bank. Application by George Rose for workmen's compensation, opposed by the North Pacific Steamship Company, employer. On writ of review on petition of the employer to review an award by the Industrial Commission. Writ discharged, and award affirmed.

H. W. Glensor, Courtney L. Moore, and Chas. H. Sooy, all of San Francisco, for petitioner. F. R. Wall, of San Francisco, for applicant George Rose. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The respondent the Industrial Accident Commission of the state of California assumed jurisdiction and made its award in the case of a seaman in the employ of the petitioner, who was injured while his vessel, owned by citizens of this state, was upon the high seas. Application for a writ of review was granted by this court. This application was based upon the contentions that the United States District Courts, under their admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, were alone empowered to deal with the question, and that the Industrial Compensation Act of California (St. 1913, p. 279), in so far as it was sought to apply it to seamen, was an unconstitutional usurpation of that jurisdiction. This statement of the controversy demonstrates that the question is one peculiarly of federal cognizance, and that the final arbiter in resolving and answering it is the Supreme Court of the United States. For this reason, and being advised that the identical question was sub judice in that tribunal, the decision of this case was postponed to await and to follow the decision of that court. Its decision, however, has been so long delayed that we have deemed it inexpedient longer to postpone our own decision, though it is with reluctance that we take up the consideration thus in advance of its final disposition by the one court whose interpretation will be all-controlling. So to the end that, if we do err, the flaws in our reasoning may readily be detected, we have thought it best to endure the just accusation of prolixity in here setting forth our views at some length.

[1] The Constitution of the United States (article 3, § 2, par. 1) declares that the judicial power of the United States shall extend "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." The controversy which had arisen in England in the not unsuccessful efforts of the common-law courts to throttle the courts of admiralty was familiar to the framers of that Constitution. Equally familiar to the jurist is the construction put by the courts of the United States upon this language. Thus in the leading case of De Lovio v. Boit et al., 7 Fed. Cas. 417, Fed. Cas. No. 3,776, Judge Story, going over the whole question of admiralty jurisdiction, concludes his review by declaring that he was "without the slightest hesitation ready to pronounce that the delegation of cognizance of 'all civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction' to the courts of the United States comprehends all maritime contracts, torts, and injuries." As admiralty and maritime jurisdiction then has to do with all things touching mariners and their ships while seafaring, there can be no hesitation in saying that the injury of this seaman upon the high seas presents a case within the cognizance of admiralty. Insurance Co. v. Dunham, 11 Wall. 1, 20 L. Ed. 90; Benedict, Admiralty, § 182 et seq. Whether or not admiralty would or could decree an award for this injury, not founded upon tort, presents an entirely different question.

Moreover, it is so well settled as scarcely to need the citation of authority that this jurisdiction is exclusive in the federal courts. The Hine v. Trevor, 4 Wall. 555, 18 L. Ed. 451; The Eagle, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 15, 19 L. Ed. 365; Rev. St. U. S. § 563, subd. 8.

[2] The next fact to be noted is that the jurisdiction of the federal courts in admiralty rests upon the Constitution, and that such jurisdiction is not dependent upon and cannot be enlarged or abridged by Congress. Watts v. Camors, 115 U. S. 353, 6 Sup. Ct. 91, 29 L. Ed. 406; The J. E. Rumbell, 148 U. S. 1, 13 Sup. Ct. 498, 37 L. Ed. 345; The Blackheath, 195 U. S. 361, 25 Sup. Ct. 46, 49 L. Ed. 236; The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. 558, 22 L. Ed. 654; The Chusan, Fed. Cas. No. 2,717; 2 Story, 455. Nor yet has any state of the United States the power to enlarge or diminish the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts. The Rumbell, supra; Steamboat Orleans v. Phœbus, 11 Pet. 175, 9 L. Ed. 677; The Lottawanna, supra; Butler v. Boston & Savannah S. Co., 130 U. S. 527, 9 Sup. Ct. 612, 32 L. Ed. 1017; Workman v. Mayor of N. Y., etc., 179 U. S. 552, 29 Sup. Ct. 212, 45 L. Ed. 314; The Chusan, supra; The Manhasset (D. C.) 18 Fed. 918; Cornell Steamboat Co. v. Fallon, 179 Fed. 293, 102 C. C. A. 345.

[3] It becomes necessary here to consider briefly what is meant by the word "jurisdiction" as employed in all these cases, holding that neither Congress nor the Legislature of any state has the power to enlarge or abridge the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts. It seems manifest from the adjudications that "jurisdiction," as the word is thus employed, means that general jurisdiction over all cases of admiralty and maritime cognizance, and that the decisions are to be understood as declaring only that neither Congress nor the Legislatures of the states can strip the courts of admiralty of any part of the jurisdiction which was theirs under the substantive law of admiralty at the time the Constitution was adopted. Equally manifest is it that the decisions do not mean that the national Congress may not create new rights and new remedies within the scope of this general jurisdiction, and equally true is it that the state Legislatures may in some instances, at least, create rights and remedies having clearly to do with maritime affairs, which rights and remedies may be enforced in the state's tribunals, without regard either to their acceptance in admiralty or to the fact that they seemingly trench upon the admiralty jurisdiction reserved to the federal courts.

[4] All of this arises under the language of the Judiciary Act of Congress of 1789 (Act Sept. 24, 1789, c. 20, 1 Stat. 73), by which act the granting of admiralty jurisdiction to the district court was accompanied by a "saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it." But as the states have thus surrendered all of their admiralty jurisdiction, as the exclusive jurisdiction of all of these questions and cases is still in the federal courts (The Hine v. Trevor, supra; Town of Pelham v. The B. F. Woolsey [D. C.] 3 Fed. 457), and as only such remedies as are or may be afforded by the common law are made available to suitors, it would appear that a state could neither create a new right in admiralty nor enforce any remedy which it may have provided for that right, until recognition in admiralty and by admiralty of the existence of that right; or, in other words, until its adoption by admiralty as a part of its substantive law. But, to the contrary, it seems that such reasoning is wholly fallacious. Thus, where the state statute gave a right of action for recovery for damages for the death of a sailor occasioned by tort while on the high seas, it is held that a recovery may be had under this statute both in the state courts and in the federal courts, and this notwithstanding the fact that such a case is one of "admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," and that admiralty, in this respect running current with the common law, gave no right of action for such a death. Steamboat Co. v. Chace, 16 Wall. 522, 21 L. Ed. 369; Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 23 L. Ed. 819; Fisher v. Boutelle Trans. & Towing Co. (D. C.) 162 Fed. 994; International Nav. Co. v. Lindstrom, 123 Fed. 475, 60 C. C. A. 649; The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 213, 7 Sup. Ct. 140, 30 L. Ed. 358; The Hamilton, 207 U. S. 398, 28 Sup. Ct. 133, 52 L. Ed. 264; Aurora Shipping Co. v. Boyce, 191 Fed. 966, 112 C. C. A. 372.

In International Nav. Co. v. Lindstrom, supra, it is said by the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Second District:

> "The territorial sovereignty of a state extends to a vessel of the state when it is upon the high seas, the vessel being deemed a part of the territory of the state to which it belongs; and it follows that a state statute which creates a liability or authorizes a recovery for the consequences of a tortious act operates as efficiently upon a vessel of the state when the vessel is beyond its boundaries as it does when it is physically within the state."

The reasoning of the Circuit Court of Appeals was that as a matter of comity the court in admiralty would take cognizance of and give effect to a right created by a state. And this extremely elastic power of the courts of admiralty so to do is further emphasized in The Hamilton, 207 U. S. 398, 28 Sup. Ct. 133, 52 L. Ed. 264. There a Delaware statute made provision for recovery by the heirs or representatives for death resulting on the high seas arising from tort. The pronouncement of the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice Holmes, is that until Congress acts on the subject a state may legislate in regard to the duties and liabilities of its citizens and corporations while on the high seas. The reasoning is that:

> The saving clause of the judiciary act "'saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it,' leaves open the common-law jurisdiction of the state courts over torts committed at sea." "And," so proceeds the opinion, "as the state courts in their decisions would follow their own notions about the law and might change them from time to time, it would be strange if the state might not make changes by its other mouthpiece, the Legislature."

While touching the inherent power of the admiralty courts to enlarge the scope of their activities by adopting and applying new rights and new remedies created by state courts, it is said:

> "Being valid, it [the state law] created an obligatio, a personal liability of the owner of the Hamilton to the claimants. Slater v. Mexican National R. R. Co., 194 U. S. 120 [24 Sup. Ct. 581, 48 L. Ed. 900]. This, of course, the admiralty would not disregard, but would respect the right when brought before it in any legitimate way. * * * The liability would be recognized in all. Nor would there be produced any lamentable lack of uniformity. Courts constantly enforce rights arising from and depending upon other laws than those governing the local transactions of the jurisdiction in which they sit."

If we are successful in following this reasoning, it means that, while the state Legislature cannot in terms enlarge the jurisdiction of admiralty, they may pass laws creating new rights over matters within the jurisdiction of admiralty, and may enforce those rights in the state courts, upon the theory that Congress has been remiss in its failure to pass similar enactments covering the same subject-matter. And, furthermore, since these state statutes are thus valid, it is within the power, and seemingly it is the duty, of admiralty to enlarge its own jurisdiction by acquiescing in and taking cognizance of the rights and remedies thus created by the state Legislatures. At the foundation of this reasoning there would appear to lie the premise that, if a state legislates in advance of Congress, it is to be concluded that Congress, through inadvertence or negligence, has failed to pass like legislation, and therefore what might otherwise appear to be the reasonable assumption, viz. that Congress, after consideration, had declined or refused to legislate under the conviction that existing laws were adequate, is, of course, denied a consideration. And finally, it is to be noted that the earlier utterances of the Supreme Court declaring that one of the potent reasons why exclusive jurisdiction and control of all these questions was vested in admiralty was to preserve symmetry and uniformity in its jurisprudence, as pointed out in the Chusan Case, supra, and with great vigor and clearness by Mr. Justice White in Workman v. Mayor of New York, etc., supra, where he said:

> "The practical destruction of a uniform maritime law which must arise from this premise is made manifest when it is considered that, if it be true that the principles of the general maritime law giving relief for every character of maritime tort where the wrongdoer is subject to the jurisdiction of admiralty courts can be overthrown by conflicting decisions of state courts, it would follow that there would be no general maritime law for the redress of wrongs, as such law would be necessarily one thing in one state and one in another; one thing in one port of the United States and a different thing in some other port. As the power to change state laws or state decisions rests with the state authorities by which such laws are enacted or decisions rendered, it would come to pass that the maritime law affording relief for wrongs done, instead of being general and ever abiding, would be purely local—would be one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow. That the confusion to result would amount to the abrogation of a uniform maritime law is at once patent."

It is to be noted, we repeat, that this asymmetry and lack of uniformity we are now told would not be "lamentable."

[5] With this law and reasoning before us, we may make our more or less successful endeavor to strike at the heart of the matter before us. Our Workmen's Compensation Act is an economic and sociological development in legislation. It creates a right of compensation to the workman without regard to the question whether his injury was occasioned by tort. This law we have declared to be valid. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 688, 151 Pac. 398. Congress has been remiss in its failure to enter and cover this field of legislation. Assuming for the moment that the remedy of our state law comes within the scope and purview of a "remedy afforded by the common law," there is created and imposed a new obligatio—a personal liability upon the part of the owner of the vessel. Admiralty will respect this right when brought before it. But, whether it does or not, it is entitled to efficacy as well as respect by all state tribunals, and admiralty itself is under the compulsion to respect it if the state statute, even though it creates a new right and a new remedy therefor, is within the saving clause of the Judiciary Act, and to that question we now come.

[6] Of course, at the time of the adoption of our Constitution and of the passage of the Judiciary Act the common law knew no right of action for a death, even when it was occasioned by tort, and, of course, it knew of no action for injury or death not occasioned by tort and had no remedy for either. Neither did admiralty. Futhermore, except in the broadest sense, acts of Parliament form no part of the common law, and very frequently are in derogation of it. Nevertheless the language of the Judiciary Act is not limited to the remedies at common law then existing, and did and does include rights and remedies which might subsequently be created by statute. In Knapp, Stout & Co. v. McCaffrey, 177 U. S. 638, 20 Sup. Ct. 824, 44 L. Ed. 921, this matter is considered at some length. There a bill in equity had been brought in a state court to foreclose a common-law lien upon a raft. This bill in equity was held not to be an invasion of the exclusive admiralty jurisdiction of the District Courts, but to be a proceeding to enforce a common-law remedy within the saving clause, and it is said:

> "The real question is whether the proceeding taken is within the exception 'of saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it.' It was certainly not a common-law action, but a suit in equity. But it will be noticed that the reservation is not of an action at common law, but of a common-law remedy; and a remedy does not necessarily imply an action. A remedy is defined by Bouvier as 'the means employed to enforce a right, or redress an injury.' While, as stated by him, remedies for nonfulfillment of contracts are generally by action, they are by no means universally so. Thus a landlord has at common law a remedy by distress for his rent—a right also given to him for the purpose of exacting compensation for damages resulting from the trespass of cattle. A bailee of property has a remedy for work done upon such property, or for expenses incurred in keeping it, by detention of possession. An innkeeper has a similar remedy upon the goods of his guests to the amount of his charges for their entertainment; and a carrier has a like lien upon the thing carried. There is also a common-law remedy for nuisances by abatement; a right upon the part of the person assaulted to resist the assailant, even to his death; a right of recaption of goods stolen or unlawfully taken; and a public right against disturbers of the peace by compelling them to give sureties for their good behavior. All these remedies are independent of an action.
> "Some of the cases already cited recognize the distinction between a common-law action and a common-law remedy. Thus in The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. 411, 431, 18 L. Ed. 397, it is said of the saving clause of the Judiciary Act: 'It is not a remedy in the common-law courts which is saved, but a common-law remedy.' To same effect is Moran v. Sturges, 154 U. S. 256, 276 [14 Sup. Ct. 1019, 38 L. Ed. 981]."

Without further quotation, reference may be made to Col. Mid. Ry. Co. v. Jones (C. C.) 29 Fed. 193, which case is quoted with approval by the United States Supreme Court in Searl v. School Dist. No. 2, 124 U. S. at page 200, 8 Sup. Ct. 460, 31 L. Ed. 415. The substance of these decisions seems to be that a common-law remedy as employed in the Judiciary Act means any remedy, with or without action or jury, which is a substitute for a suit at law, whereby a liability is imposed after due process of law.

[7] In brief, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States leave no room for doubt but that touching torts committed on the high seas a state may create on behalf of the injured person, his heirs or representatives, new rights and new remedies, and provide for the maintenance of those rights and the enforcement of those remedies in her own courts, without the slightest regard to admiralty, under the construction which has been put upon the saving clause of the Judiciary Act, aided by the further reasoning and conclusion that the exclusive jurisdiction of admiralty has reference only (so far as concerns this question) to a direct libel in rem against the vessel itself. And where the suitor does not seek this particular form of relief, but prosecutes his action in personam, he may have resort to the courts of the state, without the slightest regard to the jurisdiction of admiralty. Aurora Shipping Co. v. Boyce, supra; The Osceola, 189 U. S. 172, 23 Sup. Ct. 483, 47 L. Ed. 760; Taylor v. Carryl, 61 U. S. (20 How.) 583, 15 L. Ed. 1028; Knapp et al. v. McCaffrey, supra; Rounds et al. v. Cloverport, etc., Co., 237 U. S. 303, 35 Sup. Ct. 596, 59 L. Ed. 966. That due process of law is provided for in our Workmen's Compensation Act we have already decided. So also have we decided that the imposition of liability upon an employer to compensate his employé for injuries received by the latter in the course of employment, without negligence or fault upon the part of the employer, does no violence to the employer's rights under the Constitution of the United States or of this state. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra. It is unquestioned that Congress has not legislated upon this subject-matter so far as concerns men who go down in ships to the seas.

[8] We perceive no force in petitioner's contention that in its operation the state act is an unwarranted interference with the foreign commerce of the nation, and upon this we are quite in accord with The City of Norwalk (D. C.) 55 Fed. 103; Jensen v. Southern Pacific Co., 215 N. Y. 514, 109 N. E. 601, L. R. A. 1916A, 403, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 276, and Kennerson v. Thames Towboat Co., 89 Conn. 367, 94 Atl. 375, L. R. A. 1916A, 436.

[9] In conclusion a word should be said of the decisions of two of the courts of last resort of two maritime states which have treated of this question as bearing on their acts for the compensation of workmen. In the Matter of Walker v. Clyde S. S. Co., 215 N. Y. 529, 109 N. E. 604, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 87, the Court of Appeals of that state held, as we hold here, that the remedy provided by the Workmen's Compensation Act is a remedy within the meaning of the saving clause of the federal Judiciary Act, and, being in no sense a proceeding in rem, may exist concurrently with the right to proceed in admiralty. In State ex rel. Jarvis v. Daggett, 87 Wash. 253, 151 Pac. 648, L. R. A. 1916A, 446, the Supreme Court of that state expressed a contrary view, holding that its Compensation Act was not meant to apply to maritime injuries and torts. It based its conclusion upon two features of the Washington act, which are likewise found in the California statute. One of these was the provision abolishing all other remedies and limiting the right to compensation to proceedings under the provisions of the act itself. But concerning this matter we think it sufficient to say that the similar language of our own act will not be construed as designed to exclude admiralty from a jurisdiction which it possesses, but merely to limit suitors in the tribunals of the state to the forum provided for the determination of these questions, viz. the Industrial Accident Commission. So understood, the language imports no more than a declaration that, if a suitor shall seek redress in personam for such an injury before a state tribunal, he must go before the Accident Commission and the Accident Commission alone.

[10] The second branch of reasoning under which the Supreme Court of Washington concluded that its law was not designed, or, if designed, could not have any effect upon such maritime cases, was because the law provided a recovery different from that provided by the United States statutes. Revised Statutes of the United States, §§ 4283 and 4289 (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, §§ 8021, 8027), limits the liability of the owner of any vessel to damages or injuries which occur without his privity or knowledge to "the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel, and her freight then pending." But the federal statutes create no irreconcilable conflict with our own Compensation Act, since, giving them full force, it would result only that the Accident Commission would be in duty bound to limit its award so that it would not exceed the ascertained value of the interest of the owner, and our Workmen's Compensation Act will therefore be read as though the federal statutes were embodied in it.

We have not overlooked petitioner's argument based upon its construction of the decision of the United States Supreme Court in The Osceola, 189 U. S. 175, 23 Sup. Ct. 483, 47 L. Ed. 760, supported by the opinion of the District Court in the case of Schuede v. Zenith S. S. Co. (D. C.) 216 Fed. 566. But we find ourselves unable to accept the broad view which petitioner takes of the meaning of the Supreme Court opinion in the Osceola Case, and we are constrained to reach a conclusion different from that of the District Court in the Schuede Case. Our endeavor has been to make fast to the safe anchor buoys set out in its decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States. If we shall have mistaken these, and shall have made attachment to mere flotsam, then in truth we will have drifted with these litigants into chartless seas; but in this possibility we are consoled by the reflection that there is still at their call the safe pilotage of the Supreme Court of the United States to bring them to a secure haven.

The writ is discharged, and the award appealed from is affirmed.

NORTH PACIFIC S. S. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 7537.)

MASTER AND SERVANT ⚿361—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—RIGHT TO AWARD—"MARITIME OCCUPATION."

The occupation of a stevedore is in its essence maritime and subject to the same rules applicable to seamen.

In Bank. Application by the North Pacific Steamship Company for writ of review to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of Lewis Falvik. Writ discharged, and award affirmed.

H. W. Glensor, Courtney L. Moore, and Chas. H. Sooy, all of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Review to annul an award of respondents granted to one Lewis Falvik, employed as a stevedore in discharging cargo from the steamship Yucatan at San Pedro, Cal. This case differs from North Pacific Steamship Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission (S. F. No. 7398) 163 Pac. 199, this day decided, in no essential particular. In the latter case the injured man was a seaman. In the present case the occupation, that of a stevedore, was in its essence maritime. Atlantic Transport Co. v. Imbrovek, 234 U. S. 52, 34 Sup. Ct. 733, 58 L. Ed. 1208, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1157; The Canada (D. C.) 7 Fed. 119; Benedict, Admiralty (4th Ed.) par. 207.

Upon the authority of North Pacific Steamship Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission (S. F. 7398) the writ is discharged, and the award affirmed.

STEAMSHIP BOWDOIN CO. v. PILLSBURY et al., Industrial Accident Commission. (S. F. 7512.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 7, 1917. Rehearing Denied March 9, 1917.)

In Bank. Application by one Sievers for workmen's compensation, opposed by the Steamship Bowdoin Company. On certiorari by the employer to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of the servant. Award affirmed.

Ira A. Campbell and McCutchen, Olney & Willard, all of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco (F. R. Wall, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission allowing compensation to one Sievers. Sievers was a seaman on the steamer Bowdoin, which was owned by the petitioner for the writ. He received his injuries on said vessel while it was lying in the harbor of Eureka, in this state.

The contention of the petitioner is that the Industrial Accident Commission has no jurisdiction to award compensation for injuries to seamen upon navigable waters. The recent decisions of this court in the two cases entitled North Pacific Steamship Company v. Industrial Accident Commission (S. F. No. 7398 and S. F. No. 7537) 163 Pac. 199, 203, preclude the sustaining of this claim.

The award is affirmed.

ALASKA PACIFIC S. S. CO. v. PILLSBURY et al., State Industrial Acc. Commission (two cases). (S. F. 7507, 7527.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 7, 1917. Rehearing Denied March 9, 1917.)

In Bank. Two actions, each certiorari to review an award by A. J. Pillsbury and others, as the Industrial Accident Commission, brought by the Alaska Pacific Steamship Company. Award affirmed.

Ira A. Campbell and McCutchen, Olney & Willard, all of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco (F. R. Wall, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

PER CURIAM. In the above-entitled proceedings writs of certiorari were issued to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission allowing compensation to a stevedore injured while working on a vessel lying in navigable waters in this state. The only point made against the awards is that which was considered by this court in North Pacific Steamship Company v. Industrial Accident Commission, 163 Pac. 199, decided February 3, 1917, and on the authority of that case, the proceedings of the commission must be upheld.

RUDELL v. COLLINS. (L. A. 3874.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 5, 1917.)

1. TAXATION 🔑679(5) — TAX SALE — PURCHASE BY STATE—RESALE—NOTICE.

Under Pol. Code, § 3897, providing for sale of land conveyed to the state for nonpayment of taxes, the mailing of the notice of sale prescribed, where the post office address of the party to whom the land was last assessed is known, is a prerequisite to the authority of the tax collector to make the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1361, 1362.]

2. TAXATION 🔑679(5) — TAX SALE — PURCHASE BY STATE — RESALE — NOTICE—TIME FOR MAILING.

The mailing of the notice of sale of land conveyed to the state for nonpayment of taxes to the party to whom the land was last assessed, required by Pol. Code, § 3897, must be at or before the commencement of the period of three weeks before the sale during which the notice must be published or posted.

3. TAXATION 🔑760—TAX DEEDS—VALIDITY.

Under Pol. Code, § 3897, requiring the mailing of the notice of a sale of land conveyed to the state for nonpayment of taxes, where the post office address of the party to whom the land was last assessed is known, and section 3898, requiring the tax collector to execute a deed to the purchaser at such sale, reciting the facts necessary to authorize sale and conveyance, a tax deed, which did not recite either that notice was mailed or that it was not required to be mailed, was void.

4. TAXATION 🔑788(3)—TAX TITLE—PROOF.

In an action to quiet title, where plaintiff claims under a deed of land conveyed to the state for nonpayment of taxes, and produced no evidence of the validity of the sale, except that the tax collector did not know the address of the person to whom the property was last assessed, the deed, which was not made in conformity with the requirements of Pol. Code, § 3898, could not operate as prima facie evidence of compliance with the various conditions precedent to the sale.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; W. D. Thomas, Judge.

Action by Bertha Rudell against W. T. Collins. From a judgment for defendant, dismissing the action, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur A. Weber, of Santa Monica, for appellant. Allison & Dickson, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Action to quiet title. The plaintiff claims under a tax sale and deed. The court gave judgment dismissing the action, upon payment by the defendant to the plaintiff of the amount bid at the tax sale. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

On August 8, 1911, the property was conveyed to the state of California for nonpayment of taxes levied in the year 1905. A deed was made by the tax collector of San Bernardino county to plaintiff's predecessor on January 22, 1912. This instrument recited, among other things the due publication of a notice of sale to take place on the 22d day of January, 1912, and that the tax collector did, on the 12th day of January, 1912, "mail a copy of said notice, postage thereon prepaid and registered to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before such sale at his last known post-office address, Redlands, Cal."

[1, 2] Under section 3897 of the Political Code, the mailing of the notice, where the postoffice address of the party to whom the land was last assessed is known, is a prerequisite to the authority of the tax collector to make the sale. Smith v. Furlong, 160 Cal. 522, 117 Pac. 527; Campbell v. Moran, 161 Cal. 325, 119 Pac. 89; Smith v. Boston, 161 Cal. 341, 119 Pac. 91; Wright v. Anglo-Californian Bank, 161 Cal. 500, 119 Pac. 651; Krotzer v. Douglas, 163 Cal. 49, 124 Pac. 722; Prior to its amendment in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 559), the section did not, in terms, prescribe the time when such copy must be mailed. But we have held that, under a fair construction of the earlier provision, the mailing must take place at least three weeks before the sale; i. e., at or before the commencement of the period during which notice must be published or posted. Healton v. Morrison, 162 Cal. 668, 124 Pac. 240. The recital in the deed here is of a mailing only ten days before the sale. This was insufficient, if any mailing was required.

[3] The appellant contends, however, that the evidence introduced by her shows that the post office address of the person to whom the property was last assessed was not, either constructively or in fact, known to the tax collector, and that, therefore, no mailing was necessary. Section 3898 of the Political Code, as it read at the time of the deed to plaintiff's grantor, provided that the deed from the tax collector to the purchaser should recite "the fact necessary to authorize such sale and conveyance." The mailing of a copy of the notice was one of the facts necessary to authorize the sale (Smith v. Furlong, supra), unless such mailing were excused by the fact that the address was not known. It would seem, therefore, that the deed was required to recite either a mailing in compliance with the statute, or the existence of the fact which made such mailing unnecessary; i. e., that the address was not known to the tax collector. A deed which did not contain one or the other of these recitals was not the deed required by section 3898, and did not, accordingly, convey title to the purchaser. This view has been intimated by this court in several decisions. Buck v. Canty, 162 Cal. 226, 236, 121 Pac. 924; Canty v. Staley, 162 Cal. 379, 123 Pac. 252; Davis v. Peck, 165 Cal. 353, 355, 132 Pac. 438; Strauss v. Canty, 169 Cal. 101, 145 Pac. 1012. In none of these cases, however, was a determination of the point absolutely necessary. The extent of the actual decision was that, if the deed did not contain a recital showing either that notice had been mailed or that mailing was not required, the party claiming under the tax sale must, at least, produce evidence outside the deed to show that the required step had been taken, or that it was excused. In each instance, the purchaser had failed to meet this burden, and the judgment against him could be, and was, affirmed without a definite ruling on the validity of the deed itself. Now that the point is directly presented for decision, we feel compelled to hold that, under the statutes in force prior to 1913, a deed, which did not recite either that notice was mailed or that is was not required to be mailed, was void.

[4] The appellant makes the further point that the delivery of the deed was not necessary to complete the sale by the tax collector. Assuming the validity of the point (see Young v. Patterson, 9 Cal. App. 469, 99 Pac. 552), it cannot avail here. The plaintiff offered no evidence touching the validity of the sale, except to show that the tax collector did not know the address of the person to whom the property was last assessed. There was no effort to prove the various other conditions precedent to a sale. The plaintiff relied upon the effect of the deed itself as prima facie evidence that the preliminary steps recited in the deed had been taken. But it is only a deed made in conformity with the requirements of section 3898 which can operate as prima facie evidence, and this, as we have seen, was not such a deed. There was, therefore, no evidence that a valid or indeed any, sale had taken place.

In re ALDERSLEY'S ESTATE. (Sac. 2464.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 5, 1917. Rehearing Denied March 5, 1917.)

1. Trusts 🔑11(2) — Validity — Purposes — Remainder Over.

A provision in a trust deed for conveyance of the land by the trustees after the termination of the life estate, not being authorized by Civ. Code, § 857, enumerating the purposes for which express trusts could be created, was void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 9.]

2. Trusts 🔑52—Validity—Conveyance of Remainder Over.

If a trust deed provided that the remainder over after a life estate vest in the trustees in their individual capacity, a provision for conveyance, although not valid, would be regarded as merely an assurance of title.

3. Trusts 🔑132—Trust Deeds—Construction.

Where a deed, after employing words of absolute conveyance, clearly restricts the fee conveyed to the grantees to and for the purposes of the trusts, a provision for conveyance of the remainder over after a life estate, not being valid as a trust, cannot be construed as a direct grant to the persons indicated.

4. Trusts 🔑191(1)—Trust Deed—Power of Sale.

A power of sale in a trust deed, "whenever the trustees deem it advisable or if it becomes necessary," cannot be construed to restrict a sale for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of another paragraph, referring to the distribution of the principal, which was invalid.

5. Trusts 🔑276—Sale of Trust Property—Use of Consideration.

Where the terms of a trust deed authorized the trustees to use the "rents, issues and profits" of the land in the performance of their duties, upon a sale of the land under power of sale in the deed, the trustees must preserve the principle of the consideration received, but may utilize the interest on such consideration in lieu of such rents, etc.

6. Trusts 🔑325—Sale of Trust Property—Use of Consideration—Presumption.

Where a portion of the consideration of the sale of land held in trust was used for the maintenance of the owner of the equitable life estate and a portion of the reversion, unless the contrary be shown, it will be presumed that the money was paid solely from his share of the moneys held in trust.

7. Executors and Administrators 🔑510(9)—Presentment of Claims—Presumption.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that a deceased administratrix presented claims for payments made for medical attendance, costs of burial, and other funeral expenses paid by her before appointment, within the time limited in the notice to creditors, as provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 1493, and the ruling allowing such claims cannot be disturbed.

8. Executors and Administrators 🔑213—Claims—Proof.

It was error to allow claims against the estate of a decedent which the claimant offered no evidence to support and admitted were barred.

9. Executors and Administrators 🔑215—Allowance for Monument.

It is no objection to a charge against an estate for a monument for the deceased that it was also intended to serve as a monument for the grave of another.

10. Executors and Administrators 🔑485—Attorney's Fees—Calculation.

The attorney for an administratrix who did not fully administer upon the property is not entitled to full commissions, and his fees should be based upon the amount of the estate when the account is fully settled, and not on the amount accounted for.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of James Aldersley, deceased. From an order settling the first and final account of Ellen Williams, deceased administratrix of the estate, the contestants Elbert Aldersley, succeeding administrator of the estate, and others, appeal. Order reversed.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, and George F. Jones, of Oroville, for appellants. Carleton Gray, of Oroville, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal from an order settling the first and final account of Ellen Williams, as administratrix of the estate of James Aldersley, deceased. She died pending probate, and Elbert Aldersley succeeded her as administrator of the said estate, while her daughter, Julia A. McCloud, became her administratrix and legal representative. The case turns upon the validity of certain trust deeds, and the distribution to be made of the moneys received from the sale of the trust property.

John Aldersley was the father of four children, all of whom were living at the time of his death. In 1882 he conveyed a certain parcel of land, known as tract No. 1, to three of his children—Ellen Williams, Edwin and William K. Aldersley—in trust for the benefit and use of his son James, who is the decedent in this estate. On June 10, 1889, John Aldersley made a second conveyance of another parcel of land designated herein as tract No. 2 to the said grantees, also in trust for the benefit and use of said James. On December 4, 1891, John Aldersley died intestate, leaving his four children as heirs, his wife having predeceased him. Thereafter, on February 13, 1892, James Aldersley, who in 1884 had received a patent from the United States government to a certain homestead, designated herein as tract No. 3, conveyed the land to the same grantees on like terms of trust as the other deeds. Thus the two brothers and the sister held the three parcels of land, which were as a matter of fact contiguous tracts, aggregating 440 acres, all in trust for the benefit and use of their brother James. The three conveyances by which this result was accomplished were substantially identical in form, the provisions pertinent to the consideration of the questions raised by this appeal reading as follows:

> "* * * That said party of the first part, in consideration, * * * does grant, bargain, convey and confirm unto said parties of the second part or the survivors of them, their heirs and assigns forever: All that certain tract of land situate, lying and being * * * in the county of Butte, state of California. * * * To have and to hold the above granted premises together with the appurtenances and every part thereof unto said parties of the second part, their survivors and assigns forever in fee, upon trust, nevertheless, and to and for the uses, interests, and purposes hereinafter limited, described and declared, that is to say:
> "First: To receive the rents, issues and profits of said premises, and apply the same to and for the use, purpose, support and maintenance of said James Aldersley for and during the term of his natural life.
> "Second: After the death of James Aldersley to convey the said premises by deed to said parties of the second part or their survivors or survivor, living at the death of said James Aldersley, their heirs and assigns.
> "Third: In case the said parties of the second part deem it advisable, or if it becomes necessary to sell the said before described premises any time prior to the decease of said James Aldersley, said parties of the second part or the survivor, shall have full power and right to sell and convey said premises upon such terms and price as they may deem best and for the interest of their trust. * * *"

William K. Aldersley died on February 15, 1906, leaving four children, who are the contestants herein. Elbert Aldersley, already mentioned as the administrator of the estate of James Aldersley, is one of these children. Thereafter, in pursuance of the terms of the trusts, Ellen Williams and Edwin Aldersley took charge of the property. Julia A. McCloud testified as to this fact as follows:

> "James Aldersley was a cripple, and Ellen Williams and Edwin Aldersley were his sister and brother. They always cared for him and if he had any affairs, they attended to them. Ellen Williams and James Aldersley had lived upon this property all of my life, * * * and Edwin Aldersley was with them part of the time."

On June 26, 1909, the three tracts of land were conveyed to Julia A. McCloud in consideration of $1,400 in cash and her promissory note secured by mortgage for $1,750. It was stated in the deeds from the trustees that the transfer was made because it was deemed "advisable and necessary for all persons interested in said property to sell all of the said real property." The conveyances were effected in one transaction by four separate grant, bargain, and sale deeds, each naming Julia A. McCloud as the grantee in fee, to wit: A deed of tracts Nos. 1 and 2 by Edwin Aldersley and Ellen Williams, trustees; a deed of tract No. 3 by Edwin Aldersley and Ellen Williams, trustees; a deed of tracts Nos. 1, 2, and 3 by Edwin Aldersley and Ellen Williams individually; and a deed of tracts Nos. 1, 2, and 3 by James Aldersley, individually. After Julia A. McCloud took possession of the property, the trustees and James ceased to live thereon. James died intestate on April 25, 1913.

This brings us to the administration of the estate of James Aldersley resulting in the present appeal. Ellen Williams, as we have noted, was appointed the administratrix. On April 30, 1914, she filed her first and final account. Although on the face of the three deeds of trust it would appear that James' interest in the trust res had terminated, it is set forth in the account that he had died possessed of an estate worth $2,433, consisting of the sum of $1,009 cash in bank, and $1,400 balance unpaid on the note of Julia A. McCloud which was mentioned in the last paragraph, and $24 interest thereon. In the evidence it appears that this sum is the balance remaining on hand from the $3,150 received from the sale of the three tracts. It is stated in the account that the administratrix had paid out in cash in satisfaction of the various claims against the estate the entire sum of $2,433. Several of these claims were contested, as we shall presently note in greater detail. But on May 17, 1914, before the account was settled, Ellen Williams died.

As already stated, Elbert Aldersley, one of the contestants, was then appointed administrator of James Aldersley's estate, and Julia A. McCloud became administratrix of her mother's estate. The latter was also substituted in her mother's place as her legal representative in order that the account could be determined. Before the exceptions to the account could be heard, Julia A. McCloud filed a second account, alleging:

> "That in truth and in fact said James Aldersley at the time of his death had no property whatsoever of any kind or nature, and that the property set forth in the papers of said estate as being the property of said James Aldersley, deceased, was, in truth and fact, the property of said Ellen Williams, and Edwin Aldersley, who owned the same in equal shares, and said James Aldersley, deceased, never had any right, title or interest in or to the same or any part thereof."

New exceptions were filed by the contestants, but the court approved the account, and in its order settling it declared that the said sum of $2,433, "with which said Ellen Williams, while administratrix of said estate, credited said estate, was not a part of said estate, and was a sole property of herself and of Edwin Aldersley, and that said estate had no interest whatever therein, and the sum was so credited by her to said estate by mistake." The appeal is taken principally from this order.

[1] 1. It is contended by the contestants that: "The deeds of trust and the conveyances under them are void because they are a trust to convey forbidden by the rule in the Fair estate" (citing Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 523, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70; Id., 136 Cal. 79, 68 Pac. 306). They concede, however, "that the trust to receive the rents, issues and profits of said premises and apply the same to and for the use, purpose, support and maintenance of said James Aldersley for and during the term of his natural life" is valid. Sacramento Bank v. Montgomery, 146 Cal. 745, 81 Pac. 138. That the second paragraph, requiring a conveyance by the trustees, cannot be supported under the rule established by the Fair decision is clear. At the time the deeds were executed, and indeed until the amendment to section 857 of the Civil Code, which went into force August 10, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 438), it was the law of this state that a trust to convey was void. It is true that the apparent intention of the trustors was to vest the remainder over after the life of James Aldersley in the sister and brothers who should survive him.

[2] Had such a provision been expressly made in the deeds, upon the termination of the equitable life estate of James, the entire equitable estate, as well as the legal title, would be vested in the trustees, and a conveyance as contemplated by the second paragraph would have been unnecessary. In such a case the provision for a conveyance, if still included, would be regarded as "nothing more than an assurance of title." Hofsas v. Cummings, 141 Cal. 525, 75 Pac. 110. But no words were employed which evidence an independent conveyance of the equitable estate in remainder over to the trustees in their individual capacity. Until the death of James the estate which they held was merely adequate for the purpose of executing the valid provisions of the trusts. Morffew v. S. F., etc., R. R. Co., 107 Cal. 587, 40 Pac. 810. At no instant of time did the trustees possess the equitable estate, and at no instant of time was it possible for a merger to take place.

[3] But the respondent urges that the surviving children are entitled to the entire trust property for other reasons; that, in fact, "the deeds create no trust whatever, except in favor of James Aldersley," and "can only be construed as a direct grant to the three children, or the survivor of them." But the deeds, after employing words of absolute conveyance, clearly restrict the fee conveyed to the grantees to and for the purposes of the trusts. The actual title conveyed was therefore commensurate for this purpose and no more. Accepting the respondent's contention, and the estate granted to the trustees would be strictly that of an unlimited joint tenancy "unto said parties * * * or the survivors of them, their heirs and assigns forever." (Italics ours.) But that this was not the intention of the respective trustors is clearly manifested by the terms of the second paragraph. By that paragraph it was obviously intended to provide a method of terminating the joint tenancy upon the death of James and vesting the property in fee in the children of John Aldersley then living. That is to say, it was intended by the trustors that James should possess the beneficial interest until his death, and that the children surviving him should take the legal title freed from the trusts only when it was duly conveyed to them by virtue of the authority attempted to be created under the second paragraph. The language employed expresses just that intention. But such a scheme was forbidden by law. It must therefore fail. Upon James' death the trusts created by the deeds terminated, and the property descends in fee to the heirs of the respective trustors. Civ. Code, § 866.

[4] This presents the question whether the attempted sale of the three tracts to Julia A. McCloud passed any interest which James at the time possessed in the property, and, if so, the proportion of the consideration received therefrom which properly belongs to his estate. It is conceded that the trustees had no power of sale other than the power granted under the provisions of the third paragraph. But it is insisted that that provision is void principally because it is inseparable from the provision of the second paragraph. We find no merit in the contention. The deeds expressly provide that such a sale should be made whenever the trustees "deem it advisable, or if it becomes necessary." To hold as contended that the third paragraph only authorizes a sale for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of the second paragraph, referring to the distribution of the principal, is to give the language used a strained construction which is neither required by the context of the instruments, nor in harmony with the obvious intention of the trustors. But even if the provision be merely regarded as a power of sale, the validity of the sale cannot be questioned. Moreover, as has been stated, James, for a valuable consideration, personally gave his deed to Julia A. McCloud, purporting to convey the title of the three tracts to her. This in itself is sufficient to remove all doubt that the title which James possessed in the tracts has passed to the grantee, and we are here concerned with no other interest. This interest of James consisted, in part, of an equitable life estate in tract No. 3 and the reversion therein after satisfaction of the trust. The deeds passed the entire title to this tract. In addition, he possessed an equitable life estate in tracts Nos. 1 and 2, and, as John Aldersley had died intestate leaving the four children as his heirs, was entitled to a one-fourth interest in the reversion thereof. This, too, was conveyed to Julia A. McCloud. In consideration of the property conveyed to her, as we have pointed out, a sum aggregating $3,150 was paid. No evidence, however, was heard by the probate court as to the exact amount of the consideration received by the two trustees which represents the interest possessed by James in the three tracts. This fact must be determined in order to ascertain what amount should now be credited to his estate.

[5, 6] There is another question to be considered: Under the terms of the trusts, the trustees had authority to use the "rents, issues and profits" of the tracts of land in the performance of their duties. Contention is made that this power does not include the right to utilize in lieu thereof the interest on the consideration received from the sale of the premises. But a fair construction of the instruments leaves no doubt that the words must be construed in that sense. It does not follow, however, that the trustees had any right to use any part of the principal for the purposes of the trusts. It was their duty to preserve the principal until they had returned it to the trustors or their estates after the terms of the trusts had been fully performed. Notwithstanding this, Edwin Aldersley, testifying at the hearing of the account, stated that part of the consideration was expended in caring for James during the ensuing four years; "used it up for his living expenses, doctor bills and other things." It was stated that the amount thus expended amounted to $717. Whether this expenditure was made with the consent of James from his share of the property, or was merely paid out of the amount received from the sale of the entire property without regard to his consent, are matters which have not been shown, but which will be required to be established before the amount of the property to be accounted for in this estate can be definitely determined. It may be remarked, however, that unless the contrary be shown, and since James received the benefit of the said expenditure, the presumption would be that the money was paid solely from his share of the moneys held in trust.

2. We see no force to the objection made to the filing of the account herein by Julia A. McCloud after Ellen Williams had died. Code Civ. Proc. § 1639. The court granted her authority to file it as the legal representative of Ellen Williams, and sufficient facts are set forth in the account to support the order.

[7, 8] Objection was also made to the allowance by the court of the claim for medical attendance during the last illness, costs of burial, and other funeral expenses. In support of these claims Edwin Aldersley testified that they were paid, and various vouchers which had been filed with the first and final account by Ellen Williams were introduced in evidence. It is urged that none of the claims was presented against the estate during the time allowed by law. Code Civ. Proc. § 1493. But the contestants introduced no evidence in support of their contention. For instance, no affirmative evidence was offered to the effect that Ellen Williams, assuming that she had paid the various claims before she was appointed administratrix, as it is claimed, had not afterwards in due time presented her claim against the estate. In the absence of a showing to the contrary we cannot disturb the ruling of the court in allowing the claims. The presumption is that the rulings were proper.

[9] Two other claims were presented by Edwin Aldersley and Ellen Williams for services rendered in nursing and caring for James for the two years prior to his death. The contestants served and filed exceptions to these claims, alleging that they were barred at the time of presentation, that they were excessive in amount, and that any services rendered by the trustees were in fact gratuitous. Although the respondent admitted that the claims were barred and offered no proof in support of them, they were allowed by the court. This is clearly error. Such claims should not be allowed.

[10] It is no objection to the charge for the monument for James Aldersley that it was also intended to serve as a monument for the grave of John Aldersley. No other objection was made to the claim except the general objection that it was likewise barred.

The attorney for Ellen Williams was allowed fees on the full amount accounted for by her in the first and so-called final account. He did not fully administer upon the property, and was therefore not entitled to full commissions. Estate of Piercy, 168 Cal. 750, 145 Pac. 88. Moreover, his fees should be based upon the amount of the estate when the account is finally settled.

No other points require mention.

CLAREMONT COUNTRY CLUB et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA. (S. F. 7759.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑361—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—"EMPLOYÉ" — STATUTES—"CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT"—"SERVANT."

Under Civ. Code, § 1965, defining a contract of employment to be a contract by which one who is called the employer engages another who is called the employé to do something for the benefit of the employer or of a third person, despite section 2009, providing that a servant is one employed to render personal service to his employer and who remains entirely under the control and direction of the latter, a caddy was the employé within the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279), of the country club whose members utilized his services in playing golf, though he was paid by the players he served through the club's caddy master, since the employment and discharge of the caddy during all of the time he was not actually in the service of a member was wholly under the control of the club, the determinative fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé; Servant.]

2. Master and Servant 🔑361—Workmen's Compensation Act—Employé.

The fact that the caddy reported for duty and was employed only on specific days did not militate at all against the proposition that he was an employé.

3. Master and Servant 🔑405(6) — Workmen's Compensation Act — Amount of Award to Minor.

In an injured golf caddy's proceedings against the employing country club for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, where the evidence showed that the basis of the award was within the earning capacity of good caddies, the award would not be set aside on complaint that its amount was not justified by the evidence, in that it was based on the earning capacity of a first-class caddy, and there was no assurance that the injured caddy would become such, and there was no assurance that when he attained his majority he would pursue the vocation of a caddy, and that if he did pursue the vocation he would follow it every day instead of only on Saturdays and Sundays, as he was doing when injured; the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 288) § 17, providing that if the injured employé is a minor, and his incapacity is permanent, his average weekly earnings shall be deemed, within the limits fixed, to be the weekly sum that under ordinary circumstances he would probably be able to earn after attaining the age of 21, in the occupation in which he was employed when injured, if he had not been injured.

In Bank. Proceedings by Raymond Harris, for compensation for personal injuries under the Workmen's Compensation Act, against the Claremont Country Club, employer, and the Ætna Life Insurance Company, insurer. There was an award by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the employer and insurer petition for writ of review to annul such award. Award affirmed.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Review to annul an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. On March 7, 1915, Raymond Harris, a boy 14 years of age, while caddying for a member of the Claremont Country Club, leaned against the handrail of a bridge spanning a small creek on the golf course of the club. The rail gave way, and the boy fell backward into the creek, suffering a permanent injury to one of his elbows. He filed his claim for compensation with the Industrial Accident Commission. The Claremont Country Club and its insurer, the Ætna Life Insurance Company, answered, denying only the fact of employment. The commission, after hearing, awarded the applicant $1,170 in addition to his outlay for medical attendance.

[1] The principal contention of petitioners is that the boy was not an employé of the country club within the meaning of the provisions of the Code and the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279). The undisputed facts are that the club owns and maintains a golf links for the pleasure of such of its members as desire to indulge in the game. The general control over this sport is vested in appropriate committees selected from the club members. Many golfers have desired and do desire the services of attendants to carry their golf bags, to aid in the search for the ball, and to perform other like familiar services. For these members the club provides caddies, and over them is a paid employé known as the caddy master. The club also maintains a caddy house, which is the station of the caddies until their services are requisitioned. The caddies are graded into three classes, based upon their records and abilities in the service, the best belonging to class A, the next best to class B, and the beginners and least efficient to class C. A class caddies are paid 60 cents, B class caddies 50 cents, and C class caddies 40 cents a game. A player requisitioning a caddy may not designate the boy whose services he desires. His request is made to the caddy master, who, under a system, summons the caddy whose turn it is to serve. The caddy is supplied with a card, whereon at the conclusion of the game the member makes his report to the caddy master, with remarks touching the service and qualifications of the boy, and from time to time the caddy master regrades his caddies in accordance with these reports. At the close of the game the player hands to the caddy master, with his report, the amount earned by his caddy, and this amount is immediately delivered by the caddy master to the boy. Thus each player pays the caddy, and the indirect method of payment through the caddy master is apparently designed for the twofold purpose of convenience in making change and as a check on "tips" or donations by the members to the caddy in excess of the actual amount earned. The boys are taken on by the club through the caddy master or Greens Committee, and the caddy master or Greens Committee is empowered to discharge a caddy, or, in other words, to forbid him to frequent the golf links and seek and secure employment. Upon the other hand, while actually caddying the control of the activities of the boy are wholly with the member using him, and the club, as a club, has of course no means of knowing what particular orders or directions a member may give to his caddy, nor what unusual or dangerous duties he may call upon him to perform. For these reasons petitioners argue that the caddies are not employés of the club, and that "all that the club does is to afford boys who wish to serve as caddies an opportunity for employment by the members of the club who play golf." For this position petitioners believe they find full support in section 2009 of the Civil Code, in Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469, 68 Am. Dec. 345, in Fay v. German General Ben. Soc., 163 Cal. 118, 124 Pac. 844, and Brown v. Smith, 86 Ga. 274, 12 S. E. 411, 22 Am. St. Rep. 456. Touching section 2009 of the Civil Code, petitioners insist that the status of the caddy is that of a servant, as he is employed to render personal service, and that if it be conceded that he would be a servant of the club, while rendering personal service at the direction of the club, the relationship ceases entirely when he is actually engaged in caddying for a member, since by virtue of that engagement he no longer is "entirely under the control and direction" of the Claremont Country Club, but is entirely under the control and direction of the member, who thus becomes "his master." But such refinement of reasoning makes no stronger appeal to us than it has to other courts. Section 1965 of the same Code has a bearing upon the matter, and that defines a contract of employment (under which of course the relationship of employer and employé necessarily arises) to be "a contract by which one, who is called the employer, engages another, who is called the employé, to do something for the benefit of the employer, or of a third person." The reasoning, we say, makes no strong appeal to us, because the language of section 2009 was never intended to mean, for example, that a housemaid, directed to give personal attention and service to a guest within the house, ceased for that reason to be an employé or servant of the householder. No more do waiters in restaurants and cafés who, while attending to the requirements of the patrons and in contract bound to comply with all the reasonable requests of those patrons, cease to be employés of the owners of the particular establishment. Nor indeed is the method of compensation determinative. Taking the single case of waiters, it is a well-known fact that in some establishments they receive no wage from their employers, and are dependent entirely upon the "tips" which they receive from the persons they serve, and it is equally a well-known fact that in some instances this system is carried to such an extent that the waiters themselves pay the employers to obtain the employment. So here it is not of consequence that the member should pay to the caddy directly the amount he has earned, or pay it indirectly through the medium of the caddy master. The employment and discharge of the caddy during all of the time when he is not actually in the service of a member is wholly under the control of the country club, and this is the determinative fact in the matter. In certain of its features the case, then, is not dissimilar to Gaines v. Bard, 57 Ark. 615, 22 S. W. 570, 38 Am. St. Rep. 266, where it is held that a bathroom attendant, selected and subject to be discharged by the owner, and performing service for him in keeping the bathrooms and the adjacent halls clean, is his servant, notwithstanding the fact that he paid such attendant no compensation, and the only compensation which he received was the donations from the patrons under whose control he was while performing service for them. The foregoing, we think, will certainly show the inappositeness of such authorities as Brown v. Smith, 86 Ga. 274, 12 S. E. 411, 22 Am. St. Rep. 456, where the holding is merely that where a master has hired his servant to another, giving the other the complete and absolute control and direction of the servant, with the exclusive right to discharge him, the original master is not liable for his negligence. Wherefore upon this point our own cases, above cited, dealing with the general features of the relationship of employer and employé and master and servant do not call for review, for these caddies are employed by the club, are controlled by the club, and the service which they render simply happens from its nature to be directed to contribute to the convenience and pleasure of the individual members of the club.

[2] The fact that the injured boy reported for duty and was employed only on specific days does not militate at all against the proposition that he was an employé. Dewhurst v. Mather, 2 K. B. 754.

[3] The final complaint of petitioners is that the amount of the award is not justified by the evidence. Elements of uncertainty in this evidence are pointed out by the petitioners, as that it was based upon the earning capacity of a first-class caddy, and there was no assurance that the injured boy would become a "class A" caddy; also that there was no assurance that when he attained his majority he would pursue the vocation of a caddy; and as little assurance that if he did pursue the vocation that he would follow it every day instead of only on Saturdays and Sundays as he was then doing. These statements are unquestionably true, but nevertheless the law itself takes knowledge of them and defines the duties of the Industrial Accident Commission under the indicated circumstances. The evidence did show that the basis of the award was within the earning capacity of good caddies. The act itself (section 17, c. 176, Stats. 1913) provides as follows:

> "If the injured employé is a minor, and his incapacity, whether total or partial, is permanent, his average weekly earnings shall be deemed, within the limits fixed, to be the weekly sum, that under ordinary circumstances, he would probably be able to earn after obtaining the age of twenty-one years, in the occupation in which he was employed at the time of the injury, if he had not been injured."

And it is held, supporting such a law, that it is proper to take into consideration the increased wage which a minor may be fairly expected to earn. Kilberg v. Vitch, 171 App. Div. 89, 156 N. Y. Supp. 971.

The award is therefore affirmed.

CASS v. ROCHESTER. (L. A. 3829.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 5, 1917.)

1. PLEADING 🔑345(1)—MOTIONS—JUDGMENT ON THE PLEADINGS.

Judgment on the pleadings cannot be given in favor of plaintiff, where the answer puts in issue a material allegation of the complaint or sets up affirmative matter constituting a defense.

2. FACTORS 🔑1—RELATIONSHIP OF PARTIES —"CONSIGNMENT"—"FACTOR."

Where an automobile was received by defendant under contract whereby he was to hold it on consignment and when sold to forward a sum of money to the seller, he was, under Civ. Code, § 2026, a factor, and by section 3053 had a lien on the property; the word "consignment" importing an agency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Factors, Cent. Dig. § 1.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Consignment; Factor.]

3. FACTORS 🔑1—CONSIGNMENT—TIME OF SALE.

A sale from consignor to consignee does not in any event take place until the consignee sells the goods, and, if he merely retains the goods and claims a lien for repairs made, he is not chargeable as a purchaser.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Factors, Cent. Dig. § 1.]

4. PLEADING 🔑122—ANSWER—SUFFICIENCY OF DENIALS—INFORMATION AND BELIEF.

Where it was not a matter presumably within defendant's knowledge whether plaintiff was the assignee of the defendant's consignor, defendant's denial of the assignment on information or belief is sufficient to raise the issue.

5. PLEADING 🔑345(2)—JUDGMENT ON THE PLEADINGS—INCONSISTENT DEFENSES.

A defendant has the right to plead inconsistent defenses, and if one of them denies material allegations of the complaint, judgment cannot be rendered on the pleadings, even though the matter thus denied may be admitted in another defense.

6. PLEADING 🔑127(1)—ADMISSIONS—EFFECT.

In an action by the assignee of the consignor of an automobile for its return and for damages, where defendant on information and belief denied the assignment, a clause in his answer, "that the plaintiff's assignors are indebted to the defendant" in a sum certain, cannot be construed into an admission that the assignment was in fact made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 264–268.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Phil Cass against Richmond Rochester. From a judgment for plaintiff on motion for judgment on the pleadings, defendant appeals. Reversed.

John C. Stick, Phelps, Greer, Winston & Wharton, and Paul E. Greer, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Cass & Shelton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. On plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings the court below entered judgment in his favor for $1,500. The defendant appeals.

The complaint was in two counts. The first alleged that on or about October 1, 1912, the defendant received from the Metallurgique Motor Company a certain automobile, "under the terms of a certain contract between said defendant and said Metallurgique Motor Company whereby the said defendant agreed to hold the said property on consignment, and, when the said automobile was sold, to forward to the said Metallurgique Motor Company the sum of $1,500." It is further alleged that on April 22, 1913, defendant notified said Metallurgique Motor Company that he would not carry out the terms of the said contract. Thereafter, it is averred, the said Metallurgique Motor Company sold and transferred said automobile to plaintiff. The defendant unlawfully withholds said property from the plaintiff, to his damage in the sum of $500, and the value of said property is $2,000. The second count, after restating many of the foregoing matters, alleges that, while the automobile was under the control of the defendant, it was damaged, through the defendant's neglect, in various particulars, to plaintiff's loss in the sum of $1,382.50. The prayer of the complaint was, on the first count, for the return of the automobile or its value, together with the sum of $500 damages for its unlawful detention, and, on the second count, for $1,382.50, the amount of damage done to the automobile while it was in defendant's possession.

The answer admits the receipt of the automobile under the contract set forth in the complaint. It admits that defendant had refused to carry out the contract, unless the Metallurgique Motor Company would repair the automobile, which said company had refused to do. The assignment to plaintiff is denied for want of knowledge or information. The defendant further denies that he unlawfully withholds the property from plaintiff to plaintiff's damage in any sum; he alleges that he is in possession of the automobile, and refuses to deliver the same to the plaintiff, for the reason that plaintiff's assignors are indebted to him in the sum of $204, "as in the counterclaim hereinbelow set out"; that defendant has demanded this sum of plaintiff, and offered to deliver the automobile to him upon his paying said sum, but plaintiff has refused to pay the same. In answer to the second cause of action, defendant denies the allegations of damage to the automobile. There is a further and separate defense based upon the representations of the motor company that the automobile was in good condition; whereas, the defendant alleges it was, in fact, in bad order. In the same defense it is alleged that the Metallurgique Motor Company refused, on defendant's demand, to put the car in good order, and that thereupon defendant demanded that said motor company pay him the sum of $149, which he had paid for freight on said car, and the further sum of $5 per month for storage. In addition, the answer contains a counterclaim for the sum of $204, being the sums advanced on the car by defendant, to wit, $149 for freight and $55 for eleven months' storage at the rate of $5 per month.

[1] Judgment on the pleadings cannot be given in favor of the plaintiff, where the answer puts in issue a material allegation of the complaint, or sets up affirmative matter constituting a defense. Derby v. Jackman, 89 Cal. 1, 26 Pac. 610. Concededly, the answer denied essential averments of the second cause of action. The judgment was, in fact, based upon the first count alone, and the question is whether the answer contained any denials or averments which precluded judgment on this count without a trial.

[2] The plaintiff's allegations and his prayer for relief show very plainly that the complaint was based upon the theory that the automobile was the property of plaintiff, it having been put into the possession of the defendant as the agent, for purposes of sale, of plaintiff's assignor. If this was the correct view, the defendant's position was that of a factor (Civ. Code, § 2026), and he therefore had a lien on the property for all proper outlays made by him in connection with the agency (Civ. Code, § 3053). The right was asserted in the answer. Granting that, upon the agent's refusal or failure to sell, the principal might terminate the relation and reclaim the property, the agent was still entitled to reimbursement for his advances, and to retain the property as security. All of this is virtually conceded by respondent. But, in complete abandonment of the theory on which the case was brought, it is now argued—and this is said to have been the basis for the ruling of the trial court—that the transaction between the Metallurgique Motor Company and the defendant constituted a sale of the automobile to the defendant for the sum of $1,500. This interpretation of the dealings between the parties cannot be sustained. The averment of the complaint is that the automobile was received by the defendant under a contract whereby the defendant was to hold the property on consignment, and, when the automobile was sold, to forward to the motor company the sum of $1,500. There is thus alleged, not a contract of sale, but one which made the defendant the agent of the plaintiff's assignor to sell the automobile.

"The word 'consignment' does not imply a sale. The very term imports an agency, and that the title is in the consignor." Harris v. Coe, 71 Conn. 157, 41 Atl. 552; Rolker v. Great Western Ins. Co., 4 Abb. Dec. (N. Y.) 76; Sturm v. Boker, 150 U. S. 312, 326, 14 Sup. Ct. 99, 37 L. Ed. 1093; Powell v. Wallace, 44 Kan. 656, 659, 25 Pac. 42; Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) 7.

Irrespective of the use of the word "consignment," the pleading does not show that the transaction was a sale, or anything other than an entrusting of the property to the defendant as agent for the purposes of sale. The plaintiff relies upon the circumstance that defendant was to remit a fixed sum, irrespective of the amount for which he might sell the property. This, it has often been held, is not inconsistent with the relation of principal and factor.

[3] "We do not think," said the court in Harris v. Coe, supra, "that the absence of a limitation upon the price at which goods may be sold by a consignee who is to account to his consignee at a fixed price, will transform an agreement made in good faith and clearly intended by both parties to be one of agency, into a contract of sale." See, also, McCullough v. Porter, 4 Watts & S. (Pa.) 177, 39 Am. Dec. 68; Soria v. Davidson, 53 N. Y. Super. Ct. 470; Walker v. Butterick, 105 Mass. 237; Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) 7. There are decisions holding that the terms of the agreement may be such "as to make the consignee, when the goods are sold, the purchaser and principal debtor for the goods." Benjamin on Sales, supra; Ex parte White, L. R. 6, Ch. App. 397, affirmed on appeal 21 Wkly. Rep. 465; N. E. Mfg. Co. v. J. C. Wagner Co., 108 Wis. 584, 84 N. W. 894; Nutter v. Wheeler, Fed. Cas. No. 10,384, 2 Lowell, 346. But, as indicated in the passage just quoted, even these cases concur in the view that a sale from consignor to consignee does not, in any event, take place until the latter has sold the goods. In the meanwhile, the goods are the property of the consignor, and the consignee is his agent. In the present case, no sale was made by the defendant, and he could not therefore, under any permissible interpretation of the contract, be charged as purchaser of the automobile.

[4, 5] There is still a further ground of objection to the granting of judgment on the pleadings. Defendant denied the transfer and assignment of the automobile by the motor company to the plaintiff. An assignment by the motor company of its interest in the automobile was not a matter that was presumably within the knowledge of the defendant. A denial for want of information or belief was therefore sufficient to raise an issue. Jensen v. Dorr, 159 Cal. 742, 747, 116 Pac. 553. The fact that in the counterclaim the defendant may have made admissions inconsistent with this denial does not impair its effect. A defendant has the right to plead inconsistent defenses, and, if one of them denies material allegations of the complaint, judgment cannot be rendered on the pleadings, even though the matter thus denied may be admitted in another defense. Nudd v. Thompson, 34 Cal. 39; Botto v. Vandament, 67 Cal. 332, 7 Pac. 753.

[6] It is claimed by the respondent that the denial of the assignment is overcome by an admission contained in the same defense. But the supposed admission consists merely of an allegation that defendant refused to deliver the automobile for the reason "that the assignors of the plaintiff are indebted to this defendant in the sum of $204." This reference to "assignors of the plaintiff" cannot be construed into an admission that an assignment had, in fact, been made, or that defendant had such knowledge on the subject as to preclude a denial for want of information. The fair construction of the pleading is that, while the defendant puts the plaintiff to proof of the alleged assignment, he asserts, at the same time, his right to hold the automobile until he is paid the amount due him from the motor company, to whose title the plaintiff claims to have succeeded.

The judgment is reversed.

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA POWER CO., Consolidated, v. WALLER et al.

(Sac. 2269.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑837(1)—Review of Findings.

The Supreme Court will look to findings and conclusions alone of the trial court to determine whether the judgment is supported, and to the evidence, as to whether findings are supported; but the judge's opinion may be used to explain doubtful points.

2. Trial 🔑404(1) — Findings — Construction.

The opinion and findings of the trial court construed, and held to show that the court disregarded the real point in issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 957.]

3. Appeal and Error 🔑854(2)—Erroneous Reasons for Correct Judgment.

If the evidence in controversy over water rights actually supported the apportionment of water decreed by the court, its reasoning, if erroneous, will be disregarded.

4. Evidence 🔑536 — Expert Testimony — Ditches.

The testimony of persons not possessing engineering skill or knowledge of hydraulics, as to capacity of and amount of water carried by ditches, being mere guesses, was inadmissible as expert testimony; the matter being susceptible of exact measurement.

5. Evidence 🔑470 — Expert Testimony — General Rule.

It is the general rule that, whenever possible, data to establish given conditions must be introduced in evidence, and, if scientific knowledge is necessary, this may be given by the opinion of experts; but, where not possible, opinions of ordinary witnesses are admissible as being the best evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2220.]

6. Evidence 🔑574 — Opinion Evidence — Conflict with Other Evidence.

Where defendant's evidence as to capacity of and amount of water carried by ditches was manifestly inferior to that of plaintiff regarding actual physical conditions, Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, declaring presumption of law that "higher evidence would be adverse from inferior evidence being produced," will apply.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence. Cent. Dig. § 2400.]

7. Waters and Water Courses 🔑152(8)—Action to Protect Water Rights—Finding.

In a controversy over water rights, the court's finding as to allowance and division of water to certain ditches held not supported by the evidence.

8. Costs 🔑32(3)—Persons Entitled to.

Where plaintiff in a controversy over water rights recovered judgment against defendant, although not for full amount claimed, it was entitled to costs under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, providing for allowance of costs as of course.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; W. D. Tillotson, Judge.

Action by the Northern California Power Company, Consolidated, against John Waller and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for appellant. McCoy & Gans, of Red Bluff, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought its action against John Waller and A. P. Waller, charging them with the partial destruction of a dam maintained to impound the waters of North Battle creek in Shasta county, and with threats of the continuance of like trespasses. John Waller filed a cross-complaint, asserting rights in himself and others in the waters of this creek, which rights were declared to be superior to those of the plaintiff. The rights of these cotenants, it was asserted, arose out of a prior appropriation by a ditch known as the Loggerhead Ditch. These cotenants were brought into the action as defendants. While in its form, therefore, this is an action for an injunction against trespass, in its essence it is a controversy over rights to the water of North Battle creek. Dissatisfied with the judgment of the court in its division of these waters, plaintiff has appealed. Its principal contentions are that the vital findings are not supported by the evidence.

In 1886, the first appropriation of the waters of this creek was made by the defendants and their predecessors in interest through the Battle Creek Bottom Ditch Company's ditch. This ditch is commonly known as and will here be called the "Loggerhead Ditch." The recorded notice declared for an appropriation of 600 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure. In 1895, the defendants filed a notice of appropriation by the same ditch of 2,000 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure. In 1890 and 1891, another ditch taking water out of the creek was constructed. It was known as the Vilas or the Farlow Ditch, and will here be called the "Vilas Ditch." Appellant contends that by the ownership of Vilas Ditch, which it has acquired, it is entitled to divert 625 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure, in subordination to the prior right of the Loggerhead Ditch to 600 inches. The uses of the water under both of these appropriations were originally the ordinary agricultural uses—domestic, watering of stock, and irrigation.

Appellant is a public service corporation engaged in the generation and distribution of electricity for light, heat, and power. It develops this electricity by water, and maintains canals, ditches, power houses, etc., for this purpose. In 1907, it commenced the construction of the "North Battle Creek Ditch to South Power House," a ditch commonly called and which here will be called the "Cross Country Ditch." Under one of its engineers, H. A. Tedford, the locations of water rights were made, and the ditch and its dam constructed. They were completed in 1909, and shortly thereafter the appellant purchased the Vilas Ditch and water rights. The capacity of this Cross Country Ditch is 4,500 miner's inches. The court decreed the right to appellant to divert all the waters of the creek to the full capacity of its Cross Country Ditch, in subordination, however, to the prior rights of the owners of the Loggerhead Ditch.

It is over these prior rights that the controversy arises. The court's first award was to the Loggerhead Ditch and to its owners of 600 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure. Next there was decreed to plaintiff (by virtue of its ownership of the Vilas Ditch) 120 inches of water under a 4-inch pressure, after which it was decreed that an apportionment should be made of the remaining waters at the dam of the Cross Country Ditch, by which apportionment one-sixth of the flow of the stream could be retained by appellant, while five-sixths must be permitted to pass on to the Loggerhead Ditch until it was filled to its capacity. This capacity was found to be 1,854 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure. The findings further declared against the allegations of the complaint concerning the injury and threatened injury by respondents to appellant's dam. And, finally, the judgment, after setting forth the parties' rights and priorities by the fixed quantities, viz. 600 inches to the Loggerhead Ditch and then the next 120 inches to the Vilas Ditch, adjudicated that the defendants "have the right to take and divert the said five-sixths of said remainder of water in and through the said Loggerhead Ditch and use the same for irrigation on their lands during the irrigating season of each year or when the same shall be needed or required by them for irrigation."

Appellant contends that the court failed to find upon material issues, and that the findings which it made are indefinite, inconsistent, and contradictory and do not support the judgment. Further, that the judgment itself is void for indefiniteness. Other contentions are advanced, but these are the principal ones which demand consideration.

So far as concerns the water rights, the issues may be briefly outlined. The defendants contended for an absolute priority to the first 2,000 inches of the stream measured under a 4-inch pressure, and to all of its flow if the quantity was less than this. Plaintiff conceded a priority to defendants of 600 inches and no more, asserted a second right to the next 625 inches by virtue of the Vilas Ditch and the Vilas water rights, and finally contended for a right in itself of all the remaining flow of the stream subject to these two priorities by virtue of its own appropriation.

The findings and conclusion of the court have already been sufficiently indicated. By them the first right accorded to defendants was a right to but 600 inches measured under 4-inch pressure. Over this right no controversy arises. Plaintiff accepts it and defendants are not appealing. The allowance of but 120 inches to the Vilas Ditch presents the first matter in controversy, and to its understanding a knowledge of the following facts is necessary: Originally the notice of appropriation by the Loggerhead Ditch called for 600 inches—the amount awarded by the court. This ditch, it appears, was cleaned and repaired in the years that followed its construction, and by this work its actual capacity was increased until, as has been said, in 1895, the defendants filed a notice of increased appropriation by the same ditch up to 2,000 inches. Whatever may have been the original flow of the Vilas Ditch, it is not contended that its original carrying capacity was ever increased. Appellant does not assert that it was. Respondents in their evidence deny that it was ever enlarged. One of the witnesses sums up this matter in the following language:

> "Well, when the two ditches was first dug, the best I can recollect it there wasn't but very little difference in the size of them; but the Loggerhead people, as we call them, cleaned their ditch and kept it up and it got better every year; but the other ditch was very poorly looked after, and it didn't get no better."

There was a time in the history of the Vilas Ditch when the point of diversion was changed and the flume at the original intake abandoned, but this was merely a change in the place of diversion and not in the quantity of water taken.

In deciding the case, the learned trial judge filed his opinion, which in the brief of appellant is presented in extenso for our consideration, and on that opinion appellant bases its argument that the court adopted, to its great prejudice, an unwarranted and unexpected position in weighing the evidence and deciding the case. Respondents make answer that the views of the court are in no wise determinative, that the judgment rests upon the findings and conclusions of law, and that, the findings being supported and the conclusions of law sound, a consideration of the opinion is both irrelevant and improper.

[1-3] Respondents are correct in saying that this court must and will look to the findings and conclusions alone to determine whether or not the judgment is supported, and will consider the evidence alone to determine whether the findings are supported. Nevertheless, the opinion of the trial judge can with propriety here be used, and is often used, to elucidate doubtful points and as an aid in determining what the trial court may have conceived to have been the vital issues. Churchill v. Flournoy, 127 Cal. 355, 59 Pac. 791; Liver v. Mills, 155 Cal. 459, 101 Pac. 299, dissenting opinion of Beatty, C. J. In its opinion the trial court declared that the evidence as to the use of the water carried by both ditches was "vague, conflicting, and unsatisfactory," and concluded that the most feasible plan for it to adopt was "to divide the water among the respective claimants as nearly as may be in proportion to the acreage irrigated on the various ranches described in the pleadings." Then, repeating that the evidence as to the acreage irrigated on the respective ranches was "somewhat vague, conflicting, and unsatisfactory," the opinion declared that it appeared "that the acreage irrigated from the Loggerhead Ditch during the time that the Vilas Ditch was in use was approximately five times as great as the acreage irrigated from the Vilas Ditch," and as an award concluded that the Loggerhead Ditch was entitled to the first 600 inches, that the Vilas Ditch was entitled to the next 120 inches, and that the remaining flow should be divided in proportion of five-sixths to one-sixth. These conclusions, it will be noted, are precisely those which are embodied in the findings and judgment. There is justice, therefore, in appellant's complaint that the court disregarded the vital point of controversy hotly litigated between the parties; that point of controversy being the actual amounts of water which their ditches in fact carried. It was substantially conceded upon each side, such is appellant's contention, that whatever water was in fact carried was put to a beneficial use. But to this, as we have intimated, respondents make answer that the evidence does in fact support the apportionment of the water actually made, and, this being the situation, the reasoning of the court in the opinion, even if held to be erroneous, must be disregarded. The soundness of this position we have already declared.

This summarization of the opinion of the court shows the need, however, for a more careful scrutiny of the evidence relied upon by respondents, since it is quite manifest from his opinion that the trial judge did not accord to it the full weight for which respondents contend; in this regard the opinion declaring as follows:

> "There is some testimony by witnesses who were familiar with the ditches described in the pleadings during their early history as to the comparative quantity of water carried or conveyed in them. Some of such witnesses estimated that the Loggerhead Ditch carried twice as much water as the Vilas Ditch; some thought that the former ditch carried ten times as much as the latter; but the greater number of such witnesses estimated the quantity of water in the Loggerhead Ditch as being from four to five times as much as in the Vilas ditch. While this class of testimony is not very satisfactory or conclusive, it tends to corroborate the testimony of defendants as to the comparative acreage irrigated."

What, then, upon this matter does the evidence disclose? It discloses: First, that there was a gradual increase in the capacity of the Loggerhead Ditch and with that increase of capacity doubtless an increase in the flow. Nevertheless, the amount of this priority is fixed by the court at 600 inches, which amount is the full amount covered by the original notice of appropriation under which the Loggerhead Ditch was constructed. Touching the capacity and diversion of the Vilas Ditch, and remembering that that capacity and diversion it is conceded was never increased, the direct and positive testimony offered by appellant was, first, as to the dimensions of the ditch with its flumes and the gradient of the flow. This evidence showed a capacity of the 625 inches contended for. Second, there was given the direct evidence of Vilas and his successors that during the irrigating season the ditch ran full, "all it would carry." And, third, it was shown that the old water marks still stood upon the original flume at the intake (which original flume was abandoned when the point of diversion was changed) and established that the quantity of water which the ditch was receiving was that claimed by plaintiff.

Against this direct and positive evidence, there was presented on behalf of respondents evidence, principally their own, going in some instances to the carrying capacities of the two ditches, and in other instances to a comparison of the amount of water which they were actually carrying. To the admission of this evidence appellant strongly objected. But dealing here and now only with its weight, and not with its admissibility, it amounted to this: That the witnesses were of varying opinions and placed the capacity of the Loggerhead Ditch at from two times to ten times that of the Vilas Ditch. Evidence of like character was offered by some of these witnesses as to the amounts of water carried. Thus witness Crooker:

> "Well, I should say as to the comparative amounts of water in the two ditches that the Loggerhead Ditch would carry at least five or six times more than the Vilas Ditch was carrying."

Witness Lakey:

> "Well, there might have been four times as much water in the Loggerhead Ditch as there was in the Vilas Ditch. There might have been more and might have been less."

Defendant Patterson:

> "Well, I would say from four or five times up to eight or ten times more water in the Loggerhead Ditch than there would be in the Vilas Ditch on an average."

Defendant Loomis:

> "About one-tenth, the Vilas Ditch carried about one-tenth as much water as the Loggerhead Ditch."

It is to be noted that this evidence was directed to the observations of the witnesses during a number of years, and was carried down until the year 1909, when trouble arose between these litigants. Still further it is to be noted that, while the capacity of the Vilas Ditch remained stationary, that of the Loggerhead Ditch was increased by gradual development work. And, finally, it is not to be forgotten that, whatever that increase, the prior right of the Loggerhead Ditch over the Vilas Ditch, was fixed by the court at 600 inches (Weil, Water Rights, § 474), and by that determination all of the parties, as well as this court, are here bound—the appellant because it is not complaining of it, the respondent because it has not appealed from it, and this court because for those reasons it is an accepted admeasurement and adjudication.

But what is complained of, and it is a complaint which the appellant is entitled to make, is that its water right for the Vilas Ditch was by the finding of the court unjustifiably reduced.

[4] Here it becomes necessary to say a word concerning the admissibility of this evidence thus permitted to be introduced. Admittedly none of these witnesses possessed any engineering capacity or any scientific knowledge of hydraulics. Their estimates, therefore, of the carrying capacity of the two ditches, as well as their estimates of the amounts of water actually carried, were but mere guesses, and the unreliability of the evidence itself is demonstrated upon the face of it when it is remembered that these guesses varied in declaring the superior capacity of the Loggerhead Ditch to be from two to ten times that of the Vilas Ditch. Manifestly this testimony was not admissible as giving the opinion of experts. Goldstein v. Black, 50 Cal. 463; State v. Maioni, 78 N. J. Law, 339, 74 Atl. 526, 20 Ann. Cas. 204.

[5] The general rule upon all such subjects of inquiry is that where possible the data to establish a given condition or fact must be laid before the court, and, if scientific knowledge be necessary to formulate these data into a statement of the ultimate fact to be arrived at, this, if it require a special training or skill, may be done by the opinion of experts. Sappenfield v. Main St. Ry. Co., 91 Cal. 48, 27 Pac. 590; Parkin v. Grayson-Owen Co., 157 Cal. 41, 106 Pac. 210; McLeod v. Miller & Lux (Nev.) 153 Pac. 566; Wigmore, Evidence, § 1918. A necessary modification of this rule is that when these data—these probative facts to establish the ultimate fact—may not thus be presented to the court, the opinions of ordinary witnesses become admissible as being the best evidence available. In illustration, if a controversy had arisen between these parties over their ditches and water rights and both ditches before trial had actually been destroyed, leaving no superior data touching size, capacity, and amounts of water, unquestionably the evidence of these witnesses would be admissible as being the best evidence available to establish the fact in controversy. Or, again, where from the nature of the inquiry it is impossible for any witness adequately to present to the court all of the facts, as in cases of identity of appearance, of manner, of size, of color, of weight, and at times of quantity, the opinions of witnesses based upon the impressions that they have received from their observations become admissible. Wharton, § 513, note; Lawson, Expert and Opinion Ev. p. 3; Rogers on Testimony, 1013. But in the present case it is apparent from what has already been said that incontrovertible evidence was available to both sides to establish the carrying capacity of the Vilas Ditch. It and its flumes were there upon the ground. Its gradient was susceptible of exact measurement. Therefore what that ditch could carry could be shown to a demonstration. What in fact it did carry was established without controversy by the testimony offered by plaintiff, to the effect that when the water was needed the ditch ran full. When such data can be laid before a court it is universally held to be error to admit mere inexpert opinion. Conner v. Stanley, 67 Cal. 315, 7 Pac. 723; Railroad Co. v. Yarborough, 56 Ark. 612, 20 S. W. 515; Indianapolis Tr. & T. Co. v. Kidd, 167 Ind. 402, 79 N. E. 347, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 143, 10 Ann. Cas. 942; Commonwealth v. Sturtivant, 117 Mass. 122, 19 Am. Rep. 401; Road v. Leonhardt, 66 Md. 70, 5 Atl. 346; Mann v. State, 23 Fla. 610, 3 So. 207; Hurt v. Railroad Co., 94 Mo. 255, 7 S. W. 1, 4 Am. St. Rep. 374; Railroad Co. v. Fox (Tex.) 6 S. W. 569; Baltimore & O. R. R. (N. S.) 1113; Keefe v. Armour & Co., 258 Ill. 28, 101 N. E. 252, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 188; In re Coburn, 11 Cal. App. 604, 105 Pac. 924.

[6] Frey v. Lowden, 70 Cal. 550, 11 Pac. 838, upon which respondents rely as supporting the ruling of the court admitting this evidence, involved a controversy over the capacity of a ditch. The declaration of this court was that the evidence of witnesses testifying "upon the subject from knowledge acquired by them in 30 years' experience in mining and in measuring and selling water to miners" was admissible. No criticism can be made of this declaration, taken in connection with what we have already said, because, while the opinion speaks of such evidence as being "nonexpert," it certainly approaches quite closely to the evidence of witnesses possessing a special skill and knowledge. But that opinion takes no account of the next proposition to which we address ourselves, and that is that the opinion evidence in this case, when admitted, is manifestly evidence of inferior character and value to the evidence introduced by plaintiff touching the actual physical facts and conditions. And in such a case there comes into necessary application the declared presumption of our law (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 6) that "higher evidence would be adverse from inferior evidence being produced." Respondents, it will be noted, did not seek to controvert the evidence of the capacity of the Vilas Ditch presented by plaintiff, by showing an inaccuracy in its measurements, but contented themselves by offering inferior evidence on the question. And finally upon this subject-matter it may be pointed out that there is no necessary conflict in the evidence. It has been said that the capacity of the Loggerhead Ditch seems to have been steadily increased from the date of its first construction until nine or ten years thereafter, when its owners posted their notice of a new appropriation to the extent of 2,000 inches measured under 4-inch pressure, to be carried by that ditch, and after that until 1905 when the enlargement was completed. Also, it has been pointed out that the capacity of the Vilas Ditch was not increased. The testimony of the witnesses for the defendants ranges through all these years. If we assume (herein, of course, not passing upon the weight of the evidence) that the capacity of the Loggerhead Ditch was thus increased until it was finally capable of carrying 2,000 inches, then in truth it would have nearly four times the capacity of the Vilas Ditch, and to this extent the estimates of respondents' witnesses would be supported, while allowing to the Vilas Ditch the 600 or 625 inches claimed for it. The fundamental difficulty, however, arises from the fact that the court, compelled to fix the first appropriation of the Loggerhead Ditch at 600 inches, adopted the method of cutting down proportionately the rights of the Vilas Ditch and by this method allowed it only 120 inches. The method which the court employed plainly grew out of its conclusion that it would adopt acreage as a basis for its water measurement. But in fact and in law, after awarding to the Loggerhead Ditch the first 600 inches, the water right of the Vilas Ditch was to be determined by reference solely to its own capacity and to the amount of water which, within that capacity, it actually carried (for we repeat that so far as this appeal is concerned the question of beneficial use is not in controversy).

[7] It follows herefrom that the finding allowing the Vilas Ditch but 120 inches is unsupported.

Nor yet can we find any support for the court's adjudication which, after the award of 600 inches to the Loggerhead Ditch and 120 inches to the Vilas Ditch, divides the remainder of the flow in the proportion of five-sixths to the former and one-sixth to the latter. The quantum of water to which the Vilas Ditch is entitled is an absolute quantum after the first priority of 600 inches to the Loggerhead Ditch has been satisfied. It is not subject to increase or decrease beyond that. Nor yet, upon the other hand, is the Loggerhead Ditch entitled to five-sixths of the flow after the quantum of water to which the Vilas Ditch is entitled has been received by it. The Loggerhead Ditch is and can be entitled only to such additional quantum of water over the first 600 inches as it may have legally appropriated either under its second notice of appropriation or by adverse user, and that it is a quantum susceptible of exact ascertainment which therefore should be fixed by the court. After the determination of these amounts, then, as we understand the case, it is not in controversy but that plaintiff by its Cross Country Ditch is entitled to all of the remainder of the water in the stream.

[8] The controversy over the water rights of these parties was substantial. The right which defendants asserted was a priority to 2,000 inches of the water of the stream—practically all of it during certain seasons of the year. While plaintiff's action was in form for injunction, as has been pointed out, the case resolved itself into a trial and determination of these respective water rights. Plaintiff, though not receiving all that it sought, was given a recovery against the claims and contentions of the respondents. It was entitled to its costs. Code Civ. Proc. § 1022; Hoyt v. Hart, 149 Cal. 723, 87 Pac. 569; Stimson Canal & Irr. Co. v. Lemoore Canal & Irr. Co., 160 Pac. 845; Mally v. Weidensteiner, 88 Wash. 398, 153 Pac. 342;

Cuthbert Burrell Co. v. People's Ditch Co. (App.) 160 Pac. 845.

Appellant complains that respondents, under permission to answer an amendment to the complaint, which presented no new matter, improperly availed themselves of this permission to introduce into their answers a new plea of the statute of limitations, and that the court, upon motion, refused to strike out this new plea; and, finally, that after having refused to strike it out the court failed to find upon it. In contemplation of the new trial which must be ordered, these matters cease to be of consequence, and the court will permit such amended pleadings or amendments to the pleadings as may be meet in equity.

The other matters urged upon our attention by appellant do not require detailed consideration, as it is unlikely that they will arise in or at the second trial of this case. Thus, as it has been held that appellant is entitled to its costs in the trial court, and as it is not within the probabilities that there will be another trespass and destruction of appellant's dam, and as the vital controversy is over the apportionment of the water, and, finally, as the judgment is here reversed, it is unnecessary to consider whether or not appellant was entitled to an injunction against the offending defendant Waller, who alone, it appears, tore out a part of appellant's dam. Touching the uncertainty of the judgment, the trial court will, of course, make its judgment as specific within the warrant of the evidence as may be possible.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Sara A. Nicholson against Cecil Nicholson to annul a marriage. Judgment for defendant, and from a denial of an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

L. B. Slosson, John C. Miles, Geo. L. Keefer, and Ben W. Utter, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

SLOSS, J. In this action, brought to annul a marriage, the defendant defaulted. After hearing the testimony adduced by the plaintiff, the court concluded that a case had not been made out, and entered judgment denying the relief sought. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and she now appeals from the order denying such motion.

The complaint alleged as ground for annulment:

"That the consent of the plaintiff to marry the defendant was obtained by force, in this, that while the plaintiff was under the influence of narcotics administered at the solicitation and request of the defendant, the defendant threatened to criminally expose a friend of the plaintiff's and thus induced the plaintiff to consent to said marriage; that immediately thereafter, and while the plaintiff was still in a dazed and obfuscated state of mind, the defendant took the plaintiff into a law office where the marriage ceremony was performed; that the plaintiff's mind was so dazed that she did not realize what was being done or that she was really marrying the defendant."

The trial court made findings of fact to the effect that the consent of the plaintiff to marry defendant was not obtained by force in any way; that plaintiff was not under the influence of narcotics; that she was not in a dazed or obfuscated state of mind when she was married; that her mind was not so dazed that she did not realize what was being done, or that she was really marrying the defendant, but she did know that she was marrying him, and she did marry him. The findings state further that the defendant did threaten to expose a friend of plaintiff's, to wit, one Edwards, who was a fugitive from justice after conviction of crime. The defendant, according to the findings, told the plaintiff that unless she married him he would cause said Edwards to be brought back for further proceedings, "but the plaintiff knew exactly what she was doing when she married the defendant, and the principal thing that caused her to worry was the fact that two days before she was married she was put out of her room at the Victoria Hotel for nonpayment of her bill for two months, and the defendant paid her bill; he then continued to try to persuade her to marry him, and she consented."

[1] Granting that the findings, in so far as they go beyond the issues tendered by the complaint, could not, on an appeal from the judgment, be looked to as affording support for such judgment, they do, nevertheless, serve to illustrate the impression produced by the testimony on the mind of the learned trial judge, and thus to aid in determining whether the plaintiff can maintain her contention that the evidence was such as to require the granting of the relief demanded by her.

[2, 3] Without detailing the evidence, we may say that it fully warranted the court in finding that the plaintiff was not under the influence of narcotics; that she was not, at the time of the marriage, in a "dazed and obfuscated" state of mind; that her mind was not so dazed that she did not realize what she was doing, or that she was marrying the defendant. The court found, in accordance with plaintiff's testimony, that the defendant had made threats to expose Edwards, who was a fugitive from justice. The plaintiff also testified that the defendant threatened, unless she consented to marry him, to involve her as an accomplice of Edwards. But the fact that such threats were made was not enough in itself to require the granting of the relief demanded. It still remained for the trial judge to determine, on the whole case, whether these threats were the inducing cause of plaintiff's consent to the marriage, and, if they were, whether the plaintiff's free exercise of will was thereby overcome to such an extent as to render her consent apparent rather than real. Section 82 of the Civil Code provides that a marriage may be annulled for various causes, including the obtaining of consent to the marriage through fraud or force. Duress and menace, which under the Code provisions dealing with contracts generally are named as causes for avoiding consent (Civil Code, §§ 1567, 1569, 1570), are not eo nomine specified as grounds of annulment. Plaintiff here alleged that her consent had been obtained through force. This averment was certainly not sustained, unless it can be said a threat to make criminal charges constitutes force. But, conceding that menace may be shown as ground for annulling a marriage, it still remains that the consent is deemed to have been obtained through this cause "only when it would not have been given had such cause not existed." Civil Code, § 1568. The evidence as a whole tended to show that plaintiff was so situated that any of various motives and influences may have led her to consent to the marriage. One of these, namely, her financial embarrassment, is suggested in the finding above quoted. We cannot say that the conclusion reached by the court in this regard did not embody a fair and reasonable view of the evidence. This being so, the findings against the plaintiff's necessary allegations cannot be made the subject of successful attack in this court.

[4, 5] It was not error for the court to omit to find on the averment that the parties had not cohabited as husband and wife since the marriage. Passing the point that findings are not required in a default case, the want of cohabitation would be important only if plaintiff had established that her consent was voidable because of the means by which it had been obtained. Civil Code, § 82, subds. 4 and 5.

During the examination of the plaintiff as a witness, the court put certain questions to her. We find no impropriety in these interrogations, nor any invasion of plaintiff's rights.

[6] Finally, it is urged that the court erred in refusing to allow plaintiff's counsel to argue the case. It appears, however, that the court did permit the presentation of the authorities upon which plaintiff relied. Ordinarily, a party to an action has the right to be heard by counsel. But the extent to which argument shall go, especially in civil cases tried without a jury, is largely in the discretion of the court.

[7] In the present case, where the issue was a simple one of fact, and only one of the parties was in court, no substantial prejudice was suffered, nor was a "miscarriage of justice" occasioned, by the refusal of the court to listen to a discussion of the effect of the evidence. Const. art. 6, § 4½. It is perfectly apparent from the record that an indulgence of counsel's desire to argue the case would have been fruitless.

"Even if the inferior court erred in refusing to let the attorney speak, yet, if the cause has been decided correctly, we will not reverse it merely to give an opportunity to make a speech." Harrison v. Park, 24 Ky. (1 J. J. Marsh.) 170, 174.

A tenant in common, while ordinarily sustaining a quasi confidential relation toward his cotenants, with reference to the common property, so that his action in dealing therewith, to the benefit of the property, will inure to the benefit of all, is not prevented from selling his interest in the property without consulting his cotenant and for any price obtainable, and therefore an agreement by purchaser to pay one cotenant more for his interest than was paid to the other is not void, even if not known to the other cotenant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by H. M. Goldberg against Bernard Getz. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leon Samuels, of San Francisco, for appellant. Goodfellow, Eells & Orrick, and Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order denying the defendant a new trial after judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action instituted for the recovery of the sum of $1,500, the amount of a check drawn by the defendant on the Crocker National Bank in favor of the plaintiff's assignor, and upon which payment was stopped.

The facts of the case upon which the findings and judgment of the trial court rest are practically undisputed, and in substance are these: Plaintiff's assignor, Jacob Goldberg, was a tenant in common of the Keil Estate Company, a corporation, of certain real property consisting of 20 lots situate in the city and county of San Francisco, each owning an undivided one-half interest therein. On August 1, 1908, and during the absence of Goldberg in Europe, the Keil Estate Company signed a contract with one Lucas, who represented the defendant, Getz, whereby it agreed to sell the lots for the sum of $20,000. The name "Goldberg Estate Company" was also signed to this agreement by E. A. Keil, the president of the Keil Estate Company, but it was an admitted fact in the case that there was no Goldberg Estate Company in existence, and that Keil had no authority to act for or bind Goldberg in the transaction in suit or in any manner. There was, however, in force at this time another instrument executed by Goldberg and the Keil Estate Company, authorizing Baldwin & Howell, real estate brokers, to sell the same property. Upon Goldberg's return from Europe, which was shortly after the Keil Estate Company had executed the contract of sale first above mentioned, Lucas, the agent of the defendant, Getz, endeavored to persuade Goldberg to sell his one-half interest at the same price at which the Keil Estate Company had agreed to sell, viz. $10,000. Goldberg declined, and he so informed the Keil Estate Company. Later, however, and prior to October 8, 1908, Getz and Goldberg agreed to a sale of the latter's interest in the property at an advance of $1,500 upon the price agreed to be taken by the Keil Estate Company for its interest; and thereupon Getz executed and delivered to Goldberg a memorandum, prepared and presented by the former's attorney, reading as follows:

"Upon actual consummation of sale of real property and delivery to me of deed according to terms of an agreement this day made by Keil Estate Co. and Jacob Goldberg, I promise to pay to Jacob Goldberg the sum of $1,500. Dated October 8, 1908.

"[Signed] B. Getz."

Immediately thereafter and as a result thereof there was drafted and inscribed with pen and ink on the reverse side of the contract of sale previously executed on August 1, 1908, an agreement dated October 8, 1908, signed by both the Keil Estate Company and Goldberg, whereby they, as owners of the property, agreed to sell the same to Getz for the sum of $20,250, $250 of which was to be applied in payment of any claim for a commission which Baldwin & Howell might make for alleged services. The Keil Estate Company was not aware of the secret separate agreement to pay Goldberg the additional $1,500 until so informed by Goldberg on the following day after the close of the transaction. Although fully informed of Goldberg's positive refusal to accept $10,000 for his interest in the property, neither the Keil Estate Company nor any one on its behalf made any inquiry of Goldberg at or prior to the consummation of the sale concerning the price which he was to receive for his interest. Pursuant to the contract of sale ultimately made a deed conveying the property to Getz was executed and delivered to him, and thereupon he drew and delivered to the Keil Estate Company, through the medium of a title insurance company through which the transaction was closed, a draft upon the Mercantile Trust Company in the sum of $9,873, and at the same time drew and delivered to Goldberg in the same manner a similar draft in a like amount. Getz and Goldberg then went to the Crocker National Bank, where the check in suit, dated October 13, 1908, and the agreement of October 8, 1908 (wherein Getz promised to pay the sum of $1,500 to Goldberg), were delivered to an officer of the bank, with instructions that the check was to be surrendered to Goldberg when the deed to the property was recorded. Immediately following the recordation of the deed Getz stopped payment of the check.

It will be noted that no claim was made in the lower court, and none is made here, that the execution of the contract in question by the Keil Estate Company was induced by any misrepresentations of Goldberg made to all or any one of the parties to the transaction. With these facts as a basis it was the contention of the defendant in the trial court that the secret separate contract was conceived and consummated in fraud, and that, the consideration for the contract being therefore void, the check in suit, which rests upon the contract, was without a valid consideration to support it, and consequently that public policy will intervene and forbid the aid of the courts to enforce its payment.

In support of this defense it is argued here that tenants in common by operation of law occupy a confidential relationship with reference to the common property, and that Goldberg, as the tenant in common of the Keil Estate Company, violated the obligations of that relationship by failing to reveal the existence of his contract with Getz, and thereby perpetrated a fraudulent concealment upon his cotenant which resulted in detriment and disadvantage to the latter.

The defense thus interposed to the action cannot be sustained upon the theory that Goldberg, as the cotenant of the Keil Estate Company, was obliged to disclose the price which he, without the knowledge or assistance of his cotenant, received for his interest in the common property. Ordinarily cotenants, by virtue of their unity of interest, sustain towards each other a quasi confidential relation with reference to the common property, and therefore the act of one cotenant when dealing with the common property, if beneficial, will inure to the benefit of the other, and neither will be permitted to deal with the property to the detriment of the other. This relation of mutual trust and confidence, however, does not extend to and will not in and of itself operate to impair the right of one cotenant to dispose of his interest without consulting his cotenant at any time and for the best price obtainable, that is to say, in the absence of contractual relations, express or implied, existing in conjunction with the relation of cotenancy, there is nothing in the obligation of mutual trust and confidence which accompanies the latter relation which prevents one cotenant, acting independently in his own behalf, from demanding and receiving for a sale of his interest a greater sum than that paid to the other. Garr v. Boswell (Ky.) 38 S. W. 513; Harris v. Lloyd, 11 Mont. 390, 28 Pac. 736, 28 Am. St. Rep. 475; O'Neal v. Cooper, 191 Ala. 182, 67 South. 689; note to Goldthwaite v. Janney, 48 Am. St. Rep. 62; Bradley v. Harkness, 26 Cal. 69.

Of course, if either party acting for himself and his cotenant had entered into negotiations with Getz for the sale of the common property, his act in fixing a price for the entire property would be for the benefit of both, and therefore, aside from any obligation arising out of the relationship of cotenancy, good conscience, and fair dealing, would preclude either from secretly securing for his interest a greater price than that paid for the interest of his cotenant. No such situation, however, as we have seen, is presented here; and therefore no duty devolved upon Goldberg to reveal to the Keil Estate Company the price he was receiving. In the absence of such a duty his conduct did not amount to a fraudulent concealment.

It follows from what has been said that the evidence supports the finding of the trial court that the check in suit was given for a valid and lawful consideration.

The order denying the defendant a new trial is affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

Ex parte CHAMBERS. (Cr. 384.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 3, 1917.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑228—Preliminary Examination—Time.

While the statute does not prescribe the time within which the preliminary examination must be begun after information is filed before the committing magistrate, its letter and spirit is opposed to a delay of nearly five months.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 477.]

2. Habeas Corpus 🔑30(2)—Grounds of Relief—Defective Indictment.

An application for a writ of habeas corpus involves the question of jurisdiction, and one held in custody under a bench warrant issued on an indictment which is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to try the offense is not entitled to the writ, though the indictment is verbally defective so as to be subject to demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. § 25.]

3. Indictment and Information 🔑159(3)—Amendment of Indictment—Statute.

Under Pen. Code, § 1008, providing that an indictment may be amended by the district attorney where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant, but cannot be amended so as to change the offense charged, a district attorney can amend an indictment charging perjury which alleged that defendant falsely testified that a note was made January 15th or 22d, by adding allegations that it was material to know when the note was made, and that in fact it was made February 5th.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 513.]

Application by Margaret Chambers for a writ of habeas corpus. Application denied, and petitioner remanded.

Ben Berry and D. P. Eicke, both of Stockton, for petitioner. E. P. Foltz, Dist. Atty., and C. P. Rendon, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Stockton, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. In the return to this application for a writ of habeas corpus appear three warrants of arrest in proper form which it is claimed by the sheriff of San Joaquin county justify his detention of petitioner. The first two were issued by a justice of the peace, based upon verified complaints charging two separate offenses of perjury, and the third is a bench warrant upon an indictment, also for perjury, found by the grand jury of said county.

As to the warrants issued by the said justice, the contention of petitioner is as follows:

"No preliminary examination has been held upon either charge, neither does it appear that the officers whose duty it is to conduct such preliminary examination intend to hold a preliminary examination upon either charge, as 4 months and 20 days have elapsed since petitioner was deprived of her liberty upon said charges, during which time she has repeatedly requested that preliminary examination be held, all of which requests have been ignored. While such process was at first lawful, she has certainly become entitled to a discharge by reason of the failure of the officers to follow the plain mandate of the law in the premises. Pen. Code, § 1487, subd. 2; Const. art. 1, § 13; Pen. Code, §§ 859, 860, and 861."

As to the other process we have this contention:

On October 24, 1916, petitioner was indicted for perjury. Upon arraignment, November 20, 1916, a demurrer was interposed, one point being that, while the indictment charged the making of certain false statements, there was no sufficient averment of what the real facts were. The demurrer was sustained, and the court made an order granting the district attorney leave to amend by November 21, 1916, at 10 o'clock a. m. "This was not an order or the equivalent of an order that the case be resubmitted to another grand jury. Ex parte Williams, 116 Cal. 512, 48 Pac. 499; Ex parte Hayter, 16 Cal. App. 211, 116 Pac. 370. But whether it may be considered the equivalent of an order or not, it was not submitted to another grand jury, and the demurrer having been sustained, the prosecution was at an end (Pen. Code, § 1000; Ex parte Williams and Ex parte Hayter, supra), unless the amendment authorized by the court was one provided by statute. In pursuance of the order, the district attorney filed what purported to be an amended indictment on November 21, 1916, which indictment was not found or presented by a grand jury, but prepared, presented, and filed by the district attorney, and which indictment differed very materially in substance from the indictment to which a demurrer had been sustained."

The said difference, it is claimed, arises from the allegation in the amended indictment that a certain note was written and delivered on February 5, 1916, and that it was material to know the date of its execution and delivery.

[1] We deem it unnecessary to decide whether said warrants issued by the justice of the peace became inoperative and void by reason of the failure and refusal to bring on the preliminary examination. We may remark, however, as to this, that while the statute does not prescribe the number of days after the information is laid before the committing magistrate within which the preliminary examination must be begun, yet both in letter and spirit it is opposed to such unreasonable delay as occurred herein. It has often been said, and it will probably be advisable many times to repeat it, that a person charged with crime has certain rights guaranteed by the Constitution and statutes that even a district attorney is bound to respect. No one should be detained in prison indefinitely or capriciously in order that a case may be developed in the future or circumstances arise that will justify a trial and probably afford sufficient ground for conviction. The interests of society do not demand and the rights of the individual forbid such invasion of personal liberty.

[2] But, passing the foregoing consideration, we may say that we find no ground for affirming the invalidity of the said bench warrant. The scope of the writ of habeas corpus is familiar, and we need not describe it further than to state that the application for the writ involves, of course, in one form or another, the question of jurisdiction.

Herein we think it must be held that there is no lack of legal authority as to any of the proceedings or process by virtue of which petitioner's detention is sought to be justified. The warrant itself is regular and within the provisions of the statute. Indeed, its sufficiency is not assailed or questioned. It is not denied that the indictment constituting the basis for said warrant was found as the law requires. Said indictment undoubtedly stated a public offense of which the superior court had jurisdiction. Without any doubt, the crime of perjury is therein set forth. We deem is unnecessary to set forth its averments; as it is not seriously claimed that any essential element of said crime was omitted. The objections raised to said indictment relate rather to the phraseology than to any substantial defect, and they do not present any question of jurisdiction.

[3] So far there is nothing to indicate any illegality in petitioner's incarceration. A demurrer was interposed to said indictment, both general and special. It was sustained, the court holding that there was not a sufficient averment of "what the true facts are." It also appears that the court made a further order granting the district attorney leave to file an amended indictment by November 21, 1916, at 10 o'clock a. m. This proceeding was and is warranted also by the statute. Section 1008 of the Penal Code provides that:

> "An indictment or information may be amended by the district attorney without leave of court, at any time before the defendant pleads. Such amendment may be made at any time thereafter, in the discretion of the court where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant. An indictment can not be amended so as to change the offense charged," etc.

The district attorney did file an amended indictment almost identically the same as the original, but adding, as we have seen, the averment that it was material to know whether the note set out in the indictment was written on January 15th or January 22d, and the further averment that it was written February 5th. But the offense was not changed. The amendment constituted, at most, an additional specification of the perjured testimony, and could not have prejudiced the substantial rights of the accused. In fact, the amendments simply made the indictment more certain in the respect indicated. In the original it does at least inferentially appear that it was material to know whether said note was written on January 15th or 22d, and there can be no objection to the addition that it was written on February 5th, since it appears by proper averment that she falsely testified that it was written on January 15th or 22d, and the effect of the amendment is simply to fix the actual date more definitely. The case falls, indeed, within the rule announced in People v. Anthony, 20 Cal. App. 586, 129 Pac. 968, to the effect that under said section 1008 the district attorney has no power to amend an indictment or information in matters of substance, but only as to matters of form. In that case, it may be observed, it was held that "an amendment to an indictment * * * by merely changing the date in a specified month as to the commission of the offense could not be prejudicial to the defendant," and was permitted by said statute.

There is certainly as much reason for holding that the district attorney here did not exceed the limitations imposed by said section of the law. It may be said also that several cases from other jurisdictions approving much more serious amendments are cited by respondent, but it is not deemed advisable to refer to them specifically. But if we concede that the district attorney has added more than the law allows, it does not follow that petitioner is entitled to her discharge. It would be simply a case of error, and not of an entire want of jurisdiction, to be corrected in the court below or reviewed on appeal.

We may repeat: The jurisdiction for the arrest and detention of petitioner, having existed by virtue of a valid indictment, was not lost or affected by reason of an amended indictment charging the same offense, though in somewhat amplified form. The warrant was therefore continued in force as a legal process and justifies the sheriff in holding said petitioner. Ex parte Williams, supra, and Ex parte Hayter, supra, the two cases principally relied upon by the applicant, arose when said section 1008 made no such provision for an amendment to the indictment or information. This was added by the statute of 1911 and approved March 22d of that year. Prior to said amendment, the section read:

> "If the demurrer is allowed, the judgment is final upon the indictment or information demurred to, and is a bar to another prosecution * * * unless the court, being of the opinion that the objection on which the demurrer is allowed may be avoided in a new indictment or information, directs the case to be submitted to the same or another grand jury, or directs a new information to be filed."

In each of said cases a demurrer was sustained, and no such order was made by the trial court, and it was therefore held by the higher tribunal that under the express provisions of the statute the prosecution was at an end, and therefore the defendant was entitled to be discharged.

In the Williams Case the demurrer was sustained in 1897 and in the Hayter Case on January 28, 1911. It is apparent, therefore, that these cases are not controlling here.

There seems to be no warrant for holding that the writ should issue, and the application is denied, and the petitioner remanded.

HARTFORD ACCIDENT & INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 2080.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Jan. 4, 1917.)

MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑405(4)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—RIGHT OF REVIEW.

Evidence held to warrant a finding by the Industrial Accident Commission that a servant engaged in sacking pulverized grain contracted actinomycosis, an affection of the nose and mouth, by reason of his employment, and so a writ of review was properly denied.

Petition by the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company for a writ of review against the Industrial Accident Commission, and others, to review an award of compensation to H. A. Burris, an employé. Application denied.

E. A. Ingalls and H. L. Clayberg, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. Chris. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner herein presents the entire record of the proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission, from which it appears that one H. A. Burris was, during the months of October, November, and December, 1915, in the employ of the Perkins Grain & Milling Company, of which this petitioner is the insurer, and that while so employed in the work of grinding and sacking wheat and barley for feed, and while actively engaged in filling sacks of such pulverized grain from the spout of the grinding mill, said Burris became afflicted with an affection of the nose and mouth, which was diagnosed as actinomycosis, from which he suffered partial disability, and for compensation, on account of which he filed his claim before the Industrial Accident Commission. Upon the hearing thereon the chief issue presented was as to whether the applicant for compensation had suffered any injury arising out of and in the course of his employment.

The evidence taken upon this issue was that of expert witnesses as to the nature and causes of actinomycosis, and as to whether it was or could be conveyed by grain to the human organism. Upon this subject the testimony of the physicians was in conflict, as were also the medical treatises upon which they respectively relied for their opinions. The Commission resolved this conflict in opinion and authority in favor of the applicant for compensation by its finding that "the applicant's employment in and about the handling of grain caused him to contract the disease known as actinomycosis." The evidence in support of this finding consists, not only in the opinion evidence of the physicians who treated the applicant and diagnosed his case, but also in the testimony of the applicant himself that he had not theretofore suffered from any such disorder, but that it had become acutely developed whilst he was engaged in the work of sacking and handling pulverized grain for his employer. We think this evidence was sufficient to warrant the Commission in arriving at its aforesaid conclusion, and, this being so, we have no power to interfere with its discretion in making said award.

The application for the writ is denied.

LEUTHEUSER v. SILENT. (Civ. 1797.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 28, 1916.)

1. CONTRACTS 🔑335(2)—ACTION FOR BREACH—COMPLAINT—VALUE OF WORK DONE.

A complaint on an express contract to dig a well at a certain price per foot, and to case, perforate, and sand-pump it, so as to leave it in condition for the installation of a pump, which alleged that the well was dug, but that defendant refused to permit the other work to be done, and did not allege the reasonable value of the work done, is insufficient, since the price fixed in the contract included work not done, so that it could not be the measure of recovery.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑878(2)—QUESTIONS PLEADED—NECESSITY OF CROSS-APPEAL.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by J. Leutheuser against Charles Silent, in which Elizabeth Leutheuser, as administratrix, was substituted as plaintiff. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Frank J. Thomas, Edwin A. Meserve, and Irving M. Walker, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Harry William Elliott, of Corina, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff in this action sued to recover for services alleged to have been performed for the defendant in drilling a water well. The jury in the case found a verdict in his favor, upon which judgment was entered. Motion for a new trial being denied, this appeal was taken from the judgment and also from the order denying that motion. The appeal is presented on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

[1] In plaintiff's complaint three alleged causes of action were set up; the first upon an express contract, the second and third for the reasonable value of work performed. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, a nonsuit was granted as to the second and third causes of action. In the first cause of action it was alleged that the agreement between plaintiff and defendant was that the defendant should pay the plaintiff $2.50 per foot for drilling the well for the first 300 feet and 50 cents additional per foot "in every 100 feet thereafter dug"; that the exact depth of the well was not first decided upon, but that plaintiff was authorized to drill the first 300 feet, and that the matter as to whether a greater depth in the ground should be penetrated was left to the decision of the defendant, who was to notify the plaintiff as to how deep he wanted the well dug. It was further alleged that the plaintiff drilled the well to a depth of 360 feet; that there was no water in the hole at that depth; that the plaintiff notified the defendant that the conditions were unfavorable for securing water, and asked for instructions as to whether he should drill deeper, and defendant notified the plaintiff to cease drilling. After the nonsuit was granted as to the second and third causes of action, plaintiff was allowed to amend his complaint by alleging that defendant neglected and refused to give any decision as to what depth the well should be dug, and never gave any such decision, but instructed the plaintiff to go from the property, and so prevented plaintiff from digging any deeper, and from perforating and sand-pumping the well, as the contract required, and that for such reason said perforation was not made and the casing was not put down deeper in the hole. There was no allegation incorporated, either in the statement of the first alleged cause of action or in the amendment made thereto, as to what the reasonable value of the work performed was. The written offer first made by the plaintiff to the defendant, the acceptance of which by the defendant created the contractual relation between the two, provided that, in addition to drilling the well, the plaintiff was to put down casing furnished by the defendant, and was to perforate and sand-pump the well and leave it in first-class condition for a pump to be installed. The condition of the complaint as it was left after the trial judge had granted the motion for nonsuit on the second and third causes of action was that the express contract and its terms were stated, and the depth to which the well was dug was stated. It was alleged that the work was not completed as called for by the contract because of the action of the defendant, and that there was left undone the placing of the casing to the bottom of the hole and the perforation thereof. It is quite clear from this statement of the allegations of that cause of action that the price as fixed by the contract would not be a measure of the value of the work performed, calculating at the price per foot agreed upon, from the top of the well to the bottom. Necessarily it would be presumed that the work of perforating and sand-pumping the well and putting the casing down to the bottom would cost the plaintiff something in time, material, and effort, which would have to be taken into account in determining what his services were worth. This situation showed clearly the necessity for pleading the value of the work, as far as it had progressed when stopped by the defendant, and we think the complaint did not state a good cause of action without such allegation. While counsel for respondent insists that the contract price was evidence of the value, it cannot be conceded that it would constitute evidence of the value where the work had not been fully performed. As is said in Cox v. McLaughlin, as that case is reported in 52 Cal. 590:

> "Where a variance has occurred in the performance of a specific contract, under such circumstances as still enable a plaintiff to maintain an action on the implied promise to pay the reasonable value of the work actually done, and the contract, so far as it has been performed in accordance with the specifications therein contained, the contract may ordinarily be introduced as evidence of value."

The controversy involved in the case cited was before the court on several appeals, to wit: In 54 Cal. 605; 63 Cal. 198; 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164. In that case work having been abandoned under a grading contract before final completion and because of alleged acts of prevention on the part of the cocontractor, the plaintiff set up the particular contract and sought recovery thereunder. The court indicated that damages might be recovered, but not under the specific terms of the contract; rather for the value of the work performed, together with profits which might have been made upon the uncompleted portion thereof. Before the last appeal the trial judge had allowed an amendment, setting up a cause of action on quantum meruit. The Supreme Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in allowing this amendment. In one of the earlier appeals (54 Cal. 605) it was declared in the opinion "that the present is not an action on the implied promise is apparent, not only from the omission of any averment of the actual value of the work done, but from the whole frame of the complaint."

[2] As to whether the trial judge here was right in granting a nonsuit as to the second and third causes of action is not involved, because no appeal was taken on the part of the plaintiff to review that ruling.

[3] As to the merits of the case on the facts, there was a conflict of evidence which places the determination of the jury regarding those matters beyond the reach of any review by this court. It appears that the well as put down was not perpendicular, neither was it straight. However, the plaintiff produced some testimony showing that a pump could be operated successfully, and that it was reasonably practicable to install a pump, in such a well; also, that there was no understanding or agreement that the well should be straight. These matters were directly contradicted by evidence which defendant introduced.

From what has been stated it will be apparent that the judgment and order must be reversed.

The judgment and order are reversed, with direction to the trial judge to allow the plaintiff, if he be so advised, to amend his complaint to correct the imperfection first herein pointed out.

(Civ. 1567.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 29, 1916.)

1. Justices of the Peace 🔑130 — Judgment—Intendments Favoring.

There are no intendments in favor of a judgment of a justice of the peace, and a party relying on such judgment must establish the legality of every step necessary to a valid judgment.

2. Sheriffs and Constables 🔑98(1)—Process as Protection—Colorable Title.

Where, at the time of the alleged sale of property by brother to sister, the ceremony consisted in the brother's taking the property, horses, and vehicles, used in his livery barn, to the street, and stating to the sister's agent, there present, that he had sold the property to her, thereupon taking the property back to the barn, and thenceforward using it in his livery and draying business as he had for years before, to all appearances as the owner, the sister not seeing the property and not having personal possession of it, the sale was merely colorable, and his writ was sufficient justification for a sheriff who took the property on execution as the property of the brother.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by Mary F. Lazarus against Ralph R. Byrnes, Sheriff of Mendocino County, and others, sureties on his official bond. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, for appellant. Mannon & Mannon, of Ukiah, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for the alleged conversion of certain personal property of which plaintiff alleges that on September 11, 1913, and for a long time prior thereto she was the owner; that on said mentioned day defendant Byrnes, as sheriff of said county, "wrongfully took and carried away and converted and disposed of said personal property, under the purported authority of a writ of execution"; "that the aforesaid purported writ of execution was not directed against this plaintiff or any property, real or personal, of this plaintiff"; that this plaintiff "is a stranger and not a party to the suit wherein said purported writ of execution was issued"; that said Byrnes, as said sheriff, was without authority to seize, take, or sell said personal property; that by reason of said act plaintiff has been damaged, etc. By proper averments the said sheriff's bondsmen are made parties defendant.

A general and special demurrer was overruled, and defendants answered: Alleged that on November 4, 1910, a judgment was duly given and made in the justice's court of Big River township, county of Mendocino, whereby it was adjudged that certain named persons, plaintiffs in the action, have and recover judgment against M. D. Nolan for the sum of $238 and costs; that on September 11, 1913, an execution was duly issued out of said justice's court, directed to the sheriff of said county, whereby said sheriff was commanded to make the amount of said judgment out of the property of said Nolan; that defendant Byrnes, acting under the written instructions from plaintiff's attorneys in said action and upon the authority of said writ, did take into his possession the personal property mentioned in said complaint and did sell the same; that all of said property then was and for a long time prior thereto had been the property of said Nolan; that said defendant sheriff, as aforesaid, sold said property at public auction, and after deducting the expenses of said sale applied the proceeds thereof in satisfaction of said judgment; that "plaintiff did not previous to said sale nor for more than five months thereafter claim the property * * * or any part thereof as her property by a written claim verified by her oath * * * setting out her right to the possession thereof and serve the same upon the said sheriff."

For further defense: Denied that plaintiff was on September 11, 1913, or at any other time, the owner of said property, and denied that said property was of the value alleged or of any value other than as specifically set forth in the answer; denied that defendant, said sheriff, "did not well, truly, and faithfully perform the duties of his said office" in said matter; denied that defendant, said sheriff, on said September 11, 1913, or any other time, wrongfully or at all deprived plaintiff of the use or possession of said property and denied that plaintiff had been damaged by reason of any acts of said sheriff or at all.

A demurrer to the answer was overruled, and a motion to strike out certain averments of the answer was denied. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and defendants had the judgment from which plaintiff appeals.

The court found as facts: "That the plaintiff was not on the 11th day of September, 1913, * * * or at any other time the owner or in the possession or entitled to the possession of the personal property described and set forth in paragraph 3 of the first amended complaint or any thereof," nor was plaintiff the owner or entitled to the possession of any of said property at the time of the commencement of the action or at any other time; the value of each article is specifically found, and the court also found the facts pleaded in justification by the sheriff to be as alleged in the answer.

Plaintiff and Nolan are sister and brother. The latter for 14 or 15 years prior and up to September 11, 1913, was engaged in the livery and draying business in Mendocino city and had possession of and was using the property in question in said business. The claim of plaintiff is that Nolan sold the property to her in 1909 or 1910, and that thereafter he had possession of the property as her manager. Nolan testified that plaintiff had loaned him money, from time to time, and the transfer of the property to plaintiff was to discharge this indebtedness. That transaction was fully gone into and the court found upon sufficient evidence that plaintiff had not at the time of the trial or any time prior thereto any right, title, or interest in the property as owner or otherwise, or right of possession thereto. In her opening brief plaintiff does not attack this finding, but assails the judgment of the justice's court as invalid on the grounds: (1) That the trial in that court was not set for any certain hour; (2) that there was no legal notice of setting the case for trial; (3) that the court did not wait one hour after the case was first called before proceeding to hear the evidence and render judgment. It is further contended that there are no intendments in favor of a judgment of a justice of the peace, and a party relying on such a judgment must establish the legality of every step necessary to a valid judgment.

[1] Defendants introduced copies of the pleadings in the justice's court, summons and evidence of service thereof, the docket entries of the justice of the peace, the default judgment, execution, return of the sheriff showing satisfaction of the judgment. In short, copies of all the proceedings in the justice's court and in the sheriff's office relating to said action. Plaintiff points out some irregularities in the proceedings in the justice's court which it is claimed show an invalid judgment. The rule as to judgments of a justice's court is as stated by plaintiff. Eltzroth v. Ryan, 89 Cal. 135, 140, 26 Pac. 647; Harlan v. Gladding, etc., 7 Cal. App. 49, 53, 93 Pac. 400.

In Thornburgh v. Hand, 7 Cal. 554, 567, it was said:

"The rule is, that if a sale is made which was intended to be good between the parties, it cannot be attacked until the officer shows that he is entitled to represent a creditor; but if the sale is merely colorable, and it appears from the testimony that it never was the intention of the parties to pass the title, that the plaintiff is but the agent or bailee of the defendant in attachment, then the writ would be a sufficient justification for the officer, as it is evident that an agent, by reason of a colorable or fraudulent sale, would be in no better condition than his principal.

"The rule is thus laid down by Starkie, in his work on Evidence: 'If the assignment and delivery of possession were merely colorable, and the property still remained in the debtor, against whose goods the execution issued, the sheriff, it seems, would be entitled to a verdict without proof of the judgment, the plaintiff having no property in the goods.'"

[2] The evidence in this case is that at the time of the alleged sale the ceremony constituting the transfer consisted in Nolan's taking the horses and vehicles out of his barn to the street, and stating to plaintiff's agent there present that he had sold the property to plaintiff, and thereupon taking the property back to the barn and thenceforward using it as he had for years before to all appearances as the owner.

Plaintiff resided in Sausalito, and did not see the property, and never did have personal possession of it. There were other facts tending to show that the alleged sale was a mere pretense, and not a bona fide transfer of the property.

The rule stated in Thornburgh v. Hand, supra, seems to be directly applicable here. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the alleged irregularities in the proceedings in the justice's court. The writ of execution was sufficient justification for the sheriff.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by James Kinkade against the Champion Horeshoe Company. From judgment for plaintiff and order denying motion to tax costs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles W. Slack and Chauncey S. Goodrich, both of San Francisco, for appellant. R. F. Mogan and George J. Dougherty, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor, and also from an order of the court denying the defendant's motion to tax costs by disallowing certain items charged by the plaintiff in his cost bill.

The complainant is in two counts, the first depending upon a written instrument alleged to have been made between the defendant and the plaintiff's assignor, by the terms of which the latter was employed to engage in the sale of certain manufactured goods of the defendant at a salary of $200 per month from July 1, 1912, to January 1, 1913, and of $225 per month from January 1, 1913, to August 30, 1914. The plaintiff did not set forth the agreement in full, but only undertook to plead its substance. The second count of the complaint set forth a cause of action for money alleged to have been expended for the use and benefit of said defendant. A general and special demurrer was presented to the complaint, which was overruled by the trial court, and which ruling the appellant here assails as error.

[1] Upon the several grounds of demurrer urged against the first count in the complaint the appellant insists that the complaint is uncertain in failing to aver whether the plaintiff's assignor performed any services or made any sales under said agreement. The complaint, however, does allege that the said assignor of plaintiff "did engage in the sale of such goods for said company, and has fully and fairly performed all the conditions of said agreement on his part to be performed." We think these allegations sufficiently informed the defendant as to the nature and scope of the plaintiff's demands, especially in view of the fact that it is nowhere contended that the defendant did not at all times have in its possession a copy of the written agreement between the parties, and hence could not have been misled to its injury by the pleader's attempt to briefly set forth the substance thereof.

[2] The appellant's contention that the second count of the complaint was defective in the respect that it did not set forth specifically the dates of any expenditures made by the assignor of plaintiff for the defendant's use and benefit is also without merit, for the reason that this objection to the complaint was the proper subject of a demand for a bill of particulars if the defendant wished for more specific information as to the dates and items of the account.

[3] Upon the trial of the cause the defendant rested its case upon the evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff, and it is now contended that the proofs were insufficient to justify a judgment in plaintiff's favor. The evidence offered in support of the plaintiff's claim consisted of the written agreement between the defendant and John C. Hogan, the assignor of plaintiff, the substance of which had been pleaded in the complaint, a number of letters passing between the parties during the period of the performance of the terms of said agreement to be performed by said Hogan, and the testimony of said Hogan in respect to the payments made thereon and to the understanding between the parties as to deferred payments on account of his monthly salary. From this evidence it appeared that Mr. Hogan from an early date in the period of his employment did not receive the entire amount of his salary monthly, but would be sent by the defendant a sum from $25 to $75 less than the amount due him each month in cash, accompanied by what was called a "credit memorandum" for the balance, the defendant, in its several letters to him inclosing such payments, stating, "This is the best we can do until we get swinging," or "until the trade can be conducted on a profitable basis." Mr. Hogan testified that he accepted these payments of less amounts than his salary with the accompanying credit memorandum because he thought that was the best he could do at the time, and that he wanted to help the company along, and that he hoped and was led to believe that in the near future he would be paid in full. The appellant contends that the evidence offered in this connection shows that the original written agreement between the parties was so changed thereby that the assignor of plaintiff was not to have these deficiencies in his monthly salary made up to him unless the business of the company proved profitable. The trial court, however, did not adopt this view, but, on the contrary, found that the averments of the defendant's answer setting forth such a modification of the original agreement between the parties were untrue. We think the evidence fully sustains this finding, and hence that there is no merit in the foregoing contention.

The appellant also insists that the written agreement between the parties was modified in other respects affecting materially the plaintiff's right to recover; as, for instance, in respect to the territory wherein the assignor of plaintiff was to operate and wherein he did in fact engage in making sales of its wares. That such change of base was made there is no question; but it is equally certain that it was made by the consent of both parties, and that such change in no way affected or was intended to affect the amount of monthly salary to be paid to plaintiff's assignor.

[4] The appellant further objects to two items of the account of Mr. Hogan to which he testified in support of the averments of the second count in the complaint. These items have reference to the packing and shipment of certain furniture of Hogan from Omaha to California, and to the expense of travel of his wife between the two places. In support of these charges the plaintiff produced a letter from the defendant to Hogan referring thereto, wherein the defendant wrote: "We will pay the costs of its return and Mrs. Hogan's fare back." We think this promise was fairly susceptible of a construction which would include both of the items of expense to which the defendant objected, and the court's finding in that behalf will not therefore be disturbed.

[5] The final objection of the appellant goes to the alleged error of the court in refusing to tax the plaintiff's cost bill by striking from it certain items of costs embracing the sheriff's fees for serving writs of attachment in the case, and also the notary fees in the matter of the affidavit and bond for such attachment. There is no merit in this contention. This being a proper case for attachment, the fees to which objection is made constituted necessary and proper disbursements in the action, and were therefore proper items of cost to be awarded the plaintiff therein.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PAFF et al. v. OTTINGER et al. (Civ. 1809.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 30, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 26, 1917.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT 🔑123(8)—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for an architect's fees, evidence aside from the declarations of the alleged agent held sufficient to show that the person who contracted for plaintiffs' services on behalf of defendants was defendants' agent having authority to make such a contract.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT 🔑22(2)—ACTIONS AGAINST PRINCIPAL — DECLARATIONS OF AGENT—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, in an action against a principal, the agency has been established by sufficient evidence outside of the agent's declarations, his declarations made within the scope of his authority are then admissible.

3. PLEADING 🔑236(3)—AMENDMENT—REFUSAL OF LEAVE—DILATORY PLEA.

It is not an abuse of the trial court's discretion to refuse leave to defendants to amend their answer three years after it had been filed and during the trial, so as to allege the incapacity of plaintiffs to sue because of their failure to comply with Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2467, relating to the filing of certificates of partnerships under fictitious names, since such an answer is a dilatory plea which is waived by failure to plead it in the first instance.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Charles Paff and another against Adolph Ottinger and another. Judgment for the plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Leon Samuels, of San Francisco, for appellants. George C. Sargent, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment in the plaintiffs' favor and from an order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial. The action was brought to recover the sum of $1,154.80, alleged to be due as architect's fees for the drawing of plans and specifications for a building to be erected upon premises of the defendants, and for taking bids upon the same. It was the contention of the defendants at the trial of the cause that whatever work the plaintiffs may have done in the premises was authorized and ordered, not by the defendants, but by one H. B. Peterson, whom the plaintiffs claim to have been an authorized agent of the defendants, but concerning whom defendants contend such relation of agency was not sufficiently proven. The facts of the case upon which the plaintiffs relied for their recovery are substantially these: In the year 1907 the defendants were the holders under a long lease of a certain vacant lot in the city and county of San Francisco, upon which there was at the time a sign to the effect that they would build to suit a tenant, which sign bore the name "B. B. Peterson, Real Estate," and which, one of the defendants testified, had been placed there under the defendants' direction, and that said Peterson was their agent to get tenants for the building to be constructed upon the premises. In the month of September, 1907, said Peterson came to the office of the plaintiffs and requested them to draw plans and specifications and superintend the construction of a class "C" building upon the defendants' said lot. Prior to said time, said Peterson had ordered certain other plans of the plaintiffs for the defendants, and for which the latter had paid. Upon receiving this second order, one of the plaintiffs, Mr. Paff, went to look at the lot and saw there the aforesaid sign. The plans and specifications were accordingly drawn, and when completed were delivered to Peterson, and were by him submitted to the defendants, who, according to Peterson's report to the plaintiffs, pronounced them satisfactory, whereupon the plans by the plaintiffs were submitted to contractors, and bids called for. These bids proved too high, and the plaintiffs were instructed by Peterson to revise their plans so as to provide for a frame building. This was done, and the revised plans again submitted to the defendants and to bidders. While these bids were being taken, a contractor, whose name also was Peterson, presented to Mr. Paff a card of the defendant Ottinger, upon which was written a note signed by the latter asking Paff to let this Mr. Peterson figure on the property. Later Paff called upon Ottinger at the latter's office and found there a set of blueprints of the building first designed and also of the frame building. Upon introducing himself Paff was greeted by Mr. Ottinger with the words: "Oh, yes; you are Mr. Paff, my architect." A conversation then ensued, in which Mr. Paff was assured that the erection of the building would be proceeded with "as soon as the neighborhood had cleared a little of the Greeks." Paff called again in September and reminded Ottinger that some time had elapsed since the plans were drawn, and asked for a payment on account of his fees, to which Ottinger replied that they were about to sublet, and that he would arrange that the plaintiffs should remain as architects and that the subtenants would pay for their services. The defendants finally refusing to pay the bill, this action was brought. The trial court found in plaintiffs' favor from the foregoing facts and rendered its judgment accordingly.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

[1, 2] The main contention of the appellants is that the case of the plaintiffs must rest upon proof of an actual agency in the said H. B. Peterson to make the contract for plaintiffs' services, and that neither the existence nor scope of such agency has been proven otherwise than by the self-serving declarations of Peterson himself made at various times to the plaintiffs during the progress of their work, and testified to only by them; and that such an agency cannot be so proven. With the law quoted by the appellants in support of this contention the respondents have no quarrel, but they contend—and we think correctly—that the agency of Peterson has been established by sufficient evidence entirely outside of the statements by Peterson himself, and this having in our view of the testimony been so established, the statements of Peterson, as such agent, to the plaintiffs, in the course of their employment and services, would be admissible in evidence, and hence the objections which the defendants urged thereto would have been properly overruled.

[3] The final contention of the appellants is that the trial court erred in its refusal to allow them to file an amended answer wherein they allege for the first time a lack of legal capacity in the plaintiffs to sue arising out of their alleged failure to comply with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2467 of the Civil Code, relating to the filing of certificates of partnerships under fictitious names. These have always been held to be dilatory pleas, which are waived by the failure in the first instance to plead them; and we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in refusing leave to the defendants to amend their answer by making such a plea more than three years after their original answer had been filed and while the trial of the cause was in progress.

LEVY et al. v. DUSENBERY. (Civ. 1797.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 28, 1916.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1040(10) — HARMLESS ERROR—OVERRULING DEMURRER—BROKER'S COMPENSATION.

The overruling of special demurrer on ground that complaint to recover broker's commission did not set up exact terms of contract, and hence it could not be ascertained whether broker's services were performed within time limited, was harmless, where defendant was thoroughly informed of the date and facts and was in no way prejudiced.

2. EVIDENCE 🔑417(18) — CONTRACT OF EXCHANGE—PAROL EVIDENCE TO SHOW DATE.

Parol evidence introduced by plaintiff broker to show true date of an exchange agreement between defendant and other party to trade to which plaintiff was not a party was admissible, parol evidence rule applying only to parties to the contract, and such evidence always being competent to show true date.

3. BROKERS 🔑50—COMPENSATION—"CONSUMMATION OF EXCHANGE."

A broker's contract for commission payable "upon consummation of exchange within 24 hours" referred to execution of exchange agreement, and not to actual exchange of deeds, where exchange agreement provided for 30 days to examine title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 68.]

4. BROKERS 🔑50 — COMPENSATION — SUFFICIENCY OF SERVICES—TIME.

Where a broker had procured a purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase, within time limited, and exchange agreement had been executed, the fact that the actual exchange of deeds was not made until after time limited by exchange agreement for inquiry into title will not defeat his right to commissions.

5. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY 🔑4 — REALTY — CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

An exchange agreement allowing "30 days for search of title," and "both parties agree to deliver their respective properties free and clear of all incumbrances except as hereinbefore mentioned," referred only to the time for examining title and did not require deeds to be exchanged within that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exchange of Property, Cent. Dig. § 4.]

6. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 🔑75—CONTRACT —TIME TO EXAMINE TITLE.

Where a contract for sale of land provides no specific time for examination of title, a reasonable time will be allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 113–118, 126.]

7. BROKERS 🔑52—COMPENSATION—BRINGING PARTIES TOGETHER.

A broker's right to compensation does not depend upon an actual closing of the transaction, unless so stipulated, where he has actually procured a purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase within the time limit of his contract.

8. BROKERS 🔑67(1) — COMPENSATION — EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY.

In the case of agreements for exchange of land, procured by a broker, facts may warrant broker's recovery of commissions from one party but not from the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 52, 53.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by F. A. Levy and another, trustees for the stockholders of Watson, Pond & Riddle, against Samuel Dusenbery. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Vogelsang & Brown, of San Francisco, for appellant. Herbert Choynski and John T. Williams, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by defendant from an adverse judgment in an action brought in the name of Watson, Pond & Riddle (a corporation), the present plaintiffs being afterwards substituted for them, for the recovery of $1,200 for services claimed to have been performed for the defendant in bringing about an exchange of real estate in San Francisco.

It appears from the evidence that from time to time during a period of more than a month prior to October 25, 1909, F. W. Thurston, the accredited representative of Watson, Pond & Riddle, had been endeavoring to effect an exchange of certain properties between the defendant and Mrs. Emma Siminoff, with the result that on October 24, 1909, the defendant and that lady arrived at an understanding as to the terms of the proposed exchange, and Thurston was directed to prepare an agreement embodying them. Accordingly, the next day Thurston prepared in duplicate a written agreement of exchange and two contracts of employment, one to be signed by Mrs. Siminoff and the other by the defendant, whereby the parties to the exchange agreed to pay to Watson, Pond & Riddle a commission of $1,300. On said October 25th Thurston called at the office of the defendant and submitted to him the proposed exchange agreement and the contract of employment. Defendant objected to a certain part of the former, and also reduced the amount of commission payable by him to the sum of $1,200, made it payable in installments, and conditional "upon the consummation of the exchange of properties within 24 hours from date." Thereupon Thurston took the two copies of the proposed agreement of exchange and the contract of employment to Mrs. Siminoff; and, after he explained to her the part of the agreement to which defendant had objected, she consented to the modification, and that evening signed it in duplicate. She also at the same time signed the contract of employment prepared for her, whereby she agreed to pay Watson, Pond & Riddle a commission of $1,300. The following morning, October 26th, when both copies of the exchange agreement were handed by Thurston to the defendant for his signature, he signed them and inserted therein the figures and letters "27th" as a part of the date of the instrument. Both copies of this agreement having thus been signed by the parties, Thurston left one copy with the defendant and late that afternoon delivered the other to Mrs. Siminoff.

The contract of exchange recited that Mrs. Siminoff and the defendant were the owners of certain pieces of real property in San Francisco subject to certain mortgages, and bound the respective parties to mutually convey good and sufficient title to their properties, free from incumbrances except those mentioned therein. The contract also contained a provision that:

> "Both parties hereto hereby agree to allow thirty days from the date hereof for the search of title on their respective properties."

The defendant thereafter interposed various objections to the consummation of the sale, claiming that the property of Mrs. Siminoff in certain respects had been misrepresented to him; but it appears that the objections and claim of misrepresentations were without substantial foundation. However, during the discussions between the parties thus arising the defendant proposed to Mrs. Siminoff that they terminate the contract and enter into a new one, but she refused to do so, insisting that the contract already entered into be performed; otherwise there would be no further negotiation. The exchange of deeds was made about a month after the expiration of the 30 days provided in the contract for examination of title.

[1] The first point made by the appellant for a reversal is that his special demurrer to the complaint on the ground of uncertainty and ambiguity should have been sustained. The complaint had pleaded the employment of the plaintiff without setting up its exact terms, followed by an averment that the procurement of the agreement of exchange under said employment was had on October 27, 1909. The point of the special demurrer was that it could not be ascertained from the complaint whether the plaintiff's services had been performed within the time limit set therefor.

Whether or not the demurrer was well taken, we are satisfied from an examination of the record that the appellant was not prejudiced by the ruling in question. The appellant was thoroughly informed of the date of the plaintiff's employment, of the time limit set therefor, and of the fact that the exchange agreement constituting the plaintiff's performance was dated October 27th, which was one day after the expiration of plaintiff's authority. At the trial it was testified on behalf of the plaintiff that, although the exchange agreement bears the date of October 27th, it was actually signed and procured on the preceding day, thus proving it to be, if such testimony were believed by the court, within the time limit of the employment. The defendant met this testimony by categorically testifying that the 27th was the true date of the execution of this document and that it was not signed or delivered before. He thus had the instrument itself and his own testimony in its support, and he could have had no more if the complaint had specifically averred October 26th as the date of procuring the instrument. No other testimony upon this point was introduced by the plaintiff. The court chose to believe the plaintiff's version, but such result was not attributable to any disadvantage suffered by the defendant through ambiguity or uncertainty of the complaint. In the absence of such prejudice an order erroneously overruling a special demurrer will not constitute ground for reversal. Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 234, 237, 90 Pac. 936; Alexander v. Central L. & M. Co., 104 Cal. 536, 38 Pac. 410; Krieger v. Feeny, 14 Cal. App. 538, 544, 112 Pac. 901.

After the trial the court permitted an amendment to the complaint to conform to the proof, and accordingly an "amended and supplemental complaint" was filed, to which the defendant demurred, whereupon the plaintiff immediately filed a "second amended and supplemental complaint." Defendant's demurrer to this last pleading was also overruled by the court; and what we have just said as to the overruling of the demurrer to the complaint will also dispose of the objections now urged by the appellant to this second adverse ruling.

[2] Equally without merit, we think, is the contention that the evidence introduced by the plaintiff to show that the true date of the exchange agreement was inadmissible in the absence of an issue of mistake or fraud. The plaintiff was not a party to the contract between defendant and Mrs. Siminoff, and it is only as to parties to a contract that the rule may be invoked that parol evidence is not admissible to vary its terms. Dunn v. Price, 112 Cal. 46, 44 Pac. 354; Christenson Lumber Co. v. Buckley, 17 Cal. App. 37, 118 Pac. 466. But even if the plaintiff had been a party to it, still the evidence was correctly received, for parol evidence is always competent to show the true date of a written instrument. Treadwell v. Reynolds, 47 Cal. 171; Gately v. Irvine, 51 Cal. 172; Erickson v. Robertson, 116 Minn. 90, 133 N. W. 165, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1133, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 493; Lee v. Mass. F. & M. Ins. Co., 6 Mass. 208; Moore v. Smead, 89 Wis. 558, 62 N. W. 426.

[3] Coming now to a construction of the broker's contract, it reads in part as follows:

> "I hereby agree to pay you the sum of $1,200 as commissions for services rendered upon the consummation of said exchange of properties, within 24 hours from date, and payable $100 down and $100 per month."

The portion underscored was added by the defendant in his own handwriting at the time he signed the contract. It is quite apparent to us—and we do not understand it to be seriously contested—that the words "consummation of said exchange of properties" as used in this writing refer, not to the final exchange of deeds, but to the execution and delivery of a binding contract for their exchange; for it could not have been within the contemplation of the defendant that the actual exchange of properties could be effected within the 24 hours, as the agreement of exchange itself provided that 30 days should be allowed each party to examine title, and there were other matters to be investigated and adjusted which would require more time than a single day.

[4, 5] The next and main contention of the appellant is that, even assuming that the plaintiff procured the exchange agreement within the time limited therefor, the defendant's liability to pay the specified commission was still dependent upon the further condition that the actual exchange of deeds should take place within 30 days from the date of the agreement for exchange; and this by virtue of the clause contained therein reading:

> "Both parties hereto hereby agree to allow thirty days from the date hereof for the search of title on their respective properties, and both parties hereby agree to deliver their respective properties free and clear of all incumbrances except as hereinbefore mentioned."

It is pointed out by the appellant that the properties were not exchanged until a day or two over a month after the lapse of the 30-day period, and that therefore the broker had failed to produce a purchaser "ready, willing and able to purchase" within the rule entitling a broker to his commission; in other words, that the broker's contract not only required him to procure the agreement of exchange within the 24 hours, but also imposed upon him the obligation to insure the completion of the exchange within the 30 days mentioned in the exchange agreement.

[6] We cannot agree with this construction. As we read the agreement, no time is therein provided within which the actual exchange of deeds must take place. The 30-day period specifically refers to the time allowed for examining title, and it is a matter of common knowledge in real estate transactions that some period of time between that allowed for such examination and the actual close of the transaction almost always intervenes. When the contract is silent on that point, a reasonable time will be allowed.

[7] Moreover, the question, in our opinion, does not arise in the present case, since the plaintiff's right to recover his compensation did not depend upon the actual closing of the transaction. If the party with whom the plaintiff contracted for an exchange of properties had good title, it was immaterial to the broker's right to recover his compensation whether the exchange was ever effected or not. He had, by procuring the signing of the exchange agreement by Mrs. Siminoff, produced a purchaser "ready and willing," and the remaining requirement of "ability" was evidenced by the fact that her title proved to be good. Not only so, but the plaintiff accepted it, and the exchange was effected on the terms stated in the agreement. And further, even if the 30-day period referred to the time that the exchange was required to be consummated, the failure of the parties to comply with that condition would be immaterial to the plaintiff's right to recover. He had produced a purchaser ready and able to purchase, and who in fact did purchase. The only element of time on which the plaintiff's compensation was contingent was that contained in his written employment; and the cases cited by the appellant in support of the contention we are now considering are all cases dealing with the time limit of the broker's authorization to procure a purchaser, and not with any limitation contained in a contract entered into by buyer and seller as the result of the broker's efforts.

Generally speaking, when there is nothing in the broker's contract making his right to compensation depend upon some contingency, a broker employed to sell real property as a rule has earned his commission when, within the life of his contract or any extension thereof, he has produced a person who is ready, willing, and able to purchase the property on terms satisfactory to the seller, and has obtained a binding and valid contract for a sale on the terms proposed by the seller, or has brought the seller and buyer together and thus enabled them to enter into a contract of sale. Shepherd-Teague Co. v. Hermann, 12 Cal. App. 395, 107 Pac. 622. In such a case it would make no difference that the contract of sale provided for a time to search the title to the property. The agent's right to compensation would accrue, unless otherwise provided by the terms of his employment, when the contract of sale was executed, or when the opportunity to make such contract was given the seller, in which event the agent would be entitled to his commission even if the seller had no title or defective title to the property. Phelps v. Prusch, 83 Cal. 626, 23 Pac. 1111.

[8] So in the case of an agreement for an exchange of properties, when time is given to examine the titles as in the present case, the giving of such time does not affect the agent's right to his commission, although it might affect the time of its payment. His right to the agreed compensation would be fixed by the production of a person "able, ready and willing" to purchase by the conveyance of good title. It is, of course, true that there arise cases in exchanges of property where the broker may be entitled to recover from one party and not from the other. In the case of an agreement for the purchase of properties between A. and B., brought about by a broker under valid employment, the broker's right to compensation from A. is not affected by the inability of A. to convey good title, but is affected by B.'s inability, since the conveyance of good title by B. is the price that A. is to receive for his property, and without it the broker has not produced a purchaser able to purchase. And similarly as to the broker's right to compensation from B., it is unaffected by B.'s inability to pass good title, but is affected by A.'s inability. Connor v. Riggins, 21 Cal. App. 756, 132 Pac. 849. In the present case the question is set at rest by the fact that the title of Mrs. Siminoff proved to be good and was accepted by the appellant.

This disposes of the points meriting detailed discussion, and for the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF SAN DIEGO et al. v. CAPPS, Mayor. (Civ. 2272.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Jan. 3, 1917.)

1. Mandamus 🔑23(1) — Persons Entitled to Relief—City and Council.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1086, providing that mandamus must be issued upon verified petition of party beneficially interested, the city of San Diego and its council have sufficient interest to entitle them to a writ compelling the mayor to appoint a chief of police, provided for by city charter; the common council's duties not being entirely legislative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 55–58.]

2. Mandamus 🔑168(2) — Pleading — Presumptions.

In a mandamus proceeding to compel the mayor to appoint a chief of police, it will be presumed, irrespective of full affirmative allegations in petition, that a city of the size of San Diego needs an efficient head of its police department.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 372.]

Original petition for mandamus by the City of San Diego and others against Edwin M. Capps, Mayor. Peremptory writ issued.

T. B. Cosgrove, City Atty., of San Diego, for petitioners. Arthur L. Dorn, of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Petition in mandamus for a writ to compel the respondent, mayor of the city of San Diego, to appoint a superintendent or chief of police. It appears from the petition, the facts not being disputed by respondent, that on the 1st day of May, 1915, there became effective a provision of the freeholders' charter of the city of San Diego creating a police department and providing for a superintendent or chief of police; that it was also provided in said charter that the mayor should appoint such chief of police. It appears that no appointment has been made under the charter provision of an executive head for the police department, and that the respondent mayor has refused to make such appointment. It appears, also, by allegations in the petition, that on the 1st day of December, 1916, the city council of said city passed a resolution declaring that necessity existed for the appointment of a chief of police, and demanding that the mayor perform his duty and select some person to fill the office. The resolution further directed the city attorney to institute proceedings to compel the mayor to make the appointment. The city of San Diego and the common council appear as petitioners.

[1] It is contended on the part of respondent that these plaintiffs are not entitled to the writ sought, because they have not such a beneficial interest in the subject-matter as to make them proper parties under section 1086 of the Code of Civil Procedure. While the functions of the common council are in the main legislative, that body has other duties devolving upon it, and, in a qualified sense and subject to the restrictions of the city charter, is the governing arm of the municipality. Where officers of a city, charged with the performance of ministerial duties, neglect or refuse to follow the direction of the law under which they have assumed office, it would seem most proper that the city by its common council should be permitted in a proceeding of this kind to compel such officers to fulfill the obligation which their oath has imposed upon them. That this right exists in the city is very clearly held in City of San Buenaventura et al. v. McGuire, 8 Cal. App. 497, 97 Pac. 526, 528. The statement of the law as contained in that case was approved by the Supreme Court when a petition to have the matter reheard was denied.

[2] In a city of the considerable size of San Diego it must be presumed, irrespective of the very full and affirmative allegations in the petition to that effect, that for the efficient administration of the police department it is necessary that there should be an executive head thereof. The people of the city of San Diego in their charter determined that they would have a chief of police, and made it incumbent upon the mayor as a purely ministerial duty to name some one to fill that office. To say that the mayor may refuse to heed the express mandate of the electors of the city would be to give countenance to a species of executive nullification which the law will not tolerate. When the mayor took his oath and accepted the office, he bound himself to perform all the duties which the charter imposed upon him. No discretion was left under which he might in the regard here considered supplant the judgment of the people, solemnly declared at their charter election, by carrying out a policy which might satisfy his individual notion of what was best to be done in the circumstances. To our minds, this is a most appropriate case for use of the writ sought.

Peremptory writ of mandate is ordered to be issued, the return day to be five days from time of service; petitioners to recover their costs.

1. Criminal Law 🔑1159(3)—Appeal—Verdict—Conflicting Evidence.

Discrepancies and differences in description of a murderer, creating no more than a conflict in evidence, do not warrant appellate court in setting aside verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Judah Benjamin was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Judah Benjamin, in pro. per. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. By an information filed in the superior court of Alameda county the defendant was charged with the crime of murder. He was convicted of murder in the first degree, and his penalty therefor—life imprisonment—was fixed by the verdict of the jury.

The facts of the case as revealed by the evidence adduced upon the trial are substantially these: About the hour of 9 o'clock on the evening of March 4, 1916, Officer Gushe of the Oakland police department was seen to approach and place his hand upon the shoulder of a man who was standing or walking in the vicinity of Twelfth and Clay streets in the city of Oakland. The officer, holding the man by the shoulder, proceeded a few steps, when the latter turned and engaged in a scuffle with the officer, during which a shot from a revolver was fired, after which the man broke the grasp of the officer and fled. The officer followed for a short distance, and, after firing several ineffectual shots at the fleeing man, fell to the sidewalk as the result of a wound inflicted by a 32 caliber bullet, and which wound, it was subsequently shown, caused his death. The man continued his flight, and, although a crowd pursued him, made good his escape. The defendant was arrested several days later and charged with the killing. Several witnesses who were at or near the scene of the scuffle with the officer gave a description of the man whom he apparently had under arrest which fitted the defendant with exactness, and several other witnesses positively identified the defendant as the man who passed within a few feet of them under a bright light pursued by a crowd and running from the scene of the shooting.

Subsequent to the killing and prior to the defendant being charged therewith, the defendant attracted the attention of Officer Hughes of the San Francisco police department, who observed him loitering and apparently begging on Sutter street in said city. Hughes approached the defendant and asked him if he was working. He replied in the negative, and in response to further questions concerning his place of abode and means of livelihood demanded to know why the inquiry was made, whereupon Hughes displayed his star. The defendant then exclaimed, "I shoot the likes of you, got no use for you, and I am going to get you before I get through with you." Hughes thereupon placed the defendant under arrest, and was in the act of searching him when the defendant drew a 32 caliber revolver from his pocket and pressed it against the body of Hughes. The officer grasped the revolver, and, breaking it, proceeded with the search of the defendant's person, which revealed 21 32 caliber loaded pistol cartridges, a large butcher knife, and a razor.

There was offered and received in evidence on behalf of the people a letter written, addressed, and delivered to the chief of police of Oakland subsequent to the killing of Officer Gushe and before the arrest of the defendant, which was shown by expert testimony to be in the handwriting of the defendant, and which reads as follows:

> "I was the man that shot the police Gushe, and to tell you there may be more killed if you don't have the police do thing right, for you have now in the police department that are no good. All they want is their pay every month, so look out."

This letter was followed by the introduction in evidence of another letter also written, addressed, and delivered to the chief of police of Oakland subsequent to the killing of Gushe and prior to the arrest of the defendant, which likewise was shown to have been written by the defendant, and which reads as follows:

> "San Francisco, Cal., March 11, 1916.
> "Chief of Police, Oakland, Cal.—Dear Sir: The men on the force under you don't seem to realize they are performing a certain service for the public and that when they exceed that and overstep their bounds and interfere into people's private affairs, they deserve to be shot. That is what happened to Gushe and it should happen to a number more. What were most of these men before they become policemen? Gushe's delight when he was a Pinkerton at the race track was to wing men with his club and he only received back what he got. One dollar a head is the price they paid in New York for shooting these police, and let us hope it won't be long before that rate is established here and then what is left of the force will be men.
> "Respectfully yours,
> "The One Who Shot Gushe."

[1] The defendant did not take the stand in his own behalf. He rested his defense primarily upon the testimony of several witnesses who were present at or near the scene of the killing, who, in addition to differing to some extent from the witnesses for the people in their description of the man who did the shooting, testified that they could not identify the defendant as the man whom they saw scuffling with Officer Gushe and running away from the scene afterwards. The discrepancies and differences existing in the description of the murderer of the officer given by the respective witnesses for the prosecution and defense created no more than a conflict in the evidence, which, of course, will not suffice to disturb the verdict of the jury. Moreover, in addition to the testimony of the several witnesses for the people or the defendant who could do no more than describe the man whom they saw scuffling with Officer Gushe, there was the evidence of the letters written by the defendant, which in effect were an admission of guilt, and the testimony of the several witnesses who positively identified the defendant as the man who fled from the scene of the shooting.

[2, 3] Much of the argument presented in support of the appeal is devoted to a discussion of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence. Those were questions peculiarly for the jury; and in the absence of a showing of inherent improbability we are not permitted to interfere with the jury's conclusion upon the evidence. In short, we are satisfied that the evidence upon the whole case sufficiently supports the verdict and judgment. The conduct, conversation, and threats of the defendant upon being accosted and arrested by Officer Hughes in San Francisco, considered in conjunction with the defendant's letters to the Oakland chief of police, tend strongly, we think, to show that the defendant was obsessed with a peculiar and pronounced hatred for police officers in general and Officer Gushe in particular; and Officer Hughes' testimony therefore was material and relevant, and rightly received in evidence.

We find no error in the trial court's charge to the jury. The contention that the trial judge was prejudiced, and therefore disqualified from sitting in the case, is not sustained by the record.

Error is assigned as to many of the rulings of the court, but upon examination we find them to be uniformly correct. Upon the whole we are satisfied that the defendant was fairly tried and justly convicted.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PLATNAUER v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SACRAMENTO COUNTY et al.

(Civ. 1600.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 3, 1917.)

1. JUDGMENT 🔑278—SUSTAINING ENTRY.

The actual rendition of a judgment being the judicial act, and the entry thereof merely ministerial, the latter must be supported in all vital essentials by the previous order of the court.

2. CONTEMPT 🔑67—CERTIORARI—QUESTION CONSIDERED.

Where all facts upon which petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt are certified in full upon certiorari proceedings, the question of whether the judgment announced and that entered were the same held unnecessary to decision; the issue being whether petitioner was guilty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 221, 222.]

3. CONTEMPT 🔑67—CERTIORARI—POWER TO ANNUL JUDGMENT.

The Court of Appeals upon certiorari may review facts upon which lower court adjudged petitioner guilty of contempt, and may annul such judgment if warranted by the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 221, 222.]

4. CONTEMPT 🔑67—CERTIORARI—PRESUMPTIONS.

Mere presumptions and intendments are not to be indulged in support of judgment in contempt, although evidence de hors the record may not be considered.

5. CONTEMPT 🔑67—CERTIORARI—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where it appears that an attorney refused to obey the court's order to sit down and resisted its execution, and the court passed it without further notice, but later adjudged attorney in contempt for attempting to conduct the case after court's refusal to permit him to do so, it will be assumed that the court condoned the former conduct, or deemed it insufficient as contempt, and, although set up in the court's entered judgment, will not be considered on certiorari proceedings.

6. CONTEMPT 🔑30—POWER TO COMPEL DECORUS CONDUCT.

Every court has a right to compel litigants and attorneys to conduct themselves decorously, and may coerce such conduct on proper occasions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 91, 93, 94.]

7. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT 🔑14—DUTY TO COURT.

Attorneys are under obligation to uphold the dignity of, and be respectful to, the court, being officers thereof, though possessing a personal dislike for the presiding judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 21.]

8. CONTEMPT 🔑80—POWER TO RESTRAIN ATTORNEY FROM PARTICIPATING IN TRIAL.

No court has the right to arbitrarily force a licensed attorney, regularly employed, to retire from active participation in the case, even as punishment for contumacious conduct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 261–266.]

9. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT 🔑92—DUTY TO CLIENT—CONDUCT OF LITIGATION.

A lawyer engaged in the trial of a case is charged with the duty of safeguarding his client's interests, and for this purpose to interrogate witnesses, object to testimony, and argue objections.

10. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT 🔑92—DUTY TO CLIENT—CONDUCT OF LITIGATION.

Although a lawyer in discharging his duty to a client be persistent or vehement in presenting his points, he is within his legitimate rights, so long as his language is not offensive or indecorous, and whether he be right or wrong.

11. ELECTIONS ⟹300—CONTEST—TRIAL—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL.

Attorney for contestee was within his rights in contest of a primary election result, in interposing suggestions in respectful language as to absence of showing that ballots were in same condition as when received, even though his position was legally untenable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 308–313.]

12. CONTEMPT ⟹63(1)—DISOBEDIENCE TO COURT'S ORDER—RESTRAINING ATTORNEY FROM PARTICIPATING IN TRIAL.

Where attorney, upon seeking to be heard in trial of case, refused to comply with court's order to sit down and keep still, and the court, apparently passing this conduct, later refused to allow him any active participation in the trial, and, upon his respectfully seeking to be heard, adjudged him guilty of contempt, such order held beyond court's jurisdiction, and will be set aside.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. § 195.]

Application for certiorari by R. Platnauer to set aside judgment of contempt of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Sacramento, and Honorable Charles O. Busick, the judge thereof. Judgment annulled, set aside, and vacated.

A. M. Seymour, J. S. Daly, and R. Platnauer, all of Sacramento, for petitioner. Meredith, Landis & Chester, of Sacramento, for respondents.

HART, J. The petitioner was, by the respondents, adjudged guilty of contempt of court, and ordered to suffer punishment therefor by imprisonment in the county jail of the county of Sacramento for the period of one day. Claiming that, in so adjudging him guilty of contempt and so punishing him therefor, the court exceeded its jurisdiction, the petitioner, by this proceeding, asks this court for a writ of certiorari, to the end that the action of the court in that regard may be annulled and set aside as being absolutely void.

The alleged contempt occurred during the progress of the trial of the case entitled J. M. Morrison, contestant, v. William D. Lawton and C. E. Mahoney, contestees and respondents. Said proceeding involved and was instituted to contest the question of the nomination of the said C. E. Mahoney, at the general primary election held throughout the state in the month of August, 1916, for the office of supervisor for the Third supervisorial district of Sacramento county, and to that end to obtain a recount of the votes cast at said primary election in said district for said office; the three persons named having been rival candidates for the nomination for said office at the time mentioned.

For a clear understanding of the proceedings culminating in the order or judgment adjudging the petitioner guilty of contempt, it is necessary to explain that the contestant, J. M. Morrison, was, at the time of his candidacy for supervisor, as well as at the time of the hearing of the contest, a deputy in the office of the county clerk, and that petitioner was one of the attorneys representing in said contest the contestee, C. E. Mahoney.

It appears from the record before us—in fact, it is shown by both the petition for and the return to the writ—that, preliminarily to the inspection of the ballots cast at the election for the parties, the petitioner, representing the contestee, declared his intention of attempting to show, in support of his objection to the proposition made by the contestant that the clerks to be appointed by the court to keep the tallies in the proceeding be furnished by the county clerk from the clerical force of his office, that the county clerk was biased and prejudiced against the contestee; that therefore the clerks to be appointed by the court to assist in the counting of the ballots should not be taken from among the deputies of the county clerk. The subjoined is, however, the court stenographer's report of the discussion of this matter and of all other proceedings leading to the commitment, and it is conceived that a clearer understanding of the situation may be obtained from a reproduction herein of the full report:

"Mr. Platnauer: I will ask the court to direct the contestant to deposit such an amount in advance as the court shall fix for compensation and for the assistance of the court in making the canvass. I will read the section of the statute, which is section 28 of the Primary Election Law that provides for a recount. (Reading section.)

"The Court: What act is that?

"Mr. Platnauer: It is the primary election law of 1913.

"Mr. Meredith: There is no objection to that. The law is clear.

"The Court: Not the act that is held up by the referendum?

"Mr. Platnauer: No, this is the act of 1913.

"Mr. Meredith: Before your honor fixes the number of persons, it may be the county clerk can supply us the sufficient deputies from his own office; the persons are only such as the court may need to facilitate the counting. I would like to ascertain from the county clerk if he can furnish regular deputies from his office—

"Mr. Platnauer: If the court please, I object that the county clerk is disqualified from appointing for various reasons, it is obvious—your honor may know—one of them is that the contestant himself is a deputy.

"The Court: Of course, the contestant himself will not be qualified.

"Mr. Platnauer: I understand. We charge that the county clerk is biased and prejudiced.

"The Court: The court will ask the clerk if he has sufficient deputies to act as tally clerks; two will be required.

"Mr. Meredith: Mr. Pfund, can you supply the court with two of your deputies, disinterested, to represent the court in this recount?

"County Clerk Pfund: I can supply two or I can supply three.

"The Court: Two will be sufficient.

"Mr. Platnauer: If the court desires to hear, we desire to be heard on the question of the bias and prejudice of the county clerk.

"The Court: I do not care to hear you, Mr. Platnauer.

"Mr. Meredith (to Mr. Pfund): Will you designate two deputies.

"The Court: Mr. Platnauer, you have changed your position from a year ago.

"Mr. Platnauer: A year ago—

"The Court: At that time you absolutely refused to put up your share of the costs in a proceeding similar to this kind, and insisted that you had the right to the county clerk's deputies to act as tally clerks.

"Mr. Platnauer: In the first place, that was not a procedure similar to this; it was a general election contest; in the next place, there was no charge that the county clerk was biased and prejudiced against any of the litigants.

"The Court: This is not a trial charging the county clerk with prejudice and bias.

"Mr. Platnauer: I understand—

"The Court: Your motion will be denied. The county clerk will furnish two deputies.

"Mr. Platnauer: In this kind of a trial—this question of the county clerk—simply to present testimony when we claim the county clerk is biased and prejudiced.

"The Court: Sit down; I have ruled on that.

"Mr. Platnauer: Will you permit me to address the court?

"The Court: Sit down. Mr. Sheriff, set him down. I am not going to be continually listening to you, you will sit down. Sit him down. You refused to obey the order of the court. The Court will now order that you be restrained; the court will not permit you to further participate in the trial of this action; you are getting to be a nuisance around here. You refused to obey the order of the court. We want to go ahead here and proceed with this count. When the court orders you to sit down, you should obey it.

"Mr. Platnauer: If the court will permit me to address the court.

"The Court: I don't care to hear you any further. I will not permit you to address the court. Sit down, when I tell you to sit down; if not, the court will order you committed to jail; that is all, until you obey the order of the court. Mr. Seymour, go on and proceed with the conduct of the case. I don't care to hear from you any more at all.

"Mr. Meredith: I presume the court is familiar with the nature of this recount. It is for a recount of the Third supervisorial district. The county clerk suggests Mr. H. W. Hall and Mr. Gleason, both deputies in his office.

"The Court: Very well, I will name Mr. Hall and Mr. Gleason—Mr. Gleason and Mr. Hall.

"Mr. Meredith: I was going to suggest to counsel on the other side, would there be any objection to the integrity of the ballots?

"Mr. Platnauer: We cannot agree, you make your proof; I insist you make your proof.

"Mr. Meredith: We ask the court to make an order—it seems to be necessary—for the county clerk to produce the ballots in their original condition before this court, of the Third supervisorial district.

"Mr. Seymour: In this connection, I suggest that the court view the vault.

"The Court: Yes. I will now order that E. F. Pfund, county clerk for the county of Sacramento, forthwith, upon the service upon him of this order, break the seal of the vault in which the ballots of said August primary, of August 29, 1916, are contained, and, after opening the said vault, forthwith produce in open court, in Department 3 thereof, the sealed envelopes containing the ballots cast in such precinct—that is precinct No. 17 to 30 and 43 to 60 and 94 to 109, and 123 to 137, inclusive, in such manner and at such time as the court may order.

"Mr. Seymour: May it please the court, I suggest your honor view the vault.

"The Court: When the count begins, the ballots will be placed on the bar and counsel, one counsel for contestant and one for contestee—

"Mr. Seymour: We can arrange that, after we get them.

"Mr. Meredith: Will the court inspect the vault at the present time?

"The Court: Yes; I will go down.

"(The court left the court room, and, returning into the court, the following occurred:)

"The Court: Counsel for contestant may take a position on my left and counsel for contestee on the right. The ballots will be placed here—

"Mr. Seymour: May it please the court, Mr. Morris is to act in the capacity of clerk for Mr. Mahoney.

"The Court: If there is room, there is no objection. Are you ready to proceed, Mr. Meredith? Have you any particular precinct?

"Mr. Meredith: We would like to start in with precinct 30.

"The Court: I suggest counsel take their places and the ballots be placed on the bar of the court.

"Mr. Meredith: We are ready.

"The Court: When the ballot of a precinct is called for, place it up here. Counsel will take their places. When the ballots are placed on the bar, then they may examine them. Hand it up here, Mr. Clerk.

"The Court (to Mr. Seymour): You will conduct this case. That is the order of the court. Mr. Platnauer, he can stand here at your side; if he wants to make any suggestion to you—I am going to proceed with this case, conduct it in an orderly manner; I am going to proceed with it. I want the work of the court to be facilitated as much as possible. Mr. Platnauer can stand to your side and render you any assistance he desires.

"Mr. Seymour: With all respect to the court, I desire to enter a protest and exception to the order of the court. Mr. Platnauer is the leading counsel in the case. I submit he ought not to be deprived of participating in the case.

"The Court: He may participate in the case, but you are to conduct the case, Mr. Seymour. He may render such assistance to you as he sees fit.

"(At this point envelope No. 109 was placed on the bar by the judge.)

"Mr. Platnauer: There is no evidence the ballots are in the same condition.

"The Court: Mr. Platnauer, sit down. Mr. Seymour is to conduct this case.

"Mr. Platnauer: I am employed to represent—

"The Court: Mr. Platnauer, your conduct is unbecoming to the court. The court adjudges you guilty of contempt of court—

"Mr. Platnauer: I do not see, your honor, unbecoming in addressing the court on behalf of a client.

"The Court: I am not going to be bothered with you any longer.

"Mr. Platnauer: I presume you don't want me in the case?

"The Court: The court adjudges you guilty of contempt of court; guilty of a misdemeanor in that you have been guilty of disorderly, contemptuous, and insolent behavior during the sitting of this court in the immediate view and presence of the court, directly tending to interrupt the proceedings and impairing the respect due this court, and adjudges you to be committed to the county jail for the period of one day in punishment thereof.

"Mr. Platnauer: Might I ask which conduct—addressing the court?

"The Court: You refused to obey the order of the court. The court will direct the clerk to issue a commitment.

"Mr. Seymour: May it please the court, I desire to protest against this action. It deprives the respondent of the aid and advice of counsel, of his chief counsel, in the case. I submit at the time of the adjudging Mr. Platnauer guilty of contempt, he was proceeding to address the court in a respectful manner, in accordance with the respect due the court, within his right as an attorney for the respondent, and I submit—

"The Court: Let the clerk issue the commitment.

"Mr. Seymour: I submit that no contempt was committed by him. I submit, further, that the respondent has the right, the legal right, to the services and advice of his counsel, of Mr. Platnauer, in this case, and now to commit him to jail for the period of one day would be an invasion of the constitutional right of the respondent; is unwarranted, either in fact, or in law.

"The Court: The court directs the clerk to issue the commitment.

"Mr. Seymour: In view of the fact Mr. Platnauer has been committed to jail for a period of one day, I ask that further proceedings in this case be suspended until such time as he shall have served his sentence, in order that the respondent may have the advantage of his advice, of his presence, and his co-operation in this case.

"Mr. Meredith: We object to that.

"The Court: The request will be denied."

Thereafter the court caused to be entered in the proper records of the court a judgment in which it was recited that the petitioner insisted on arguing matters to the court after he was told by the court that the latter did not care to hear further argument and directed him to sit down; that petitioner refused to sit down, said he would not sit down and continued to argue to the court; that thereupon the court ordered the bailiff of said court to seat him; that petitioner resisted the bailiff, and made loud noises and confusion in open court by loud talking and tripping over chairs; that, after order was restored, the court notified petitioner that it would not hear from him further, but that any matter to be presented to the court on behalf of respondents (contestees) should be presented by Attorney A. M. Seymour; that petitioner continued to argue, and was again directed by the court to sit down, and he refused to do so, and stated that the court desired to prevent him from appearing in court. Following the facts thus briefly recited is the judgment.

[1, 2] The point first made by petitioner is that the oral judgment pronounced by the court is the final and, indeed, the only judgment adjudging him guilty of contempt, and that the purported judgment subsequently entered in the minutes of the court is not the judgment pronounced from the bench, and is wholly different therefrom. The argument following from this postulate is that this court, in passing upon the question whether the respondents exceeded their jurisdiction in adjudging the petitioner guilty of contempt, is required to look solely to the judgment pronounced orally from the bench, and to measure the authority of the respondents to pronounce such judgment accordingly; that the judgment so pronounced must be held to be void because it does not contain within its recitals a statement of the facts constituting the alleged contempt. It is manifestly true, as the petitioner contends, that the judgment entered is not the judgment rendered in the case unless it is the judgment which has been considered and ordered, or, in other words, unless it be supported in all vital essentials by the previous order of the court, or the judgment actually rendered and ordered in the first instance; the rendition being the judicial act and the entry merely ministerial. Freeman on Judgments, § 38, p. 43; Peck v. Curtis, 31 Cal. 207, 209; Genella v. Relyea, 32 Cal. 159; Los Angeles Bank v. Raynor, 61 Cal. 145, 147; Ex parte Raye, 63 Cal. 491; Estate of Cook, 77 Cal. 220, 226, 227, 17 Pac. 923, 19 Pac. 431, 1 L. R. A. 567, 11 Am. St. Rep. 267; Schuster v. Rader, 13 Colo. 329, 22 Pac. 505, 506. But, in view of the fact that the facts upon which the respondents acted in adjudging the petitioner guilty of contempt are certified in full to this court, and therefore are a part of the record before us, it is conceived to be unnecessary to consider that question here, since the facts speak for themselves, and, much more readily than the judgment itself, remove any difficulty which otherwise might be encountered in determining whether the respondents remained clearly within their jurisdictional sphere when they adjudged the petitioner guilty of contempt.

[3] That the facts upon which the court predicated its judgment against the petitioner may, upon certiorari, when they are duly certified to the court from which relief through that writ is sought, be reviewed and accepted as against the judgment of contempt, with which they do not agree, and upon them the proceeding in contempt be annulled and set aside, if such a course be thereby legally warranted, is well settled. Batchelder v. Moore, 42 Cal. 412; Los Angeles v. Young, 118 Cal. 295, 50 Pac. 534, 62 Am. St. Rep. 234; McClatchy v. Superior Court, 119 Cal. 413, 51 Pac. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691.

[4] This proposition is the essential corollary of the definitely settled rule that mere presumptions and intendments are not, as is true with respect to ordinary judgments or perhaps to proceedings upon habeas corpus, to be indulged in support of judgments in contempt. In Los Angeles v. Young, supra, it is said that, while "it may be set down as a universal rule that, as the writ of certiorari is to review a record of an inferior court, board, or tribunal, and to determine from the record whether such court * * * has exceeded its jurisdiction, evidence de hors the record, and contradicting it is never permitted," yet, "upon certiorari, if it becomes necessary for the court of review to be put in possession of the facts upon which the court acted, and which are not technically of record, it is competent for that court to require the lower court to certify such facts in its return to the writ, and this statement of facts would then be a part of the record." See, also, 2 Spelling on Extraordinary Relief, § 2020.

[5] The question, then, is: Do the facts show contemptuous conduct on the part of the petitioner? In this connection, it is first proper to state that, before this court in this proceeding, oral testimony was received for the purpose of showing the manner or personal attitude assumed by the petitioner when the court ordered the deputy sheriff to force him to his seat, and particularly when that official attempted to execute the court's order. Some of the witnesses testified that the petitioner violently resisted the attempt of the officer to force him to be seated, while others testified that the petitioner merely placed his hands in his pockets and planted his feet firmly upon the floor and adjusted his body in a position of rigidity, apparently for the purpose of enabling him the more readily to successfully resist being forced to his seat. But we may, with propriety, forego consideration of this testimony or the particular episode to which it relates; for, since the fact is that the court passed it without notice, it may be assumed that the court either condoned the conduct then of the petitioner or regarded it as insufficient to stand as a predicate for a judgment of contempt. In this connection, it is to be observed from the facts above set forth, that when, in the first instance, the court stated that he did not care to hear further from the petitioner upon the point then sub judice, the latter appears to have ceased addressing the court, and that nothing further occurred between the court and the petitioner until the court gratuitously and unnecessarily suggested to the petitioner that his position on the pending question was wholly different from his position on what the court conceived to be a precisely similar legal question arising in an election contest in the superior court of Sacramento county several years previously. Perhaps the matter would have ended peacefully but for this untimely and wholly irrelevant suggestion by the court. But, however that may be, the court, as above stated, did pass the incident unheeded and so treated it as closed, so far as taking direct action upon it was concerned, and took no action against the petitioner until he attempted, against the previous direction of the court, to take an active part in the trial. It follows, then, that the whole controversy here reduces itself down to the single and simple question whether it is within the lawful power of a court to deny and foreclose the right of a regularly licensed attorney, regularly employed by a litigant to represent him in the trial of a case, to participate in such trial, even though such attorney might at some time in the progress of the trial of the cause have been guilty of contumacious conduct, and to punish him as for contempt of court if he attempts actively to represent his client in the trial.

The facts, briefly recapitulated, are: The trial of the contest was immediately resumed after the close of the incident above referred to, court and counsel repaired to the clerk's office to inspect the vault in which the ballots were kept by the county clerk, and, after such inspection, court and counsel returned to the courtroom. At this time the court announced that Mr. Seymour, of counsel for contestee, would be required to conduct the trial on behalf of the latter and that the petitioner would be permitted to take no part therein, except in so far as he might desire or conceive it necessary to advise with his associate, Mr. Seymour. And when the petitioner, in a respectful manner, interposed an objection to the consideration of one of the ballots, the court interrupted, saying: "Mr. Platnauer, sit down. Mr. Seymour is to conduct this case," whereupon the petitioner was about to say that he was employed to represent the contestee, when the court adjudged him guilty of contempt. It is thus to be observed that, as above stated, the facts show, if the commitment does not, that the gist of the offending by the petitioner, and for which specific conduct the court adjudged him guilty of contempt, was in attempting to take part in the trial of the pending cause in behalf of his client.

[6] Every court has the right to protect its dignity by compelling litigants and attorneys appearing before it to conduct themselves with decorum and in a respectful manner and the proceedings of a trial in an orderly way. With this right necessarily attends the power to coerce decorum and decent conduct on the part of the parties and their counsel, and to compel them to demean themselves in a manner befitting the dignity of courts of justice. And the power should, on all proper occasions, be unsparingly exercised and applied, to the end that the courts, which represent in the highest form the majesty of the law, shall be accorded that respect to which the sacredness of their functions and their high dignity entitle them.

[7] The members of the legal profession should, above all other members of society, be the first to uphold the dignity of judicial tribunals and to protect them against falling into that disrepute to which they would be hastened if proceedings before them were conducted without order or decorum or the respect due the ministers of the law for the law's sake. Indeed, such is among the first and most important of the obligations to which the lawyer under his oath solemnly subscribes when he is granted the right to practice his profession, and to him, no less than to the magistrate, is looked for the maintenance and preservation at all times of the honor, integrity, and dignity of the courts of which his right to practice therein makes him an officer. If he fails in his duty in this regard, he falls short of measuring up to the calls of his high and honorable profession, and the requirements of the obligations of his oath of office. Not only this, but thus he impairs the dignity of the profession, and himself loses that respect and that confidence of the public which are among the most valuable and fruitful of his assets as a practicing lawyer. And even if it happens that, for some reason wholly personal to himself, he dislikes the presiding judge as an individual, he is no less in duty and honor bound to be uniformly respectful to the court and to do no act that will impair or degrade its honor and dignity in the estimation of the public. The attorney who does not understand this to be his duty, or, understanding it, fails to practice it, should surrender his license and so relinquish his granted right further to pursue the profession—a profession whose immutable and exalted and, indeed, well-understood ideals he promised, as one of the conditions upon which he was admitted into it, to exemplify in all his professional engagements.

[8] But no court, in this state at least, has the right or possesses the lawful power of arbitrarily or capriciously forcing a licensed attorney, regularly employed to represent a litigant in the trial of a case, to retire from active participation in such trial. Such judicial action cannot be justified on the ground that it is intended to operate as a punishment for contumacious conduct on the part of the attorney. No such power either inheres in our courts or exists by virtue of legislative fiat. If it did, a litigant could be arbitrarily deprived of the right to the services of an attorney of his own choosing. Besides, such power in any court would, when exercised, have the effect of qualifying or limiting the rights which a citizen acquires by virtue of his license to practice law. In the present case, if the petitioner had been the lone legal representative of the contestee, the latter, under the order of the court denying the petitioner the right to take an active part in the trial, would have been compelled to employ other counsel, with the inconvenience and trouble incident thereto, or have proceeded with the trial unaided by the skill of a lawyer.

[9] A lawyer, when engaged in the trial of a case, is not only vested with the right, but, under his oath as such officer of the court, is charged with the duty of safeguarding the interests of his client in the trial of an issue involving such interests. For this purpose, in a trial, it is his sworn duty, when the cause requires it, to offer testimony in behalf of his client or in support of his case in accordance with his theory of the case, to object to testimony offered by his adversary, to interrogate witnesses, and to present and argue to the court his objections or points touching the legal propriety or impropriety of the testimony or of particular questions propounded to the witnesses.

[10] If, in discharging this duty, he happens to be persistent or vehement, or both, in the presentation of his points, he is still, nevertheless, within his legitimate rights as an attorney, so long as his language is not offensive or in contravention of the common rules of decorum and propriety. As well may be expected in forensic polemics, he cannot always be right, and may wholly be wrong in his position upon the legal question under argument and to the mind of the court so plainly wrong that the latter may conceive that it requires no enlightenment from the argument of counsel. But, whether right or wrong, he has the right to an opportunity to present his theory of the case on any occasion where the exigency of the pending point in his judgment requires or justifies it.

[11, 12] It does not appear from the facts as they are here disclosed that the petitioner at any time addressed the court in disrespectful language. On the contrary, he appears to have proceeded with full consciousness of the duty which an attorney owes to a court, and, when adjudged guilty of contempt, had merely interposed a suggestion in respectful language as to the absence of a showing that the ballots were in the same condition in which they had been received. He was within his rights as an attorney when making this suggestion and in objecting to their consideration until such a showing had been made, even though the objection might have been legally untenable and, as a matter of fact, without foundation, which latter proposition was probably true. But the court appears to have been relentlessly insistent on compliance with its order that the petitioner should not take any active part in the trial of the case or under any circumstances address the court; and, as declared, it was alone the persistency of the petitioner to be heard in behalf of his client, of whom he was the senior counsel, which brought forth the judgment and commitment for contempt. In other words, the alleged contemptuous conduct on the part of the petitioner appears to have consisted entirely in the petitioner's attempt to take part in the pending proceedings after the court had ordered that he should not further participate therein. As above indicated, our conclusion is that in so acting the court transcended its lawful authority, and that the order was wholly beyond the jurisdiction of the court and is, therefore, void.

It follows that the judgment adjudging the petitioner guilty of contempt must be annulled, set aside and vacated; and it is so ordered.

(Civ. 1798.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 30, 1916.)

1. STIPULATIONS ⚷18(4)—EFFECT—MATTERS CONCLUDED—FACTS IN ISSUE.

In an action on a fire policy, where it was stipulated that plaintiff's vendor of the property and assignor of the policy owned the property when the policy was issued, evidence tending to show that one W. E. B., the son of the W. E. B. who owned the property, had signed the deed to plaintiff, was properly excluded; the matter being no longer an issue in the case.

The approval by a fire insurance company through its general agent of the transfer of a policy to the buyer of the property with full knowledge of the ownership of the property by the vendor, and of the vendor's outstanding contract of sale with a third person at the time of the deed and assignment to the assignee of the policy, amounted to a waiver of those conditions of the policy, respecting the title to the property, which required sole ownership in the insured.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by L. B. Sowell against the London Assurance Corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

H. A. Thornton, of San Francisco, for appellant. Gallaher & Aten, of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment and order denying a new trial in an action to recover upon an insurance policy, in which action the plaintiff prevailed.

The complaint in the case alleged that one W. E. Beeson was the owner of the land and buildings insured at the time of the issuance of the policy thereon, and that subsequently thereto said W. E. Beeson sold, assigned, transferred, and set over to the plaintiff all of his interest in the property, and that said W. E. Beeson shortly after said transfer also assigned and transferred to plaintiff all of his interest in and to said policy of insurance, with the consent of the said defendant by its agent indorsed on said policy; that thereafter the said buildings were destroyed by fire. The answer of the defendant denied that at any time said W. E. Beeson was the owner of the lands, premises, and buildings mentioned in the complaint, but alleged that at the time of the issuance of the policy of insurance the said W. E. Beeson represented himself so to be. The defendant also denied the alleged purchase of the said lands and premises from the said W. E. Beeson, for want of information and belief, and further denied upon the same ground that the said W. E. Beeson sold or transferred the said policy of insurance to the plaintiff, or that the defendant through its agent consented to the same. The answer also set up as an affirmative defense the averment that the interest of said W. E. Beeson in the insured property was not such an unconditional and sole ownership thereof as the terms of the policy required.

Upon the trial of the cause it appeared that W. E. Beeson, subsequent to the issuance to him of the policy of insurance, had made a contract of sale of the premises to a party by the name of Beringer, who had gone into possession thereunder and was in such possession of the property at the time of its transfer by said W. E. Beeson to the plaintiff. After the introduction of this proof it was stipulated in open court between the counsel for the respective parties that:

> "There was no dispute as to the ownership of the property except that after the insurance policy was issued a certain contract of sale was made by W. E. Beeson to a party by the name of Beringer, and that that change in the title, if it was a change in the title, constituted the essence or gist of the defense."

This stipulation was agreed to by counsel for the defendant with the additional suggestion that the contract of sale made with Beringer was prior to the conveyance to the plaintiff of the premises and assignment of the policy.

Upon the conclusion of the plaintiff's case a motion for nonsuit was made on behalf of the defendant upon several grounds, upon the argument of which it was again stipulated "that W. E. Beeson was the owner of the property at the time the policy was issued." The motion for a nonsuit was then denied.

[1] If there is anything which seems perfectly plain from the foregoing statement of facts as shown by the record, it is that the ownership of the property by the Mr. W. E. Beeson who was alleged in the complaint to be its owner at the time of the issuance of the policy of insurance, and who thereafter made the contract of sale to Beringer and the transfer of the property and assignment of the policy to the plaintiff herein, was stipulated and agreed to by both sides at the trial and prior to the close of the plaintiff's case, and that thereby the ownership of the said W. E. Beeson, and his identity as such owner and transferor of the property and policy of insurance, ceased to be an issue in the case. Notwithstanding this state of the record the defendant, after its motion for nonsuit had been denied, undertook to offer some evidence tending to show that a certain W. E. Beeson, who was the son of the W. E. Beeson who owned the property, had signed the deed to the plaintiff. Objection was made to the introduction of any such evidence upon the ground that there was no such evidence in the case in view of the stipulation as to the title to the property. The remarks of the court in ruling upon this matter—which ruling the appellant assigns as error—are somewhat involved and obscure; but it seems sufficiently plain that the court intended to rule out the evidence upon the ground that the matter was no longer an issue in the case, and this appears more certain when we turn to the findings of the court, which are in accord with the stipulation of the parties as to the identity of the W. E.

Beeson who was the owner of the property and to whom the policy was issued, and who made the various agreements and transfers and assignments shown in the evidence. We find no error, therefore, in the rulings and findings of the court as to the ownership of the property, and transfer thereof by the same person who was alleged in the complaint to have acted as such owner and transferor thereof and assignor of the policy of insurance upon which this action is brought.

[2] The other point insisted upon by the appellant is that the evidence in the case shows that at the time of the transfer of the property and assignment of the policy by W. E. Beeson to the plaintiff herein he was not the sole owner of the property, by virtue of the fact of his outstanding contract of sale to Beringer, which fact not being noted upon the policy by the defendant through its authorized agent at the time of such assignment thereof, renders the policy void, and hence the judgment erroneous. The evidence in the case, however, shows that the facts regarding the outstanding contract with Beringer, and the possession by the latter of the premises thereunder, were fully known to C. P. Walton, the agent of the defendant who had issued the insurance policy and who indorsed upon the same the approval of the transfer thereof. The finding of the court is that said C. P. Walton was the general agent of the defendant for the purpose of soliciting insurance, writing and delivering policies, and making indorsements on and transferring interests in such policies, and the evident conclusion of the trial court from these findings is that said C. P. Walton, by his indorsed approval of the transfer of the policy from the person originally insured to the plaintiff, with full knowledge of the state of the title to the property, waived on behalf of the defendant the terms of the policy which would render such transfer void when the state of the title is not made to appear on the face of the policy or the indorsement thereon. We are of the opinion that the finding of the court as to the authority of said Walton as a general agent of the defendant is sustained by the proofs in the case, and that his full knowledge of the ownership of the property by Beeson and of his outstanding contract of sale with Beringer at the time of the deed and assignment to plaintiff, was sufficiently shown. This being so, we are satisfied that as a matter of law the approval by the defendant of the transfer of the policy to the plaintiff, made by its general agent under the circumstances above set forth, amounted to a waiver of those conditions of the policy respecting the title to the property which otherwise would have rendered the assignment void. Raulet v. Northwestern National Ins. Co., 157 Cal. 213, 107 Pac. 292; Bennett v. Union Central Life Ins. Co., 203 Ill. 439, 67 N. E. 971; Phenix Insurance Co. v. Grove, 215 Ill. 299, 74 N. E. 141, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1. We are therefore of the opinion that the appellant's contention in this respect is also without substantial merit.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

ELLIS v. FUNK et al. (Civ. 1994.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 28, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 26, 1917.)

1. Gifts 🔑54—Gifts Causa Mortis—What Constitutes.

Decedent's transfer of personal property by bill of sale to defendant who had been serving him for a period of two years and caring for his property is not, decedent having declared that he desired defendant to have the property in compensation for his services, a gift causa mortis.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gifts, Cent. Dig. §§ 119–121.]

2. Fraudulent Conveyances 🔑135 — Transfer of Possession—Statute.

Where defendant who received a bill of sale for personal property was already in possession of the property as the transferor's agent, Civ. Code, § 3440, declaring that transfers of property not accompanied by immediate delivery, etc., are deemed fraudulent, has no application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 427.]

3. Wills 🔑88(1)—Validity—Testamentary Disposition—Deed.

Decedent, an aged man, while suffering from his last illness conveyed his lands to defendants who agreed to discharge decedent's debts and thereafter undertook to carry out his wishes with respect to making payments to other relatives. After his death defendants acknowledged that the conveyance of the land to them was in consideration of their complying with decedent's wishes. Held, that the transfer could not be impeached on the ground that it was in effect a testamentary disposition not in accordance with the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Harvey Denis Ellis against William H. Funk and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Flint, Gray & Barker and Wheaton A. Gray, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. G. A. Skinner, of Long Beach, and Jones & Weller, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon the granting of defendants' motion for a nonsuit made at the close of plaintiff's evidence.

Plaintiff is an heir of one George W. Ellis, deceased, and brought this action on behalf of himself and a number of coheirs to have certain transfers of real and personal property made by Ellis to defendants, who were nephews of deceased, set aside and annulled. Shortly after the death of George W. Ellis, defendant Funk wrote a letter to the plaintiff, wherein he stated:

> "I will give you a statement of how Uncle George left his affairs. He left 5 acres of land on the west slope of Signal Hill with about 200 lemon trees on it. He left no will, but deeded his property to me and John H. Ellis of Riverside, and also gave us a bill of sale for all his personal property, and we have to settle all his indebtedness, which will be between $3,000 and $4,000. He gave me $1,000 and the personal, which amounted to $250, for what time I was with him, and requested us to give Nana Sanders $500, and to Mabel Coulter Warren $500, and to Ewena Belshaw $200, and to Lizzie, my wife, $500; and what was left John Ellis and me were to divide equal between us. Those are all the bequests he made."

In addition to any weight or inference to be drawn from this statement, the evidence construed most strongly in favor of plaintiff tends to prove that 10 days before the death of Ellis, who was a man over 71 years of age, feeble, and then suffering from the illness from which he died, and being averse to having his estate administered by the probate court, he, on November 20, 1911, executed a grant deed, absolute in form, conveying to defendants all his real estate, and 5 days later gave to one or both of them a bill of sale to all his personal property, thus divesting himself of all worldly possessions. That these transfers were made in contemplation of the apprehended near approach of death admits of little doubt.

[1, 2] As to the personal property, the character of which is not made to appear, appellant insists that the purported transfer thereof was in the nature of a gift causa mortis, but that as such it must fail of its purpose for the reason that there was no actual delivery of the possession of the thing given made by the donor to the donee, nor any means of getting possession and enjoyment thereof (Knight v. Tripp, 121 Cal. 679, 54 Pac. 267); and while it appears that the personal property was made the subject of a bill of sale executed by deceased to defendants, it is insisted that gifts causa mortis cannot be effected by formal instruments of conveyance or assignment, but "are manifested by and take their effect from delivery." McGrath v. Reynolds, 116 Mass. 566. Conceding appellant's contention as to the essential elements of a gift causa mortis, it appears that the personal property was not the subject of nor intended to be a gift. The bill of sale was not offered in evidence, and some uncertainty exists as to whether it was executed to William H. Funk alone or to him and John Harvey Ellis, his codefendant, jointly. However this may be, it does appear without contradiction that Funk had for a period of two years been serving his Uncle George in caring for him and his property, and was told by the latter that he wanted to compensate him for his labor, and would give him a bill of sale of the personal property. The transfer of the personal property, consisting, as stated by Funk, of "what stuff was there—that is, the farming horses and stuff, or the horse; he only had one horse"—was made for a valuable consideration, to wit, in payment of an acknowledged indebtedness due to defendant Funk for services rendered. Prior to this transfer, we may fairly infer from the physical condition of the vendor that Funk, who, prior to the execution of the bill of sale, had charge of his affairs, was in possession of this personal property as his agent. Thereafter and upon the delivery of the bill of sale, which was on November 25, 1911, his possession thereof was that of owner, rather than agent. This was sufficient to take the case without the provision of section 3440, Civil Code, under which certain transfers of personal property, unaccompanied by an immediate delivery, are deemed fraudulent. In our opinion, the evidence shows a valid sale and transfer of title absolute to the personal property involved in the litigation.

[3, 4] With regard to the transfer of the real estate, it appears from the meager evidence offered that the estate of the grantor's deceased wife held a one-half interest in the land, consisting of 5 acres, upon which 200 lemon trees were growing, so conveyed to defendants, which estate George W. Ellis as surviving spouse would inherit subject to the payment of certain notes which he and his deceased wife had signed, one of which was secured by mortgage upon the land. The chief evidence as to what transpired in connection with the transaction is that given by defendants. From this it appears that

George W. Ellis had prior to the execution of the deed, on several occasions, said to defendants that he wanted them to have the property; that he recognized the claims against the estate therein of his deceased wife would have to be paid in order to clear the property of the lien thereof, and also recognized his liability upon other outstanding notes for small amounts—as to all of which he expressed the wish that defendants pay the same. And they told him they "would carry out his wishes—whatever he wanted done they would do." At the request of deceased, Mr. Bixby prepared the deed, and he, with defendants, was present when it was executed. At this time, according to the testimony of one witness, Mrs. Belshaw, Mr. Bixby, in reply to something said by the grantor to defendants, stated, "You will have to give them a straight deed and trust to their honor to do what you want them to do." At the time of the execution of the deed no definite instructions had been given by the grantor as to what he wanted them to do, but the fair inference is that in conveying the property he relied upon their promises to carry out and comply with the wishes he had in mind, viz. the payment of certain sums of money to third parties, which constituted the consideration for the conveyance to them. Five days after the execution of the deed, to wit, on November 25, 1911, the bill of sale was executed, and on the next day the grantor told defendant Funk, to whom he had delivered the bill of sale, that he wanted Nana Sanders, Mabel Warren Coulter, and the wife of Funk to have $500 each, and Ewena Belshaw $200, making a total of $1,700. At this time Funk made a memorandum of what his uncle had said, and later communicated the same to his codefendant. After the death of George W. Ellis both defendants, in effect, made statements acknowledging that their uncle had conveyed the land to them in consideration of their complying with his wishes, which, as we have seen, was to pay to third parties to whom he owed no legal obligation the sum of $1,700. This promise—conceding that the promise to pay his debts was within the statute of frauds for the reason that it was not evidenced by writing—constituted a sufficient consideration for the transfer of the land to defendants by deed absolute in form. No creditor of deceased is attacking the transfer. No claim is made that the grantor was at the time mentally incompetent, or that the conveyance was obtained by fraud or duress. Neither, assuming such fact to be material, is there anything in the record indicating that defendants' promises were not be performed until after the grantor's death. Hence the transaction cannot be construed as a testamentary disposition of the property belonging to the grantor's estate.

Appellant relies upon the case of Knight v. Tripp, 121 Cal. 674, 54 Pac. 267, and that of Kimball v. Tripp, 136 Cal. 631, 69 Pac. 428. In those cases it appears that the property was transferred to defendant Tripp to be by him disposed of in accordance with a memorandum only in the event of the grantor's death; and it was there held that the transfer of the property constituted gifts causa mortis, but since no delivery thereof was had prior to the donor's death, they failed of their purpose. In the opinion filed in the case of Knight v. Tripp, the court, in reference to an instrument containing the donor's instructions, says:

> "By this memorandum the disposition of the property is limited to the event of death. * * * It is very clear, therefore, that it was not intended by Mrs. Cook to make a present, irrevocable gift of the property to him (Tripp), and that she did not intend that he should in any event have all of the property for himself."

In our opinion, these cases are to be distinguished from the case at bar, since in the former no promise, as here made by defendants, was made by Tripp to pay the amounts specified. Moreover, in those cases the payment was in express terms made contingent upon the death of the grantor.

Conceding that in a judgment upon nonsuit the evidence must be construed most strongly in favor of the plaintiff, we are nevertheless constrained to hold, upon a more careful consideration of the record than that given on the former hearing, that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

SMITH v. HIRST et al. (Civ. 1865.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Jan. 12, 1917. On Rehearing, Feb. 9, 1917.)

1. Bills and Notes 🔑416 — Presentment for Payment—Time.

The maker or holder of a note cannot change the time of day at which it shall be payable, and at which its maker shall be in default for nonpayment by merely delivering it to a bank for collection, nor can the time when notice of dishonor may be given be thus advanced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1164–1172, 1174–1177.]

2. Bills and Notes 🔑419—Notice of Dishonor—Verbal Notice.

A mere verbal statement made in the course of the afternoon of the day of maturity of a note to the effect that it had not been paid would be insufficient notice of dishonor.

3. Bills and Notes 🔑416 — Notice of Dishonor—Time.

Such notice was also premature.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by E. G. L. Smith against C. H. Hirst and N. A. Dorn. Judgment for defendant Dorn, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed on petition for rehearing, opinion amended, and petition denied.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for appellant. N. A. Dorn, F. A. Dorn, and C. D. Dorn, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant N. A. Dorn after his demurrer to the third amended complaint of the plaintiff had been sustained, the latter declining to further amend his pleading.

The facts of the case are these: On March 1, 1912, the defendant C. H. Hirst made, executed, and delivered to one L. L. Long his promissory note for the sum of $1,500, payable one year after date, of which said note the defendant N. A. Dorn was the indorser. Before the maturity of said note the maker thereof absconded and departed from the state of California, and had neither a residence nor place of business therein at the time said note fell due. Prior to the maturity of the note said L. L. Long transferred and delivered the same to the plaintiff herein, who, also prior to the date of its maturity, delivered said note to the Crocker National Bank of San Francisco for collection. The first day of March, 1913, the date of the maturity of said note fell on Saturday. At about the hour of 4 o'clock of said day, said note not having been paid, the said bank directed one Alice Spencer, a notary public, to give notice of dishonor of said note to said defendant Dorn, and at about 4:30 o'clock of said day said Alice Spencer personally and orally notified said Dorn that the said C. H. Hirst had absconded and departed from the state of California and was then absent from said state, and that said note had not been presented to C. H. Hirst for payment and had not been paid by him. On the morning of March 3, 1913, said Alice Spencer inclosed in an envelope a written notice signed by her, to the effect that said note had not been paid, and addressed and mailed the same to the defendant Dorn at his office address in the city of San Francisco, which notice said Dorn received at his said office address on the morning of March 4, 1913. He did not pay the note, and this action was commenced to recover upon the same. The judgment of the trial court in favor of said defendant was predicated upon the foregoing facts.

The sole question presented for decision upon this appeal is as to whether or not the said defendant Dorn had due notice of the dishonor of the note in question so as to bind him as its indorser. The appellant seems to concede that the written notice from the notary public mailed to said Dorn at his office on March 3, 1913, and received by him on the morning of the following day, to the effect that the note had not been paid, was insufficient to bind him as an indorser thereon for the reason, apparently, that it was not addressed to the indorser at his place of residence as the Code requires (Civ. Code, § 3144); and appellant therefore rests his whole case and argument upon the contention that the oral notification that the maker of the note had absconded and that the note had not been paid, given to said Dorn at about the hour of 4:30 o'clock on the day on which the note fell due, constituted a sufficient notice of dishonor. The respondent, however, insists that notice of dishonor must be in writing; but that whether or not such be the case, this notice was premature because given before the time arrived when the note could be dishonored by the nonpayment thereof, viz. the close of the day on which it fell due. The appellant concedes that this contention might be sound if the note had remained in the hands of the plaintiff, but claims that the respondent cannot avail himself of it because the note was delivered to a bank for collection the business hours of which close at 3 o'clock p. m. of business days except that on Saturday they close at 12 o'clock noon.

[1-3] We cannot give our adherence to a rule that the maker or holder of a note can change the time of day at which it shall be payable and at which its maker shall be in default for the nonpayment thereof, by merely delivering it to a bank for collection; nor that the time when notice of its dishonor may be given can be thus advanced. Aside from this, however, it seems quite clear from a reading of sections 3141 to 3145, inclusive, of the Civil Code that notice of dishonor of negotiable instruments must be in writing; and that a mere verbal statement made in the course of the afternoon of the day of maturity of the note to the effect that it had not been paid would be an insufficient notice of dishonor. Besides, such a notice, irrespective of its infirmities in point of form and substance, would be premature. There were several hours still remaining of that day which the maker of said note had within which to pay the same, and the fact as to whether or not he had absconded or departed from the state, or had neither residence nor place of business in it, could not operate to either enlarge or lessen the rights and liabilities of the indorser (Roper v. Gould, 22 Cal. App. 114, 133 Pac. 622; Civ. Code, 3141); and the fact that the maker of the note had absconded or was absent from the state, or had neither residence nor place of business in it, while it might excuse presentment to him for payment, would not excuse the holder of the note from giving notice of dishonor to its indorser (Applegarth v. Abbott, 64 Cal. 459, 2 Pac. 43).

The case of California National Bank v. Weldon, 14 Cal. App. 765, 113 Pac. 334, is clearly distinguishable as to its facts from the case at bar; and whatever is said therein with reference to notice of dishonor must be limited in its application to the facts of that particular case, and cannot be held as sustaining the doctrine that the notice of dishonor which is required to be given to the indorser of a promissory note is excused by an excusable failure to present the note for payment to the maker except in the cases specified in sections 3155, 3156, and 3157 of the Civil Code.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Our attention having for the first time been called upon petition for a rehearing to the case of Pierce v. Schaden, 55 Cal. 406, wherein it was held that sections 3141 to 3145 of the Civil Code did not operate to change the common-law rule allowing notices of dishonor to be given verbally, our opinion heretofore filed is modified by striking therefrom the following words: "It seems quite clear from a reading of sections 3141 to 3145, inclusive, of the Civil Code, that notice of dishonor of negotiable instruments must be in writing"—the foregoing paragraph being unnecessary to the decision of the case. The opinion of the court heretofore filed being thus amended, the petition for a rehearing will be denied.

SAWYER v. McROSKEY. (Civ. 1859.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Jan. 10, 1917.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹979(4)—NEW TRIAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The discretion of the trial court in granting a new trial on conflicting evidence is absolute, and will not be interfered with on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3872.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by F. W. Sawyer against L. H. McRoskey. From an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. W. Sawyer, of San Francisco, for appellant. F. H. Dam, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon: This was an action for the purchase price of 51 shares of a certain corporation alleged to have been sold by the plaintiff to the defendant. The defense was that there was no delivery, and that there was no sale, and that if there had been a sale, the sale was rescinded. Upon the trial of the case the plaintiff's evidence tended to show that there had been a delivery of the stock and a subsequent refusal to pay for the same. Upon behalf of the defendant there was some evidence tending to show that there had been no delivery. The trial court made its findings in favor of the plaintiff, finding that there had been a delivery and a completed sale. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendant based upon all the statutory grounds, including the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, which motion was granted. The appeal is from the order granting such motion, and in its consideration of course all of the grounds of the motion are involved in order to test the correctness of the order. Do you concede, Mr. Sawyer, that there was evidence adduced upon the trial in the court below sufficient to have supported a finding in favor of the defendant?

Mr. Sawyer (plaintiff in person): No.

Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon: The evidence is conflicting?

Mr. Sawyer: I hardly think so. The evidence shows by the defendant's own testimony—by Mr. Dam's testimony in the matter—that there was a delivery of the stock.

Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon: Conditional?

Mr. Sawyer: Well, that may be.

Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon: That creates a conflict, does it not?

Mr. Sawyer: Is it a substantial conflict in the face of an agreement to pay $500 and the defendant repudiated his contract? The stock was actually delivered to Mr. Dam, and he was to pay the $500 the next morning. Mr. Sawyer went to Mr. Dam's office for the $500, and immediately the contract was repudiated. A party who repudiates his contract by refusing to pay cannot rescind.

Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon: But Mr. Dam was not the purchaser; he was merely the attorney for the purchaser; and his testimony was to the effect that the stock was delivered to him conditionally and not absolutely.

Mr. Sawyer: That is the effect of his testimony, but I think that does not make a substantial conflict in the testimony.

Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon: If there was a conditional delivery to Mr. Dam, who was not the purchaser, then there was no absolute delivery as you allege.

Mr. Sawyer: He was the agent for the purchaser.

Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon: If the delivery was conditional it was not absolute.

Mr. Sawyer: Of course, if that is the view your honors take about that matter, I of course am out on that theory, but I think there was not a substantial conflict.

Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon: Wasn't there some evidence in the record that the plaintiff, subsequent to the alleged sale and delivery involved here, had commenced an action to restrain the sale of that stock for the nonpayment of an assessment, and in effect averred in the allegations of the complaint in that action that he was still the owner of the stock?

Mr. Sawyer: Yes, but also qualified with a statement in the complaint that the action was commenced to protect the stock against an illegal assessment.

Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon: That was evidence against the plaintiff tending to show that he was still the owner of the stock, and negatived the claim of a sale and delivery as alleged in the complaint in this action. That was some evidence which would in a measure, have supported a finding in favor of the defendant had the court so found in the first instance.

Mr. Sawyer: That is sufficient evidence in your opinion to make a conflict?

Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon: Not that alone, but we think that all of the evidence adduced upon the whole case created a substantial conflict; and the rule is, wherever there is a conflict in the evidence, and a finding might be rightfully made either way, and the lower court grants a new trial in general terms—as it did in this case—its discretion is absolute, and cannot be interfered with by this court. Wendling, etc., v. Glenwood, etc., 153 Cal. 411, 416, 95 Pac. 1029.

Mr. Sawyer: That is the only question, as to whether there was a substantial conflict. You have stated the facts better than I could, and whether there was a substantial conflict is entirely with your honors.

Mr. Presiding Justice LENNON (Mr. Justice KERRIGAN and Mr. Justice RICHARDS concurring): We are satisfied that the case is as we have stated it generally, that there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, and therefore the discretion of the trial court in granting a new trial, grounded in part upon the insufficiency of the evidence, cannot be disturbed by this court. For that reason the order appealed from is affirmed. It is further ordered that the statement of the case, the views of counsel, and the conclusion of the court as expressed upon the oral argument of the case, be transcribed by the stenographic reporter, and that said transcription be filed as the opinion of the court.

WAGNER v. CARDINET FOUNTAIN BRUSH CO. et al. (Civ. 1893.)

Appeal and Error ⟹46 — Amount Involved—Statute.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 52, limiting the jurisdiction of the Appellate Court to cases where the demand amounts to $300, where judgment against defendant on his liability as a stockholder was for less than $300, and the demand in the complaint as against him was for less than $300, the Appellate Court had no jurisdiction of plaintiff's appeal from an order setting aside judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 198–201.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by G. Wagner against the Cardinet Fountain Brush Company, a corporation, Niels Lund, and others. Judgment was taken against Lund by default, and he moved that it be set aside. The motion was denied, and Lund made another motion to set aside satisfaction of the judgment, procured by plaintiff by proceedings against other defendants, and the judgment. From an order granting the motion as to the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Hiram E. Casey, of San Francisco, for appellant. L. D. Manning and L. C. Fish, both of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. In this action the plaintiff sued the Cardinet Fountain Brush Company to recover upon a promissory note given by that corporation, and included as defendants the names of a number of persons who, it was alleged, were stockholders of the corporation in certain amounts, giving at the same time the total subscribed capital stock of the corporation, and stating in the complaint, in so far as it referred to them, the amount that was due from each upon his stockholder's liability for this debt. The total amount of the debt was about $3,000, and the stockholder's liability of Niels Lund, the respondent, was figured out in the complaint at about $111. Lund did not appear, and a judgment was taken against him for the said amount of his stockholder's liability, with some added interest. Learning of the judgment apparently, Lund then appeared, and moved the court to set aside the judgment upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action for the reason that, as far as he was concerned, the action was brought to recover a less amount than $300. Before that motion could be brought on to hearing it appears that the plaintiff procured a satisfaction of the judgment by proceedings against some other defendants, so that when the motion did come on to be heard, it appeared that the judgment had been satisfied, whereupon the court denied that motion. Thereupon defendant Lund made another motion before the court to set aside the satisfaction and the judgment. The court granted the motion as to the judgment, whereupon the plaintiff appeals from that order.

At the threshold the respondent calls attention to the fact that since this judgment against him was for less than the sum of $300, and since the demand in the complaint for that judgment was for less than $300, this court has no jurisdiction of the appeal, because the jurisdiction of this court is limited to cases where the demand amounts to $300 (Code Civ. Proc. § 52); and the respondent cites as upholding his contention the case of Gorton v. Ferdinando, 64 Cal. 11, 27 Pac. 941.

We are of the opinion that this court has no jurisdiction of the appeal; and, since that question stands upon the threshold of the matter, it would be idle to go further into the merits of the case. The appeal is therefore dismissed.

SUNSET LUMBER CO. v. DUNLAP et ux. (Civ. 1912.)

COURTS 🔑121(1)—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT—CALIFORNIA SUPERIOR COURT.

In an action for $310.10, the balance due on the sum of $506.10 for goods sold, alleging that $250 had been paid on account, where the answer denied that $310.10 was due, and there was a judgment for plaintiff for the sum demanded, the issue before the superior court involved $300 or more, and hence was within its jurisdiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Donahue, Judge.

Action by the Sunset Lumber Company against George T. Dunlap and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Sterling Carr, of San Francisco, and P. M. Bruner, of Oakland, for appellants. C. L. Colvin, of Oakland, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. The plaintiff in this case commenced an action for the sum of $310.10, which the complaint alleged was the balance due of the sum of $506.10 alleged to be the reasonable value of goods sold to the defendants. The complaint, however, incidentally alleged that the sum of $250 had been paid on account of the $506.10, followed by the above-mentioned allegation that there was a balance of $310.10 due and unpaid. The answer of one of the defendants denied that there was any amount due, and the other denied that the sum of $310.10 was due. The case came on for trial upon the issues thus raised. The defendants did not appear, and judgment went for the plaintiff for the amount demanded. The appeal is taken from the judgment, and the point is made that the trial court did not have jurisdiction of the action because the demand was for less than $300.

While the allegations of the complaint taken in conjunction with the prayer for judgment created some ambiguity and uncertainty, the issue raised by the answer of one of the defendants and attempted to be raised by the other was as to whether the sum of $310.10, the amount for which judgment was prayed, was due and owing. No demurrer was interposed to the complaint on the ground of uncertainty, and the issue before the court as above stated involved an amount within the jurisdiction of the court.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

Ex parte AKI. (Cr. 375.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 9, 1917.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS 🔑48—LICENSES—REVENUE MEASURE.

As a revenue measure a license can only be imposed upon the business of selling intoxicating liquors, etc., and a single sale does not constitute the carrying on of such business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 49.]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS 🔑6—REGULATION—POLICE POWER.

The sale of spirituous liquors is a matter to be regulated under the police powers of the state.

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS 🔑146(1) — LICENSE—PENALTY—ORDINANCE.

The city of Sacramento, as to which there are no general laws limiting the power of the council to make stringent or even prohibitive regulations as to the sale of intoxicating liquors, has the power to regulate, including the power to determine whether the privilege of selling intoxicating liquors may be exercised and the requirements of the persons who may be granted the privilege of making sales, and under an ordinance making it unlawful to sell or dispose of intoxicating liquors without having obtained a license, under penalty, without providing for the license of single sales of liquors, and providing for a license fee from which city derived revenue, one might be convicted of a single illegal sale without having first obtained a license.

Application by S. Aki for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied, and petitioner remanded.

John J. Bauer and J. V. Hart, both of Sacramento, for petitioner. H. B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., and Stephen Otis, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, Judge pro tem. On the 6th day of March, 1916, the petitioner was convicted in the police court of the city of Sacramento of illegally selling intoxicating liquors. The gravamen of the offense consists in having sold liquors without first having obtained a license therefor, and consisted, so far as the record shows, of a single sale.

It is contended on the part of the petitioner that the ordinance under which the petitioner was convicted is a revenue measure, and therefore the city has no power to impose a license upon a single sale. The title of the ordinance involved is as follows:

> "An ordinance regulating the sale of wines, spirituous and malt liquors; prescribing a license therefor, regulating the management and conduct of places where such liquors are sold, furnished or given away, and fixing a penalty for the violation of this ordinance."

Section 1 provides:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person to keep a saloon, bar, barroom, tippling house, dram shop, store or other place where any wine, ale or beer, or any spirituous, vinous, malt or mixed liquors, or any intoxicating drinks, are manufactured, sold or given away, or to manufacture, sell, dispense or give away any such wine, ale or beer or spirituous, vinous, malt or mixed liquors, or any intoxicating drinks, without first having obtained a license therefor as provided in this ordinance."

The petitioner was arrested, prosecuted, and convicted under the second provision of the above-quoted section, which purports to make it unlawful for one to sell or dispense intoxicating liquors, irrespective of place, without first having obtained a license so to do. The petitioner seeks his discharge upon the authority of the cases of Merced County v. Helm, 102 Cal. 159, 36 Pac. 399, and Ex parte Seube, 115 Cal. 629, 47 Pac. 596, and one or two minor cases involving the principle there considered.

[1] These cases clearly establish the law that as a revenue measure a license can only be imposed upon the business of selling intoxicating liquors, etc., and that a single sale does not constitute the carrying on of such business. But these cases, and especially the Helm Case, recognize the difference between police measures, or police regulations, and ordinances adopted primarily for the raising of revenue. The court, speaking through Justice Harrison, in the Helm Case, says:

> "The right of the county to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the exercise of police powers conferred upon it by article 11, section 11, of the Constitution * * * is not involved in the determination of this case, as the ordinance in question does not purport to have been enacted under this power. By its very terms the ordinance is a revenue measure, and this suit is simply a civil action to recover a liability," etc., "and the collection of a tax does not come within the exercise of police powers. * * * That power is exercised in the enforcement of the penalty prescribed for a noncompliance with the law, or for the doing of some prohibited act."

No prohibitive acts were involved in the Helm or Seube Cases, and no question of the police power of cities or counties, as given by section 11 of article 11 in the Constitution of this state, was involved.

The subdivision of the Constitution just referred to reads:

> "Any county, city, town or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

In chartered cities of this state there are no general laws restraining or limiting the power of the city council of such cities to make such regulations stringent, or even prohibitive, in so far as the sale of intoxicating liquors is concerned, nor does it appear that the right to prohibit or regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors depends in any wise upon the number of sales involved, or, as said in People v. Harrison, 256 Ill. 102, 99 N. E. 903, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 362:

> "The manner and extent of its regulation, if permitted to be carried on at all, are to be determined by the state, so as to limit, as far as possible, the evils arising from it."

Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 11 Sup. Ct. 13, 34 L. Ed. 620:

> "In cities, authority for such regulation or prohibition has been conferred by the Legislature upon the city councils, and all sales of intoxicating liquor are unlawful and are prohibited unless made by virtue of a license granted under an ordinance. The power conferred upon the city is coextensive with that of the state, and includes authority to adopt any means to reduce the evils arising from the sale of intoxicating liquor, reasonably adapted to that end, which do not violate constitutional rights."

[2] That the sale of spirituous liquors is a matter to be regulated under the police powers of the state has been so frequently decided that the enumeration of authorities is unnecessary.

In Ex parte Fedderwitz, 6 Cal. Unrep. 562, 62 Pac. 935, the ordinance involved provided that:

> "It shall be a misdemeanor for any person to sell or give away any spirituous liquors within the city, except a licensed druggist selling on the prescription of a regularly licensed physician."

It was held that the ordinance was valid, and was a proper exercise of the police power of the state in prohibiting a single act of selling or giving away of spirituous liquors by one not engaged in the liquor traffic. The court, speaking through Chief Justice Beatty, says:

> "The charge upon which the petitioner was convicted was that of selling and giving away malt and spirituous liquors. It is not alleged that he kept a saloon, or that he was otherwise engaged in the traffic, either as a wholesale or retail dealer; and the question is whether the ordinance contains a valid prohibition against the act charged. If it does, it matters not that it may contain other prohibitions which the city has not the power to impose. The ordinance, in that case, would be merely void pro tanto, and its partial invalidity would not affect the judgment against this petitioner. It is claimed upon the authority of Merced County v. Helm, 102 Cal. 159, 36 Pac. 399, that a municipal corporation cannot make a single act of selling or giving away intoxicants a crime. But that case has no bearing upon the proposition. That was a civil action to recover a license which was imposed, and could only be imposed, for the privilege of conducting the business; and it was there held, among other things, that a single sale was not carrying on a business in the sense of the license laws. It does not follow from this, however, that a single sale may not constitute a crime if the ordinance so provides, as this clearly does. And the power to pass such an ordinance is granted in the most sweeping terms in section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution."

Justice Beatty further, in his opinion in this case, in referring to the Case of Campbell, 74 Cal. 20, 15 Pac. 318, 5 Am. St. Rep.

418, points out the distinction which is applicable here, and says:

> "The court was careful to say that the case did not involve any question as to the right to sell liquor apart from the traffic, but it was not decided or intimated that a prohibition of single sales was beyond the power of the municipality."

This court, in the Matter of Anixter, 22 Cal. App. 118, 134 Pac. 193, had before it an ordinance involving the restrictive principle here in question. The ordinance of the town of Winters provided:

> "It shall be and is hereby made unlawful for any person, etc., within the corporate limits of the said town of Winters, to solicit orders, take orders or make agreements for the sale or delivery of any intoxicating liquors or liquor of any kind whatever, or in any quantity or quantities."

Section 2 of the same ordinance contained exceptions allowing registered pharmacists holding licenses to sell liquors for certain purposes. This court, speaking through Justice Hart, held that there is absolutely no restriction upon the right of the state, in the exercise of its powers of police, to deal with the business of selling intoxicating liquors by retail in any manner that it deems fit or proper. A state or its municipalities may prohibit the traffic in such liquors altogether, or, permitting the traffic to be carried on, may impose such conditions upon its existence as it pleases.

The ordinance involved in the Anixter Case did not relate to any particular place of doing business, but distinctly made it a misdemeanor to sell intoxicating liquors in any quantity, unless the person came within one of the excepted classes and held a license authorizing him to sell. This same case was before the Supreme Court in 166 Cal. 762, 138 Pac. 353, and the doctrine was there affirmed that a state and its subordinate municipal agencies may pass laws, even laws penal in their character, regulating and indeed prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, or soliciting orders, or the making of contracts for the sale of such liquors, and also holding that such an ordinance was a valid exercise of the police power granted to the cities of this state.

In Re Kidd, 5 Cal. App. 159, 89 Pac. 987, the ordinance in relation to the sale of intoxicating liquors in the city of Riverside prohibited the sale of all intoxicating liquors by any person except that the city council might issue a permit to a keeper of hotels having 40 or more bedrooms. This ordinance was upheld, the court expressing the view that the constitutional requirement with reference to the uniformity in operation of all laws of a general nature has no application to ordinances enacted in pursuance of the legitimate exercise of the police power, and only when it is manifest that there is an unjust discrimination do courts interfere.

In Ex parte Hansen, 158 Cal. 494, 111 Pac. 528, the ordinance involved provided that it was unlawful for any person within the county and outside municipalities therein to sell, furnish, distribute, or give away intoxicating drinks of any kind, except for certain purposes. The offense charged against the petitioner was the purchasing, receiving, and accepting a particular intoxicating drink, and furnishing, selling, distributing, and delivering the same. The ordinance was upheld, and the petitioner remanded.

In Re Coombs, 169 Cal. 484, 147 Pac. 131, an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles providing, among other things, that "no person shall sell any intoxicating liquor in any quantity whatsoever, except at a fixed place of business, or without first obtaining a license therefor under the provisions of the ordinance," was upheld, the court adding that:

> "The power to regulate involves a wide discretion in the selection of the classes of dealers in intoxicants who should be subjected to regulation. For example, an ordinance is valid which gives the right to sell liquors only by keepers of hotels, and permits the serving of intoxicants only in the dining rooms of such hotels and as parts of regular meals. Indeed, the governing power which may prohibit a thing altogether may impose even arbitrary restrictions upon its existence."

This case also holds ordinances of the character involved in this proceeding to be legitimate exercises of the police powers vested in the city councils.

[3] In the case at bar, there is no unjust or invidious discrimination. The petitioner has no inherent right to sell intoxicating liquor, whether in one or many sales, and he does not show himself to be one of the excepted classes. The power to regulate must necessarily include the power to determine whether the privilege of selling intoxicating liquors may be exercised, and also the requirements of the persons who may be granted the privilege of making sales.

The ordinance before the court is, by its express terms, declared to be one for regulating the sale of spirituous liquors; it is prohibitive and penal in its terms, and explicitly makes it unlawful for any one to sell intoxicating liquors in any quantity whatsoever, unless he comes within one of the excepted classes, and has first obtained a license to make the sale. The fact that the ordinance contains no provision licensing single sales of intoxicating liquors does not alter, change, or affect its penal prohibitive features. The authorities herein reviewed clearly establish the power of the city council to make a single sale by a person not having a license and not within the excepting clauses a misdemeanor, and that is exactly what has been done by the ordinance under review. Nor do any of the provisions of the ordinance of the city of Sacramento, exacting the payment of a certain sum per annum before any license to engage in the business of selling liquors can be granted, change the character of the ordinance as being a police regulation.

As we have shown, the city council of the city of Sacramento possesses the undoubted right to regulate, in any manner that it sees fit, and this regulation may be as well by exacting licenses, and penalizing sales without licenses, as by any prohibitory measures. If that is the purpose and the plain intent of the ordinance, it is not to be set aside on the plea that the city may derive a revenue therefrom, nor because the method of regulating may not be efficient. The prohibition or penalizing of single sales of intoxicating liquor must be held to come within the necessary police powers of cities and counties, and its exercise just and reasonable, and a measure tending to minimize the evils flowing from the traffic, confining it to definite and licensed places where peace officers may always exercise supervision.

It follows from what has been said that the writ must be denied, and the petitioner remanded. It is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

BRYANT et al. v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF ORANGE COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2184.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Jan. 11, 1917.)

1. CERTIORARI 🔑21 — REMEDY — ACTS OF QUASI JUDICIAL BODY.

The proceeding by writ of review is under appropriate circumstances the proper means of relief against void proceedings for the organization of a corporation for public purposes where the method of its creation is prescribed by statute and where a local board is empowered to create it upon certain conditions and the ascertainment of certain facts after hearing held upon notice to interested parties; as in ascertaining the required facts and determining that they exist, the board's action is of a judicial character, and as it sufficiently comes within the purview of the writ if such proceedings are of a judicial nature and are exercised by a quasi judicial body.

2. CERTIORARI 🔑50—RETURN—EVIDENCE.

On a petition for a writ to review proceedings of a county board of supervisors on a petition for the formation of a storm water district under act approved March 13, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 339), as amended by St. 1913, p. 504, resulting in the creation of such district, the clerk of the board in making the return required of him under Code Civ. Proc. § 1070, might certify to the fact that no evidence was received, which fact may be then considered by the court, and, although the law does not provide for taking down or preserving the evidence in such proceedings by the board, it may be required to make as full a return as it is possible for it to make of the facts shown in evidence before it, where the question raised goes to the fact of its jurisdiction to act upon the petition.

3. LEVEES 🔑6 — STORM WATER DISTRICT — CREATION—JURISDICTION OF BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—OWNERSHIP OF LAND.

In a proceeding on petition to a county board of supervisors for the formation of a storm water district under St. 1909, p. 339, §§ 1, 2, as amended by St. 1913, pp. 504, 505, the board's jurisdiction to act upon a petition of those representing themselves to be owners of land within the proposed district depends upon the fact that they are such owners, rather than upon the act of receiving ex parte testimony at a time when no hearing upon notice under section 1 could be had; so that where the jurisdictional fact of ownership existed when the petition was filed, the board's failure to receive testimony prior to passing its resolution of intention was not a sufficient reason for holding its proceedings in establishing the district void, though it would be better practice for the board to require sworn evidence of such fact before passing its resolution of intention.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Levees, Cent. Dig. § 16.]

4. LEVEES 🔑6 — STORM WATER DISTRICT — PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH—NOTICE.

Under the Storm Water District Act (St. 1909, p. 339, as amended by St. 1913, pp. 504, 505), section 2 of which originally required the clerk of court of the board of supervisors to mail copies of the specified notice to each owner of land in the proposed district whose name appeared as such on the last completed assessment roll, the omission of the word "completed" from the amended section was immaterial, as an uncompleted assessment roll is not an assessment roll at all; and the sending, on June 27, 1916, of copies of the notice of intention to form the district under the resolution of intention to each owner whose name appeared as such on the last completed assessment roll of the county when under Pol. Code, § 3672, there could not be a completed assessment roll for 1916 until the first Monday in July, was not a sending of notices to those whose names appeared as owners of land in the district on the "last completed assessment roll," and was not the giving of the required notice, so that the board was without power to proceed further in the formation of the proposed district until the statutory notice had been given.

Petition for a writ of review by Susanna P. Bryant and others against the Board of Supervisors of the County of Orange, State of California, and T. B. Talbert and others, constituting such board, and W. B. Williams, County Clerk and ex officio Clerk of the Board. Demurrer to petition overruled, and resolution of Board declaring the formation of a storm water district annulled and set aside.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, Wm. J. O'Brien and E. W. Freeman, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners. L. A. West, Dist. Atty., A. E. Koepsel and Walter Eden, Deputy Dist. Attys., all of Santa Ana (Homer G. Ames, of Anaheim, of counsel), for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Certiorari. On the 7th day of June, 1916, there was presented to the board of supervisors of Orange county a petition for the formation of a storm water district under the provisions of an act entitled, "An act to provide for the formation, organization and government of storm water districts, for the purpose of protecting the land therein from damage from storm water and from the waters of any innavigable stream, water course, canyon or wash, for the construction of the necessary works of protection by said district, and for the levying of taxes and assessments to pay for the cost of constructing, repairing and maintaining such improvements," approved March 13, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 339); such district to be known as and called "United Storm Water District of Orange County." Such proceedings were had that thereafter, on the 2d day of August, 1916, the board of supervisors passed a resolution whereby it purported to form and create said storm water district. On the 8th day of September the petitioners herein filed their petition for a writ of review, and the writ was issued. Return having been duly made by the respondents, who at the same time filed a demurrer to the petition, the matter has been argued and submitted at the same time upon the demurrer and the return.

[1] Respondents claim that the proceedings sought to be reviewed cannot be examined into under a writ of review, because it is not made to appear that the board of supervisors has exceeded its jurisdiction in the exercise of a judicial function, and because the petitioners have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by the writ of quo warranto. This contention cannot be sustained. The proceeding by writ of review is, under appropriate circumstances, the correct means of relief against void proceedings for the organization of a corporation for public purposes, where the method of creation of such corporation is prescribed by statute, and a local board is empowered to create the corporation upon certain conditions and upon the ascertainment of certain facts by such board, after a hearing held after notice to the parties interested. In ascertaining the required facts and determining that they exist, the action of the board is of a judicial character. And it sufficiently comes within the purview of the writ if such proceedings are of a judicial nature and are exercised by a quasi judicial body. Imperial Water Co. No. 1 v. Board of Supervisors of Imperial County, 162 Cal. 14, 120 Pac. 780. The statute relating to the creation of storm water districts is similar in character to the statute providing for the creation of irrigation districts, referred to in the case above cited. The present proceeding in this court has been commenced promptly, in order to prevent at its inception the organization of the district. The case is therefore different from those where de facto corporations are transacting business as existing organizations, and where, on account of the situation thus existing, it has been held that quo warranto was the exclusive remedy. Jaques v. Board of Supervisors, 24 Cal. App. 381, 141 Pac. 404; Keech v. Joplin, 157 Cal. 1, at page 14, 106 Pac. 222.

The petition of June 7, 1916, was signed by 31 persons, of whom it was recited in the petition that they were "owners of land whose names appear as such upon the last assessment roll of the county of Orange, state of California," within a district of land in Orange county described in the petition and which those petitioners desired to have formed into a storm water district. Attached to that petition was a certificate, dated June 7, 1916, signed by the assessor of Orange county, by his chief deputy, certifying "that more than ten of the foregoing names appear on the assessment roll of said Orange county for the year 1915–16 as owners of property within the district above described." Immediately preceding the foregoing certificate was a separate certificate by the same officer that "I hereby certify that ten or more of the above signers are taxpayers of Orange county." It is stipulated that no evidence was taken or received by the board of supervisors as to the genuineness of the signatures to any petition filed with it for the formation of said district prior to the adoption (on the 7th day of June, 1916) of the resolution of intention to form said district, nor was any evidence taken or received by said board, prior to the adoption of said resolution, that the persons whose names were subscribed to any petition were the owners of land within said proposed district, other than the above-mentioned certificates of the county assessor. It is further stipulated that on the 25th day of July, 1916, the board of supervisors received evidence showing the genuineness of said signatures, and that more than ten of said signers were owners of land in said district, as shown by the assessment rolls of 1915–16, and thereafter appeared on the assessment rolls of 1916–17; but that at the same time objection was made (though not by the petitioners herein) that said board had not at that time jurisdiction to organize said district, because of the fact that prior to the adoption of the resolution of intention to form said district no proof was made to it that the signatures attached to the petition were the genuine signatures of the persons whose names were signed to said petition.

Section 1 of the Storm Water District Act of 1909, as amended in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 504), reads as follows:

> "Storm water districts may be formed under the provisions of this act for the purpose of protecting the lands in such districts from damage from storm water, and from the waters from any innavigable stream, water course, canyon, or wash (or such districts may be formed for the purpose of spreading, conserving, storing, retaining or causing to percolate into the soil within such district any or all such waters). When ten or more owners of land whose names appear as such upon the last assessment roll, in any district of land which lies in one body and is liable to damage from storm water or from the waters of any innavigable stream, canyon or wash (or when such owners desire to spread, conserve, store, retain, or cause to percolate into the soil within such district any or all of such waters), shall present a petition to the board of supervisors of the county in which said land lies, or if the same lies in more than one county, then to the board of supervisors of the county in which the greater area of such land lies, setting forth the exterior boundaries of said district and asking that the district so described be formed into a storm water district under the provisions of this act, the said board of supervisors shall pass a resolution declaring their intention to form and organize said portion of said county or counties into a storm water district for the purpose of protecting the lands therein from damage from storm water, and from the waters of any innavigable stream, canyon or wash (or for the purpose of spreading, conserving, storing, retaining or causing to percolate into the soil within such district any or all of such waters), and describing the exterior boundaries of the district. Said resolution shall fix a time and place for the hearing of the matter, not less than thirty days after the passage thereof, and direct the clerk of said board to publish a notice of the intention of the board of supervisors to form such storm water district, and of the time and place fixed for the hearing, and shall designate some newspaper of general circulation, published and circulated in said proposed storm water district, or if there is no newspaper so published and circulated, then some newspaper of general circulation, published and circulated in each county in which any part of said proposed district is situated in which said notice is to be published."

The foregoing quotation does not differ from the same section as enacted in 1909, except that the words which we have placed in parentheses were added in the amendment of 1913.

Section 2 of the same act, as amended in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 505), reads as follows:

"Thereupon said clerk shall cause to be published in the newspaper or newspapers so designated, for a period of twenty days before the date fixed for the hearing, a notice, which shall be headed 'Notice of intention of the board of supervisors to form a storm water district.' Said notice shall set forth the fact of the passage of such resolution with the date thereof, the boundaries of the proposed district, and the time and place for the hearing, and shall state that it is proposed to assess all property embraced in said proposed storm water district, for the purpose of paying the damages, costs and expenses of constructing and repairing such dikes, levees, ditches, canals (reservoirs, shafts), and other improvements as may be necessary to protect the land in said district from damage from storm water and from waters of any innavigable stream, canyon or wash (or to spread, conserve, store, retain or cause to percolate into the soil within such district any or all of such waters), and the necessary expense of maintaining said district, and shall refer to the resolution for further particulars. Said clerk shall send a copy of said notice by registered mail, postage prepaid, to each owner of land in the proposed district whose name appears as such on the last assessment roll of the county or counties in which said proposed district lies, addressed to such owner at his address given on such assessment roll, or if no address is given, then at his last known address, or if it be not known then at the county seat of the county in which his land lies. Said clerk shall make and file in his office an affidavit of such mailing, showing the names and addresses of the persons to whom such notices were sent, which shall be prima facie evidence that such notices were mailed as herein required."

The foregoing quotation is identical with the same section as enacted in 1909, except that the words which we have placed in parentheses were added in the amendment of 1913; and except that where the amended section uses the words "whose name appears as such on the last assessment roll," the original section used the words "whose name appears as such on the last completed assessment roll"; and except that in the last clause of the section the word "such" has been substituted for the word "said" in the phrase "that such notices were mailed."

[2] In making the stipulation to which we have referred, it was further agreed that "such parts of this stipulation as the court shall decide are competent shall be deemed and taken as the return of the respondents to said writ of review"; but it was likewise agreed that in making the stipulation the respondents did not admit that any of the facts thus admitted were material, competent, or relevant. The respondents now contend that the fact that the board did not receive any evidence prior to passing its resolution of June 7, 1916, should not be considered, because it is a fact outside the record, in this, that it is a fact which could not be set forth in the return, since the board had no record of that fact. In support of this proposition we are reminded that the law does not provide for taking down or preserving the evidence in a proceeding of this kind before the board of supervisors, nor for the settlement of a bill of exceptions; and we are referred to Central Pac. R. R. Co. v. Placer Co., 34 Cal. 352, and Johnston v. Board of Supervisors, 104 Cal. 390, 37 Pac. 1046, as cases in point. In those cases, however, we observe that the only disputed question was as to the sufficiency of evidence produced before the board of supervisors to authorize it to determine and act in a specified manner; the record clearly showing that the board did have jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter concerning which it was acting. As to such cases it was held that in a certiorari proceeding the court would not receive other evidence than the usual record to show what the evidence was which had been received by the board. It was said in the first of those decisions that some convenient mode might have been adopted by the board for the preservation and authentication of the evidence, when it was desired to have the proceedings reviewed; the inference being that in that event the evidence thus shown and made part of the return might have been considered by the court. That being so, we think that the clerk of the board in making the return required of him (Code Civ. Proc. § 1070) may certify to the fact that no evidence was received, and that this fact may then be considered by the court. There is another and even more forcible reason why in a case like the present the board might be required to make as full a return as it is possible for it to make of the facts shown in evidence before it, when we take into consideration the nature of the question presented; for here the question goes to the very fact of jurisdiction of the board to act at all upon the petition for the formation of the storm water district. "An exception to the rule that the sufficiency of the evidence will not be reviewed is made when the question is whether jurisdictional facts were or were not proved. This exception arises out of the most important office and function of the writ—the keeping of inferior courts and tribunals within proper bounds. If the decision of the inferior tribunal as to the sufficiency of the evidence to establish jurisdictional facts were not reviewable, the writ of certiorari would be of no avail as a remedy against an assumption of jurisdiction. And for the purpose of enabling the reviewing court to determine whether jurisdictional facts were established, it will require a return to be made of the evidence upon which such facts are based." Stumpf v. Board of Supervisors, 131 Cal. 364, 367, 63 Pac. 663, 664 [82 Am. St. Rep. 350]. Upon certiorari, though the inferior tribunal is required to certify only matters of record, yet if the jurisdictional facts do not appear of record it must certify "not only what is technically denominated the record, but such facts, or the evidence of them, as may be necessary to determine whatever questions as to the jurisdiction of the inferior tribunal may be involved." Blair v. Hamilton, 32 Cal. 49; Golden Gate Title Co. v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 474, 481, 114 Pac. 978. In view of the law as thus established, we shall, in determining this case, give credit to the facts stipulated, and overrule the objection.

[3] While admitting that in fact more than ten of the signers of the petition of June 7, 1916, were owners of land in the proposed storm water district, whose names appeared as such on the assessment roll of 1915–16 (and thereafter likewise appeared on the assessment roll of 1916–17), the petitioners herein contend that since the board of supervisors passed its resolution of intention of June 7th without first receiving evidence to prove these facts, therefore the board was without jurisdiction to pass that resolution. This contention involves the proposition that the board's jurisdiction depended not merely upon the actual existence of certain jurisdictional facts, but also upon the production to the board of some formal evidence of those facts. And it involves the further proposition that the alleged defect of jurisdiction (or of evidence of jurisdictional facts), thus caused, could not be remedied by evidence which the board received at the time of hearing of the application after notice published, at which time it was proved that the necessary number of signers of the petition were landowners as required by the statute.

We are of opinion that the jurisdiction of the board to act, in the first step of its proceedings, upon the petition of those who represented themselves to be landowners of land within the proposed district, depended upon the fact that they were such landowners, rather than upon the act of receiving ex parte testimony at a time when no hearing upon notice could occur. The case differs from that of People v. Town of Linden, 107 Cal. 94, 40 Pac. 115. In that case the statute defining the proceedings for organization of the proposed corporation provided that the petition should be accompanied by affidavits which would be prima facie evidence of the requisite number of signers; and it is stated in the decision not only that the affidavit failed to state the necessary facts, but also that there never was any evidence of the genuineness of the signatures offered before the board of supervisors, and that the board never found or declared that such petition had been in fact signed by the necessary number of qualified petitioners. But in this case, it appears that after the notice required by section 1 of the statute had been given, and when the time of hearing thereby provided had arrived, the same questions of fact as to ownership of land by the petitioners, which necessarily came before the board as matters essential to the right of the board to "declare such storm water district formed" (section 4 of Storm Water District Act of 1909), were heard and determined. The return herein shows that at that time, July 25, 1916, evidence was received and the fact of such ownership of land by the petitioners of June 7th was duly established. It therefore duly appears by the record before us that this jurisdictional fact did exist when the petition of June 7th was filed. This being so, we think that the omission of the board to receive testimony prior to passing its resolution of intention of June 7th does not establish a sufficient reason for holding that the board's proceedings were void. In arriving at this conclusion we are not attaching any importance whatever to the certificates of the county assessor which were attached to the landowners' petition. Neither do we deny that it would be better practice for a board of supervisors to require sworn evidence of some kind, of such facts, before passing its resolution of intention in proceedings of that kind.

[4] As we have shown, section 2 of the Storm Water District Act, as adopted in 1909, requires the clerk of the board of supervisors to mail copies of the specified notice to each owner of land in the proposed district "whose name appears as such on the last completed assessment roll," etc.; whereas the same section as amended in 1913 omits the word "completed" from the clause just now quoted. This verbal change made no difference in the meaning of the clause. An uncompleted assessment roll is not an assessment roll at all. In the proceedings here under review, as the return herein shows, copies of the notice of intention to form the United Storm Water District of Orange County under the resolution of intention passed June 7, 1916, were mailed to sundry persons by the clerk of the board on the 27th day of June, 1916. On that day the clerk duly made his affidavit of mailing such notices and therein stated that he had sent them by registered mail, postage prepaid, to each owner of land in the proposed storm water district "whose name appears as such on the last completed assessment roll of said county of Orange." The time of the hearing before the board as provided in the notice was the 19th day of July, 1916. The hearing at that time was duly adjourned to the 25th day of July. On that date sundry objections, which had been filed, were presented. One of the objections urged at that time, and also now insisted upon, was that copies of the notice had been sent to only a portion of and not to each owner of land in the proposed district whose name appeared as such on the last assessment roll of the county. The objections were heard and considered by the board, which thereafter overruled the objections by resolution wherein it was recited that the clerk did send a copy of said notice by registered mail, etc., "to each owner of land in the proposed district whose name appears as such on the last assessment roll of said county of Orange, * * * as will more fully appear by the affidavit of J. M. Backs on file in the office of the county clerk of the county of Orange." A list of the persons to whom notices were sent is attached to the affidavit of J. M. Backs, the clerk of the board. The assessment roll of the county for the year 1916–17 could not legally have been completed so as to become an assessment roll, under the provision of the Political Code, as early as the 27th day of June. The board of supervisors cannot hold its meeting to examine the assessment book and equalize the assessment of property until the first Monday in July (Pol. Code, § 3672); and in contemplation of law there cannot be a completed assessment roll until the business of equalization is completed. The board may order the addition of new items to the assessment book. (Pol. Code, § 3681). The affidavit of Mr. Backs, therefore, apparently referred to the "assessment roll" of 1915–16.

But by the stipulation to which we have referred it is admitted (subject to respondents' objection that the facts are neither material, competent, or relevant, and shall not be considered unless this court shall hold that they are admissible) that it appeared from the evidence taken before the board of supervisors at the hearing before it that the clerk had mailed the notice only to persons whose names appeared as owners of land upon a partially completed assessment roll of 1916–17 and the residue from that portion of the statements of taxpayers, made and filed with the county assessor of said county between the 6th day of March, 1916, and the 27th day of June, 1916, which had not at that time been entered upon said roll, or upon the reports of the field deputies of said county assessor made and filed with said county assessor between said dates; that said assessment roll had at that time been mostly completed and there were but a few of said reports of field deputies which had not been entered on the book; that on the 27th day of June, 1916, no assessment roll for the fiscal year of 1916–17 had been certified by the county assessor of said county, or delivered by said county assessor to the board of equalization of said county. But that said reports of field deputies of the assessor were, on the 27th day of June, 1916, all in the assessor's office, and no change was afterwards made in said reports, and the data shown by said reports were afterwards put on the assessor's books of 1916–17; so that the names of landowners, appearing on the assessment roll of 1916–17, as the same was certified and filed with the board of equalization on July 3, 1916, were the same as appeared by said reports of said field deputies from which said mailing list was prepared. That said clerk in mailing the said notices did not refer to or use the assessment roll of 1915–16; that the names and addresses shown by the said affidavit of the clerk are the names and addresses as they now (date of stipulation being September 26, 1916) appear upon said assessment roll of 1916–17; but it does not contain the names of all owners of land within said proposed district whose names appear as such upon the assessment roll of 1915–16. Further facts are stipulated showing that the assessment was delivered to the board of equalization on July 3d as required by law, and that the equalization proceeded to completion in due form.

For the same reasons and upon the same authorities which have led us to accept for use herein the stipulated fact that no evidence was received by the board prior to the passing of its resolution of intention, we also accept, as part of the return, the foregoing agreed facts, whereby it appears that the clerk did not mail copies of the notice of the subsequent hearing to all owners of land within the proposed district whose names appeared as such upon the last assessment roll, and to whom the statute required that such notices should be sent. That the board of supervisors was without power to proceed further in the formation of the proposed district until notice had been given to all persons whom the law has pointed out as interested parties entitled to such notice is, of course, to be assumed without argument.

The petitioners herein further contend that the notice as published and mailed by the clerk is not in the form and does not contain the matters required by the statute; also, that the petition, notice, and resolution of intention were all fatally defective in that the attempted description of the exterior boundaries of the proposed district is so ambiguous on its face that it is impossible to trace the proposed boundaries or identify the land to be included in the district. It appears from the record that the notice as given followed the form prescribed in section 2 of the Storm Water District Act as enacted in 1909, and omits all of the additional matters required in such notice under said section 2 as amended in 1913. It is not necessary for us at this time to enter into a discussion of the effect of these omissions upon the question of sufficiency of the notice. Neither is it necessary to examine into the alleged defects in description of the boundaries of the proposed district. Since the judgment herein must go in favor of the petitioners by reason of the failure of the clerk of the board of supervisors to give notice to some of the persons entitled thereto, it is fair to assume that if the attempt to form the storm water district shall be prosecuted any further, care will be taken to frame the petition and the notice in the required statutory form and to avoid the alleged defects in description of boundaries.

For the reasons herein stated, the demurrer is overruled, and it is ordered that the resolution of the board of supervisors of Orange county declaring the formation of the United Storm Water District of Orange County be and the same hereby is annulled and set aside.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 9, 1916. Rehearing Denied Jan. 8, 1917. Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 7, 1917.)

1. MARRIAGE 🔑54—VALIDITY—ANNULMENT.

Under Civ. Code, § 82, subd. 3, declaring that a marriage may be annulled if either party to it was of unsound mind when entering into it, such marriage is binding upon the parties and upon all the world, until such annulment is declared.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. §§ 93–103, 105, 106, 109.]

2. COURTS 🔑8, 9—STATUTES—EXTRATERRITORIAL EFFECT.

The laws of one state or country have no extraterritorial effect.

3. BASTARDS 🔑96—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

The courts of this state in questions of succession will apply the statutes of the state in determining the status of the claimant to the succession, and if claimant shows that he is entitled thereunder to take as a legitimate child it is sufficient, and the fact that by the law of his own country he is illegitimate is immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bastards, Cent. Dig. § 247.]

4. BASTARDS 🔑105—RIGHT TO INHERITANCE—LINEAL KINDRED—STATUTES.

Civ. Code, § 215, provides that an illegitimate child becomes legitimate by the subsequent marriage of its parents, and section 230 provides that when the father of an illegitimate child publicly acknowledges it as his own, etc., the child is thereupon deemed for all purposes legitimate from its birth. Section 1387 provides that every illegitimate child is an heir of the person acknowledging him to be his child and is an heir of his mother, but that he does not represent his father or mother by inheriting any part of the estate of his or her kindred, lineal or collateral, unless before its death his parents shall have married, and his father thereafter acknowledges or adopts him. Section 1386 confers rights of inheritance upon legitimate children. Held, that section 1387 does not apply to children legitimated under sections 215 and 230, and that such children inherited as prescribed by section 1386 by right of representation of their deceased father their part of their grandmother's estate.

5. BASTARDS 🔑100—RIGHT OF INHERITANCE—COMMON LAW.

At common law a child born out of wedlock was filius nullius and had no heritable blood, meaning no more than that certain legal disabilities were attached to his status, one of which was his lack of capacity to inherit from his father or his parent's kindred.

6. BASTARDS 🔑105—DISABILITIES—INHERITANCE—STATUTE.

The Legislature can remove the disabilities of illegitimate children as the right of inheritance of both legitimate and illegitimate children alike is a creature of law and can be changed at any time and to any extent; and the Legislature, granting legitimacy in general terms, can perpetuate former disabilities or create new ones, or discriminate against persons legitimated by statute.

7. BASTARDS 🔑105—RIGHT OF INHERITANCE—STATUTES—CONFLICTING PROVISIONS.

There is no conflict between Civ. Code, § 1387, giving certain restricted rights of inheritance to illegitimates as such, and the later provision of section 230, conferring legitimacy, even though the same conditions are made sufficient to confer legitimacy which formerly only gave restricted rights of inheritance; since where there are two conflicting sections in a Code or other compilation that section prevails which is derived from a source which may be considered as the latest expression of the lawmaking power, without regard to the relative position of such sections in the Code.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bastards, Cent. Dig. §§ 263, 264.]

8. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION 🔑26—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES — "CHILDREN"—"LAWFUL ISSUE."

The words "children" and "lawful issue," when found in statutes of succession, are not to be confined to their strict common-law signification.

9. Bastards 🔑11—Legitimation—Statutes—Minors.

Civ. Code, § 215, providing that an illegitimate child becomes legitimate by the subsequent marriage of its parents, and section 230, providing that when the father of an illegitimate child makes public acknowledgment, etc., such child is thereupon deemed for all purposes legitimate from its birth, are not confined in their application to children who have not attained their majority.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Arturo Wolf and Maria Julia Wolf against Charles Funkenstein Gall and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and from a part of the judgment defendants appeal. Part of judgment appealed from affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court 163 Pac. 350.

See, also, 162 Pac. 115.

J. R. Pringle, Edgar D. Peixotto, and Leon Samuels, all of San Francisco, for appellants. George Lezinsky and Theodore A. Bell, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. Arturo Wolf and Maria Julia Wolf, the respondents in this case, are the children born out of wedlock of Newman Wolf and Carmen Gonzales, and seek to have awarded to them a share in the property described in the complaint as heirs at law of Tobe Funkenstein, deceased, their grandmother, by right of representation of their deceased father, it being the claim of respondents that the subsequent marriage of their parents legitimated them by virtue of the provisions of section 215 of the Civil Code, and that their adoption by their father into his family in connection with such marriage also had for its effect their legitimation under section 230 of the same Code. The court, among other things, decreed that the respondents are heirs at law of said Tobe Funkenstein, and entitled to succeed to a part of her estate, and it is from this portion of the judgment that the defendants have appealed.

The judgment is declared to be erroneous for various reasons, among them being the alleged failure of the respondents to prove that they were the children of Newman Wolf, that the marriage ceremony between Wolf and their mother was in fact a marriage; the contention that there was no acknowledgment of respondents as his children by Newman Wolf, and principally for the reason that even conceding the findings of the trial court as to these matters to be correct, the respondents are debarred by the provisions of section 1387 of the Civil Code from inheriting any part of the estate of their grandmother.

Notwithstanding the argument of the appellants to the contrary, we are satisfied after a careful review of the record that the evidence sustains the view that Newman Wolf and Carmen Gonzales were the parents of the respondents; that they were duly married on July 21, 1913, both of the respondents at that time having attained the age of majority; and that if any acknowledgment of the respondent was required it was sufficiently established.

[1] Equally without merit is the contention of the appellants that the marriage of Newman Wolf and Carmen Gonzales was a nullity by reason of Wolf's mental condition at the time of its celebration. The evidence does not show him to have been entirely without understanding. A similar question arose in the case of Estate of Gregorson, 160 Cal. 21, 116 Pac. 60, L. R. A. 1916C, 697, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1124, and it was there held that while subdivision 3 of section 82 of the Civil Code, declaring that a marriage may be annulled if either party to it was of unsound mind at the time of entering into it, it was binding upon the parties and upon all the world until such annulment was declared.

[2, 3] Nor do we think that the fact that Wolf was an alien and domiciled outside of California renders ineffectual the acts claimed to result in the legitimation of respondents. While it is generally true that the laws of one state or country have no extraterritorial effect, on the other hand, when the status of a person is under consideration before the courts of this state in questions of succession, they will apply our own statutes in determining the status of the claimant to the succession; and if the claimant shows that by applying our law he is entitled to take as a legitimate child, it is sufficient, and the fact that by the law of his own country he is not legitimate is immaterial. In the case of Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 564, 31 Pac. 915, 19 L. R. A. 40, the plaintiff was an illegitimate alien and at all times domiciled beyond the jurisdiction of California, and claimed to succeed to the estate of her intestate father by reason of having become legitimated by acknowledgment on his part in accordance with the provisions of section 230 of the Civil Code. In upholding her claim the court said:

> "Our statute, conjoined with principles of international law, would have changed her bastardy to legitimacy in the world at large; and regardless of international law, and regardless of all law of foreign countries, our statute law alone would have made her legitimate in the world at large whenever and however that question should present itself in the courts of California."

[4-6] This brings us to the principal contention of the appellants in the case and the one argued at length by them, viz. that in any event the respondents, being born out of lawful wedlock, are not capable of inheriting any part of their grandmother's estate, for the reason that to so inherit they must take by right of representation of their father, and that by section 1387 of the Civil Code the right given to illegitimates of succession to the estate of lineal or collateral kindred of their parents is expressly limited to the estates of their brothers and sisters.

The question of the rights of succession of a child legitimated by statute to succeed to his grandmother's estate is new in this state, and for that reason is one of more than ordinary interest. Section 1387, referred to above, reads as follows:

> "Every illegitimate child is an heir of the person who, in writing, signed in the presence of a competent witness, acknowledges himself to be the father of such child; and in all cases is an heir of his mother; and inherits his or her estate, in whole or in part, as the case may be, in the same manner as if he had been born in lawful wedlock; but he does not represent his father or mother by inheriting any part of the estate of his or her kindred, either lineal or collateral, unless, before his death, his parents shall have intermarried, and his father, after such marriage, acknowledges him as his child, or adopts him into his family; in which case such child and all the legitimate children are considered brothers and sisters, and on the death of either of them, intestate, and without issue, the others inherit his estate, and are heirs, as hereinbefore provided, in like manner as if all the children had been legitimate; saving to the father and mother, respectively, their rights in the estates of all the children in like manner as if all had been legitimate."

In the brief of appellants there is to be found an exhaustive and able analysis clause by clause of this section, by which is demonstrated beyond doubt that the part of the section which we have italicized gives only a limited right of succession by representation, to wit, the right to succeed to the estate of deceased brothers and sisters, and does not confer the right to succeed to the estate of a grandmother. And it is the contention of appellants that legitimated children come within the terms of this section of the Code, and that their rights of succession are governed by it.

We cannot agree with the view that the scope of section 1387 extends to legitimated children. We are of the opinion that this section has nothing to do with the rights of children who, though born out of wedlock, have become legitimated by compliance with section 215 or section 230 of the Civil Code. Those two sections read respectively as follows:

> "Sec. 215. A child born before wedlock becomes legitimate by the subsequent marriage of its parents."
> "Sec. 230. The father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such, with the consent of his wife, if he is married, into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby adopts it as such; and such child is thereupon deemed for all purposes legitimate from the time of its birth. The foregoing provisions of this chapter do not apply to such an adoption."

We think it quite clear that compliance with the terms of either one of these sections makes a child born out of lawful wedlock legitimate; that, as stated in section 230, he is legitimate for all purposes; and that, as a legitimate child, his rights of inheritance are governed by section 1386 of the Civil Code which confers rights of inheritance upon legitimate children.

At common law a child born out of wedlock was said to be filius nullius, and to have no heritable blood. These expressions are of course figurative, and meant no more than that certain legal disabilities were attached to his status, one of which was his lack of capacity to inherit from his father or his parents' kindred. There can be no doubt that the Legislature could remove those disabilities. The right of inheritance of legitimate and illegitimate children alike is a creature of law, and can be changed by the Legislature at any time and to any extent. When the law provides means for making legitimate a child born out of wedlock, it changes the status of that child, and in the absence of special provision to the contrary, he thenceforth comes within the provisions of the laws relating to legitimate children. Thereafter a child so legitimated is included in the designation "child" or "children" when those words refer to a child or children legitimately born; and he is no longer included in the designation "illegitimate child" when that term is used in a statute, unless it is obvious that such words are intended by the Legislature to include one who, though now legitimate, was formerly illegitimate. We think these propositions are self-evident. Of what avail is it to have legitimated a child if he still labors under the disabilities of his former condition? If he has not acquired the rights by law given to, and become subject to the duties imposed upon, his new condition, there has been no change at all, for it is obvious that the fact that he was born out of wedlock has not been changed and never can be. If any stigma attaches to that condition it still remains, and all that the law can do—and all it seeks to do—is to remove the disabilities attached to the condition. We freely grant that the Legislature can limit the extent to which the disabilities of an illegitimate child are removed; that although it has granted legitimacy in general terms, it can still perpetuate former disabilities or create new ones; so that, in a statute granting rights of succession to the property of intestates a discrimination may still be made against persons legitimated by statute. It is the claim of appellants that this is in fact what has been done in section 1387 by that part of the section which we have italicized. A reading of that section without reference to its history lends much color to this contention, but a consideration of that history will make it apparent that the section deals only with the rights of children born out of wedlock who have never been legitimated. Its provisions first appeared in the law of this state in a statute passed in 1850 (Stats. 1850, p. 219), where, as section 2 thereof, we find it almost word for word. At that time there was no method known to our law of legitimating a child born out of wedlock; and the provisions contained in said section 2—and which are relied upon by appellants as limiting the right of succession of legitimated children—had only as their effect to confer upon illegitimates the limited right of succession there given, and did not purport to change their condition of illegitimacy. They remained illegitimate, and received those limited rights of succession as such. This statute of 1850 remained in force until March 31, 1870, when it was repealed; but upon the adoption of the Civil Code, taking effect on January 1, 1873, we find section 2 of said statute reappearing almost word for word as section 1387 of said Code. Being merely a re-enactment of an old statute it must, upon familiar principles, be given the same meaning and effect as it originally had. Upon its original enactment it merely conferred certain limited rights of inheritance upon illegitimates complying with certain conditions, and did not purport to make them legitimate or to remove their disabilities in toto. Simultaneously with section 1387 there appeared in the Civil Code, section 230, being itself a re-enactment of section 9 of an act of the Legislature approved March 31, 1870. Stats. 1869–70, p. 530. Said section 9 had provided for the first time a method for making legitimate by law children born out of wedlock. Section 230 declares that compliance with its provisions makes the child who was theretofore illegitimate legitimate for all purposes. Being legitimate for all purposes it became in the eyes of the law a legitimate child with all the rights conferred by law upon legitimate children, including that of inheritance under the provisions of section 1386 of that Code. The legislation contained in section 9 of the act of March 31, 1870, and re-enacted as section 230 of the Civil Code, was a radical departure from existing law. It may be said to have inaugurated a new era in the rights which society accorded to children born out of wedlock. A note to the section (Civ. Code, Deering, 1915) states that it was based on Field's draft, New York Civil Code, section 116. Stats. 1869–70, p. 531, § 9. Speaking of it our Code commissioners said:

> "This provision, like the rest, is new, but is so manifestly just, and the present state of the law so unmerciful to innocent children, that it is presumed that no objection will be made to the change. * * *"

At the session of the Legislature following the adoption of the Codes section 215 of the Civil Code was enacted. It was but the incorporation into the Code of a provision of law which had existed as section 8 of the Act approved March 31, 1870, already mentioned. The terms of that section are set forth above; and it will be seen that it provided that the mere marriage of the parents of an illegitimate child legitimated him. It was now no longer necessary, as required by section 230, that the father publicly acknowledge him, receive him into his family, or otherwise treat him as a legitimate child. This is perhaps the most liberal of all enactments removing the disabilities of children born out of wedlock; but under the argument of appellants a child made legitimate by compliance with the requirements of this section has not even the rights of succession that the statute of 1850 (re-enacted as section 1387, Civ. Code) conferred upon illegitimates complying with its terms, for the mere marriage of the parents of the illegitimate was not sufficient to confer even those limited rights; there was the further requirement that the father acknowledge the child and adopt him into his family.

Nor, under the construction of the statutes concerning legitimacy contended for by appellants, would an illegitimate child legitimated by section 215, Civil Code, have any right to succeed to the estate even of his father, for under that construction his rights of inheritance being exclusively governed by section 1387, it would be necessary that the father acknowledge in writing his paternity of the child—a condition not required by section 215. Thus we would have a case where a child made legitimate by statute is incapable of inheriting from his own father, much less from his father's kindred, although by the provisions of section 1388 of the Civil Code both the father and the father's kindred are given the right to succeed to his estate. If the construction of the law contended for by appellants were correct we would have the anomalous condition that 60 or 70 years after the original enactment of section 1387 in 1850, and in spite of the increasingly liberal and humane tendency of legislation in respect to illegitimate children, a child to-day, made legitimate by statute, has more restricted rights of succession than an illegitimate child in the year 1850.

It is suggested that sections 215 and 230 are mere statutes of status, and confer no rights of succession, and that those rights must be sought in the sections of the Code dealing with succession. That is perfectly true; but the fallacy of appellants' position is that they ignore the changed status of the respondents, and seek to relegate them to section 1387 dealing with the rights of succession of illegitimates, and to exclude them from section 1386, which deals with the rights of legitimates.

[7] If sections 230 and 1387 were concurrent and conflicting legislation, there would be some force in the contention that the rights of succession of a child legitimated by section 230 should be governed by section 1387, for it could be argued that as the same requirements are found in both sections, it was intended that although on the one hand compliance with them conferred legitimacy, yet when it came to the question of succession such compliance did not put the illegitimate in the situation of a legitimate, but only had the limited effect stated in section 1387, and that their apparent conflict should be reconciled in that way. But the re-enactment of the provisions of section 1387 did not make them concurrent legislation with section 230. The rule in this regard is that:

> "Where there are two conflicting sections in a Code or other compilation of statutes, that section prevails which is derived from a source which may be considered as the latest expression of the lawmaking power, without regard to the relative position of such sections in the Code." 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 735, citing Lamar v. Allen, 108 Ga. 158, 33 S. E. 958.

As we have seen, the provisions of section 230 were later legislation than that contained in section 1387; and the latter section means no more and can be given no other construction than it theretofore had, when its effect was solely to give certain restricted rights of inheritance to illegitimates as such. It is obvious that there is no conflict between such legislation and a subsequent law conferring legitimacy, even though incidentally the same conditions are made sufficient to confer legitimacy which formerly only gave restricted rights of inheritance.

Moreover, the proposition that section 1387 is not to be regarded as a limitation upon section 230 has been directly decided by the Supreme Court of this state in the case of In re Jessup, 81 Cal. 408, 447, 21 Pac. 976, 980 (6 L. R. A. 594) wherein it is said:

> "We cannot agree to the proposition that the provision contained in section 1387 of the Civil Code, that 'every illegitimate child is an heir of the person who, in writing, signed in the presence of a competent witness, acknowledges himself to be the father of such child,' is a limitation upon section 230, and excludes an illegitimate child, adopted as provided in the latter section, from the inheritance. If so, section 230 would be deprived of much of its force. * * * Section 230 expressly provides that upon the adoption of a child as therein provided, it shall 'be deemed to be legitimate for all purposes.'"

[8] That the words "children" and "lawful issue" when found in statutes of succession are not to be confined to their strict common-law signification was decided by our Supreme Court in the Estate of Wardell, 57 Cal. 484, 491, where it is said:

> "If courts were now to restrict the word to its common-law meaning, all children born of an unlawful marriage, all children by adoption or acknowledgment of their father, and all children whose parents intermarried subsequent to their birth, would be excluded from rights of inheritance or succession. But by statute, the offspring of marriages null in law (section 84, Civ. Code), children born out of wedlock whose parents subsequently intermarried (section 215, Id.), and children by acknowledgment or adoption of their father (sections 224, 227, 228, and 230, Id.), are all legitimate. These, although incapacitated at common law from succeeding to any rights of their father, are regarded for all purposes as legitimate from the time of their birth. * * * Hence the term 'children,' as used in section 1307 of the law of succession, must relate to status, not to origin —to the capacity to inherit, not to the legality of the relations which may have existed between those of whom they may have been begotten. The word has, therefore, a statutory and not a common-law meaning; and its meaning includes all children upon whom has been conferred by law the capacity of inheritance."

[9] Finally, the contention is made that the respondents do not come within the terms either of section 215 or section 230, for the reason that these sections, as the appellants claim, refer only to minor children. It is true that in the Estate of Pico, 56 Cal. 413, section 230 was thus limited in its effect; but the reason it was so limited, as is apparent from the opinion in that case, was that the section comprises part of a chapter of the Code on adoption, and the language of the section is that the illegitimate child, by the acts therein enumerated, is "adopted" as a legitimate child, and thereby becomes legitimate. As the provisions of the Code relating to adoption apply only to minors, the court concluded that the section could not apply to one who had attained his majority because he could not be adopted. But section 215 is not included in the chapter on adoption; and the reasoning in the Estate of Pico, supra, has no application to it. Its language makes no distinction between minors and majors, and there is nothing in the reason or necessity of the enactment which would warrant this court in confining its application to children who had not attained their majority.

It results from what we have said that the respondents, having been legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their parents, come within the terms of section 1386 of the Civil Code, and that within the meaning of that section they are "lawful issue" and take by representation.

The portion of the judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

BASTARDS 🔑101—RIGHT TO INHERITANCE—LINEAL KINDRED — STATUTES — "ILLEGITIMATE CHILD."

Civ. Code, § 215, provides that an illegitimate child becomes legitimate by the subsequent marriage of its parents, and section 230 provides that when the father of an illegitimate child publicly acknowledges it as his own or adopts it into his family, it is deemed for all purposes legitimate. Section 1386 prescribes rights of inheritance of legitimate children, and section 1387 provides that an illegitimate child does not represent his father or mother by inheriting any part of the estate of his or her kindred, lineal or collateral, unless before his death his parents shall have intermarried, and his father thereafter acknowledges him or adopts him into his family, in which case such child and all legitimate children are considered brothers and sisters, and section 1388 provides for succession to the property of an illegitimate child. Held, that the term "illegitimate child," as used in the last two sections, includes illegitimate children who have been legitimated; that section 1387 does not provide any rule contrary to section 1386 as to children legitimated by intermarriage or acknowledgment, so that such children inherited a share of the estate of the mother of their deceased father.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Arturo Wolf and Maria Julia Wolf against Charles Funkenstein Gall and others. Application for hearing denied.

PER CURIAM. We concur in the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal as to the capacity of the respondents to inherit from Tobe Funkenstein, through their deceased father, Newman Wolf, but in denying the application for a hearing in this court we deem it proper to say that we are not entirely in accord with all the reasoning by which that conclusion is reached by that court. We cannot agree either that section 1387, Civil Code, has no application to children situated as are the respondents, or that, fairly construed, that section excludes respondents from taking a share of the estate of the mother of their deceased father. To our minds the term "illegitimate child," as used in both sections 1387 and 1388, includes illegitimate children who have been legitimated, and in so far as they lay down rules of succession contrary to the general rules found in section 1386, Civil Code, must prevail as to any child born illegitimate. See Estate of De Cigaran, 150 Cal. 682, 89 Pac. 833. But, in our opinion, section 1387 should be construed as not providing any rule contrary to section 1386 in so far as children situated as respondents are concerned. When the section expressly provides, as it does, that an illegitimate child "does not represent his father or mother by inheriting any part of the estate of his or her kindred, either lineal or collateral, unless, before his death, his parents shall have intermarried, and his father, after such marriage, acknowledges him as his child, or adopts him into his family," it by necessary implication recognizes the right of one whose parents intermarry and whose father, after such marriage, acknowledges him as his child or adopts him into his family, to represent his father or mother by inheriting from the kindred of either, either lineal or collateral, just as a legitimate child would inherit under section 1386, Civil Code. We do not believe that the succeeding clause, commencing with the words "in which case such child and all the legitimate children are considered brothers and sisters," etc., should be construed as a limitation on this right. This cause was manifestly intended to remove all doubt as to the right of brothers and sisters to inherit from each other where one of them is legitimated as provided in the preceding part of the section, and gives the legitimated child a right of direct inheritance from brothers and sisters, in addition to the right of inheritance by representation conferred by the preceding clause. The result is the same as that reached by Mr. Justice Kerrigan in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, viz. that section 1386 does apply in this case, and that under its provisions respondents are, in view of the facts, heirs of Tobe Funkenstein.

The application for a hearing in this court is denied.

MELVIN and LAWLOR, JJ., dissent from the order denying a hearing in this court.

DODDS v. SPRING et al. (L. A. 3846.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 13, 1917.)

1. Mortgages 🔑282(1) — Conveyance of Mortgaged Property — Personal Liability.

The mere fact that a deed recited the property was subject to mortgage, but did not recite grantee's personal liability, did not relieve him from assumption of such liability, nor prevent equities against him from being asserted against one who purchased notes after maturity without inquiry, though knowing his transferor had once owned the property subject to the mortgage, and took assignments of the mortgage and the trust deed supporting the notes, since the promise by the mortgagor's grantee personally to be answerable for the payment of the mortgage may appear and bind the grantee because of a clause in the deed or by a separate written instrument, which need not be executed with the formalities necessary to a deed, and which, if preceding the execution of the deed of conveyance, is not so merged in the latter that the omission of the assumption clause from the latter will release the buyer from his prior covenant.

2. Frauds, Statute of 🔑18(3)—Mortgages 🔑280(3) — Agreement of Purchaser of Mortgaged Property to be Liable for Debt.

The agreement of the purchaser of property subject to mortgage to be personally liable for the debt may rest wholly in parol, and is not within the statute of frauds.

3. MORTGAGES ⊂⊃318—PURCHASE OF EQUITY OF REDEMPTION — ASSUMPTION OF DEBT — PAYMENT—EFFECT—STATUTE.

If the purchaser of an equity of redemption has assumed payment of the debt, or otherwise made himself personally liable for it, the payment of the debt will extinguish the mortgage, and he cannot take an assignment of it to himself, under Civ. Code, § 1473, providing that full performance of an obligation, by the party whose duty it is to perform, or by any other person, in his behalf, and with his assent, if accepted by the creditor, extinguishes it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 956–961.]

4. PAYMENT ⊂⊃52—EXTINGUISHMENT OF OBLIGATION.

The full performance of an obligation by any one for the principal with his assent, if accepted by the creditor, extinguishes the obligation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 136.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Suit by O. S. Dodds against A. Spring and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Rupert B. Turnbull, Bennett, Turnbull & Thompson, Flint, Gray & Barker, and Tobias R. Archer, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Ralph E. Swing, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sued to foreclose a mortgage made by G. O. Trauzettel and his wife, Georgia A. Trauzettel. The date of the said mortgage was December 1, 1908, and it was intended, as the court found, to cover principal and interest representing two loans evidenced by promissory notes, one dated December 1, 1908, for the principal sum of $1,500 due three years thereafter, and the other for $1,160, bearing date April 1, 1909, due two years later. By the terms of the mortgage it apparently covered the west half of section 19, township 2 south, range 1 west, S. B. B. and M., in Riverside county, and was recorded April 8, 1909. The complaint in this action was filed June 30, 1911, and a lis pendens was placed of record on that day. Judgment was given in favor of O. S. Dodds, the plaintiff, and this appeal is by A. Spring, one of the defendants, who claimed rights in the property superior to those of the plaintiff.

It appeared from the findings of the court that G. O. Trauzettel acquired title to the north half of said section 19 prior to August 20, 1908, and remained such owner until October 10, 1910. On December 10, 1910, he parted with his interest in the north half of said section together with other property by a grant deed to William A. Kjellman, one of the defendants in this action.

Prior to the making of the notes and the mortgage in favor of Dodds, the Trauzettels had borrowed from John Galli $3,000, evidenced by a note, payable in three years, bearing date August 20, 1908, secured by a trust deed in which L. W. Clark was named as trustee. On the same day, August 20, 1908, the Trauzettels had borrowed $1,000 from Mary Holmes Wilson, evidenced by a note payable in three years and supported by a mortgage of even date. The trust deed and the mortgage were recorded, the former having priority. Both the mortgage and the trust deed were upon the north half of said section 19, and the date of their recordation was August 25, 1908.

Subsequently William A. Kjellman and G. O. Trauzettel entered into correspondence looking to the exchange of the latter's property in California for the former's land in Texas. There was an escrow agreement in writing whereby William A. Kjellman assumed and agreed to pay incumbrances aggregating $8,920 upon the property in Riverside county and other land. The transaction involving the exchange of the lands in Texas for those in California was consummated, and on December 12, 1910, a deed bearing date October 10, 1910, was placed of record. The deed recited that the property conveyed (which was the north half and the southeast quarter of section 19) was subject to the note for $3,000 and the trust deed in favor of Galli, the note for $1,000, and the mortgage to Mary Holmes Wilson. It also specified liens of a mortgage dated September 16, 1908, to secure the payment of a note of $1,120 in favor of O. S. Dodds and another dated December 1, 1908, to secure a note of $1,500, also in favor of the plaintiff. The plaintiff did not seek to foreclose the mortgage dated September 16, 1908, but, as shown by the testimony and found by the court, the note for $1,120 was merged into and paid by the later note for $1,500.

The court also found that when the mortgages to plaintiff were made the Trauzettels owned only the north half of section 19, and that their intention was to mortgage that part of the section. By an amendment to his pleadings plaintiff had asked for a reformation of the contract in that particular, and by the judgment it was reformed as prayed.

Further findings were to the effect that William Kjellman paid to Galli and Wilson the sums due them, and thereby satisfied their claims; that after the filing of the lis pendens in this case O. J. Kjellman executed and delivered to A. Spring her note for $3,000, secured by a mortgage on the northeast quarter of section 19; that at that time Spring had no notice of the fact that plaintiff's mortgage was intended to cover the north half of said section; that on November 21, 1912, William A. Kjellman delivered the Galli note and the accompanying trust deed and the Wilson note to defendant, A. Spring, and assigned the Wilson mortgage to said Spring, and that both said notes were then past due; that they had been fully paid and extinguished, and, together with the mortgage and the deed of trust, had ceased to be of any force.

Regarding a purported sale to Spring on December 11, 1912, by L. W. Clark under and pursuant to the Galli trust deed of the north half of section 19, it was held that the trustee had no authority to make it.

Among the conclusions of law was one to the effect that Spring's mortgage was prior to that of plaintiff on the northeast quarter of section 19.

Appellant insists that, since the record title was in O. J. Kjellman when the Galli and Wilson notes were transferred to him by William A. Kjellman, and since the deed from the Trauzettels merely recited that the property was "subject to" the Dodds' mortgage, he had no notice of William A. Kjellman's assumption of personal liability, and was therefore a purchaser in good faith of the Galli and Wilson notes and liens in the hands, not of the mortgagee, but of a third party.

It is true that William A. Kjellman divested himself of title by a deed to O. J. Kjellman on January 5, 1911. The appellant insists that the purchase by William A. Kjellman of the Galli and Wilson incumbrances after he had parted with the title to the land did not work a merger. He admits that as between Mr. Kjellman and the Trauzettels an estoppel may apply, but insists that he had no notice (and could have none) of the personal assumption of the mortgage debt by William A. Kjellman in and by the terms of the unrecorded escrow agreement.

[1] But the mere fact that the deed to Kjellman from the Trauzettels did not recite his personal liability would not relieve him from an assumption of such burden nor prevent equities against him from being asserted as against one who purchased notes after maturity and took assignments of the mortgage and the trust deed supporting said notes. The promise by the mortgagor's grantee personally to be answerable for the payment of the mortgage may appear and bind such grantee because of a clause in the deed or by a separate written instrument wihch need not be executed with the formalities necessary to a deed, and which, if preceding the execution of the deed of conveyance, is not so merged in the deed that the omission of the assumption clause from the latter instrument will release the vendee from his prior covenant.

[2] Indeed, the agreement may rest wholly in parol, and in such case is not within the statute of frauds. 27 Cyc., 1344"d"; Jones on Mortgages, § 748; Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 133, 41 Pac. 868. When appellant received assignments of the Galli and Wilson interests the notes were more than a year past due. He knew that his transferror had once owned the property subject to the mortgages, yet, as he testified, he made no inquiry of the mortgagor respecting any personal assumption of the debt by Mr. Kjellman.

[3] If the purchaser of an equity of redemption has assumed payment of the debt or has otherwise made himself personally liable for it, the payment of the debt will extinguish the mortgage, and he cannot take an assignment of it to himself. 27 Cyc. 1331. Section 1473 of the Civil Code provides that:

> "Full performance of an obligation, by the party whose duty it is to perform it, or by any other person on his behalf, and with his assent, if accepted by the creditor, extinguishes it."

In the early case of Gordon v. Wansey, 21 Cal. 77, the facts were as follows: Certain negotiable promissory notes were assigned before maturity to one of the makers and by him after maturity to the plaintiff. It was held that the transaction amounted to payment, and that the notes became functus officio and were not revived by the assignment to the plaintiff. In Yule v. Bishop, 133 Cal. 574, 62 Pac. 68, 65 Pac. 1094, the same principle is announced.

[4] The full performance of an obligation by any one for the principal with his assent, if accepted by the creditor extinguishes the obligation. See, also, Crystal v. Hutton, 1 Cal. App. 251–256, 81 Pac. 1115; Bray v. Cohn, 7 Cal. App. 124, 93 Pac. 893.

The appellant therefore took the note long past due subject to all existing defenses. Elgin v. Hill, 27 Cal. 373–375; James v. Yaeger, 86 Cal. 184–188, 24 Pac. 1005; Adams v. Hopkins, 144 Cal. 19–34, 77 Pac. 712.

No further assignments of error require discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

CONNER v. BANK OF BAKERSFIELD.
(L. A. 3859.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 13, 1917.)

1. Banks and Banking ⚷145—Certification of Check by Bank—Effect.

By certifying a check a bank becomes bound as a direct and original promisor to the payee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 419–433.]

2. Banks and Banking ⚷145 — Certified Check—Measure of Damages.

As the obligation of a bank on a check certified by it is one to pay money only, by the direct provision of Civ. Code, § 3302, the measure of damages for breach of such obligation is the amount due by the terms of the obligation with interest thereon.

3. Banks and Banking ⚷155—Action on Certified Check—Pleading—Complaint—Sufficiency.

A complaint, alleging that a check payable to bearer and certified by defendant bank was presented by plaintiff to defendant and payment refused, stated a cause of action for recovery of the face of the check, with interest from date of presentation, and the sufficiency of the complaint to state a cause of action was not impaired by the fact that plaintiff asked for more items of damage than are recoverable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 536–538.]

4. Pleading 🔑106(2) — Dilatory Pleas — Another Action Pending.

The plea of another action pending is dilatory in its nature, and is not favored.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 221–223.]

5. Interpleader 🔑32—Relief Awarded.

In interpleader, the only question that can be litigated between plaintiff and defendants is whether the plaintiff is entitled to compel the defendants to interplead with respect to their claims to the fund or debt alleged by plaintiff to be in his hands, or due from him, and defendants are entitled to aver and prove any facts to show that the plaintiff is not entitled to maintain his bill, but they cannot, by counterclaim or cross-complaint, seek affirmative relief against the plaintiff concerning matters not embraced within his bill.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interpleader, Cent. Dig. §§ 72, 73.]

6. Interpleader 🔑33—Consent of Defendants—Effect.

In interpleader by a bank, if defendants had appeared and consented to an interlocutory order, requiring them to interplead concerning their claims to a check certified by the bank, and to consequent dismissal of the bank, each of defendants might have been precluded from asserting that the bank was under any further liability arising out of the check.

7. Abatement and Revival 🔑17—Demurrer—Another Action Pending.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 3, providing that a defendant may demur to the complaint when it appears on the face thereof that there is another action pending by the same parties for the same cause, in an action against a bank on a check certified by it, a plea of another action pending, relying upon an interpleader suit brought by the bank against this plaintiff, and another not shown by the complaint to have raised the same issues, should have been raised by answer and a demurrer to the complaint on that ground, was not properly sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Cent. Dig. §§ 123–126; Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 427.]

8. Pleading 🔑111 — Defenses — Another Action Pending.

The defense of another action pending does not authorize a judgment on the merits, but the only relief to which the defendant is entitled upon establishing such defense is a judgment that the action abate.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Sarah L. Conner, executrix of the last will of C. L. Conner, deceased, against the Bank of Bakersfield. From a judgment sustaining defendant's demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 29 Cal. App. 153, 154 Pac. 869.

C. C. Cowgill, of Sonoma, and Peter A. Breen, of San Francisco, for appellant. J. W. Wiley, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered upon the sustaining of the defendant's demurrer to the second amended complaint.

The complaint in question alleged that on July 21, 1910, one Planz drew his check for $3,799.66 on the defendant, the Bank of Bakersfield, payable to "Kern Valley Bank or bearer." Negotiable paper, so drawn, is payable to the bearer. Civ. Code, § 3102. On the same day the check was certified by the defendant bank. On May 19, 1911, the plaintiff presented the check to the defendant, but the defendant refused to pay the same, and it has never been paid to plaintiff. On July 20, 1911, the defendant bank commenced an action of interpleader against the plaintiff and Planz in which the plaintiff and Planz "were required to and did interplead together concerning their claims to the said check and to the said money called for thereby." Plaintiff and Planz appeared in said action, and thereafter the court rendered judgment therein in favor of the plaintiff that she, as executrix, was entitled to have paid to her the amount of said check. It is not alleged that this judgment has become final, and the action of interpleader is apparently still pending.

The complaint alleges, further, that plaintiff was compelled to employ counsel in said action, and to expend money for costs and traveling expenses, and has been deprived of the use of said sum of $3,799.66, and of interest thereon, from the 19th day of May, 1911. It is also alleged that the plaintiff has suffered general damages in the further sum of $2,350. The prayer is for judgment for interest on the amount of the check, together with the amount of the various other items of damage alleged.

The demurrer specified as grounds: (1) That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and (2) that there is another action pending between the same parties for the same cause. This demurrer having been sustained without leave to amend, judgment was entered that the plaintiff take nothing by the action, and that the defendant recover from plaintiff its costs.

[1] By certifying the check the bank became bound as a direct and original promisor to the payee. 1 Morse on Banks and Banking (4th Ed.) § 414; 5 R. C. L. 523, 524.

[2] Its obligation was one "to pay money only," and the measure of damages for the breach of such obligation is "the amount due by the terms of the obligation, with interest thereon." Civ. Code, § 3302.

[3] The complaint alleges that the check, payable to bearer was presented by plaintiff to the certifying bank, and payment refused.

Clearly, therefore, the pleading stated a cause of action for the recovery of the face of the check, with interest from the date of presentation. The sufficiency of the complaint as stating a cause of action is, of course, not impaired by the fact that the plaintiff may have asked for more items of damage than are recoverable.

[4] Nor was the demurrer properly sustained upon the second ground specified. The plea of another action pending is dilatory in its nature, and is not favored. 1 C. J. 28; Thompson v. Lyon, 14 Cal. 42; Larco v. Clements, 36 Cal. 132. It may be raised by demurrer (Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 3), but not unless the complaint shows affirmatively that the prior action possessed such characteristics as to make the plea available. One of these requisites is that the causes of action and the issues in the two suits must be substantially the same. 1 C. J. 61; Martin v. Splivalo, 69 Cal. 615, 11 Pac. 484; Heilbron v. Canal Co., 75 Cal. 433, 17 Pac. 535, 7 Am. St. Rep. 183; Hall v. Susskind, 109 Cal. 203, 41 Pac. 1012; Howard v. Hewitt, 139 Cal. 614, 73 Pac. 414. The former action here relied upon, one of interpleader, was begun some two months after a cause of action had, under the facts alleged in the present complaint, accrued to the plaintiff in this action. So far as appears from the face of the complaint, the plaintiff then had a right to recover two months' interest. It cannot be determined from the record before us whether this right was involved in the interpleader suit. In interpleader suits—

> "there may always be a twofold contest: First, as to the right of the plaintiff to bring the suit and to force the defendants to interplead; and, if such right is maintained, the litigation among the defendants. * * * Whether the plaintiff shall be permitted to maintain such an action is first determined, and, if his right is sustained, an interlocutory decree is entered, requiring the defendants to litigate their claims inter sese." S. F. Savings Union v. Long, 123 Cal. 107, 55 Pac. 708.

[5] The only question that can be litigated between the plaintiff and the defendants in such action is whether the plaintiff is entitled to compel the defendants to interplead with respect to their conflicting claims to the fund or debt alleged by plaintiff to be in his hands, or due from him. The defendants cannot litigate in the interpleader suit any other claim against the plaintiff. 23 Cyc. 27; Adams v. Dixon, 19 Ga. 513, 65 Am. Dec. 608; Williams v. Matthews, 47 N. J. Eq. 196, 20 Atl. 261. "Defendants are entitled to aver and prove any facts which show that the complainant is not entitled to maintain his bill" (23 Cyc. 27), but they cannot, by counterclaim or cross-complaint, seek affirmative relief against the plaintiff concerning matters not embraced within his bill. Wakeman v. Kingsland, 46 N. J. Eq. 113, 18 Atl. 680. "The only relief which a defendant can have against the plaintiff in such a suit is to have the action dismissed." Los Angeles v. Amidor, 140 Cal. 400, 73 Pac. 1049.

[6] It is entirely consistent with the allegations of the complaint in this case that the bank, in beginning the interpleader suit against this appellant and Planz, conceded no liability on its part beyond the principal sum of the check. If the defendants had come in and consented to an interlocutory order requiring them to interplead, and to the consequent dismissal of the bank, each of them might have been precluded from asserting that the bank was under any further liability arising out of the check. S. F. Savings Union v. Long, 123 Cal. 107, 55 Pac. 708; Woodmen of the World v. Rutledge, 133 Cal. 640, 65 Pac. 1105.

[7] But it does not appear that there was any such consent. For all that the complaint shows, this appellant may have resisted an order of interpleader upon the very ground that the bank owed her interest on the check from the date of presentation by her, and that the bank had not tendered payment of such interest. If this was the situation, the interpleader suit did not involve the entire cause of action presented by the present complaint. An inspection of the record of the former action would be required to determine how far the causes of action and the issues in the two suits are identical. The plea should therefore in this case be raised by answer rather than by demurrer to the complaint.

[8] Furthermore, the judgment here given was one on the merits. The defense of another action pending does not authorize such a judgment. The only relief to which a defendant is entitled upon establishing this defense is a judgment that the action abate. Larco v. Clements, 36 Cal. 132; Casey v. Jordan, 68 Cal. 246, 9 Pac. 92, 305; Coubrough v. Adams, 70 Cal. 374, 11 Pac. 634; Leonard v. Flynn, 89 Cal. 535, 26 Pac. 1097, 23 Am. St. Rep. 500.

The judgment is reversed.

MILLER v. OLIVER et al. (Sac. 2272.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 13, 1917.)

1. QUIETING TITLE 🔑32 — RECEIVERS — APPOINTMENT—STATUTE.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 564, subd. 1, allowing the appointment of receiver in certain instances, and subdivision 6, providing that a receiver may be appointed where receivers have heretofore been appointed by the usages of courts of equity, where the plaintiff was in actual possession of property, claiming ownership and the right of possession and full control, no receiver could be appointed in an action to have plaintiff adjudged owner of the property but sole remedy of defendant corporation claiming ownership and the right to possession is at law to recover possession in which a receiver may not be appointed.

2. QUIETING TITLE ⚷32—INJUNCTION AND RECEIVER—APPOINTMENT—STATUTE.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 564, subds. 1, 6, plaintiff claims to be the owner of real estate, and seeks the cancellation of the deed under which it is claimed that the defendant corporation is the owner and entitled to immediate possession. Defendants' proof is that defendant corporation is in actual possession and management, except as complete actual possession is impaired by the occupancy by plaintiff of a dwelling house and his use of the barns, all under permission and as an occupant merely by sufferance. Plaintiff claims to be the owner and entitled to control. It was alleged that plaintiff was interfering with the management of the property by the corporation, even to its practical exclusion therefrom, to the great injury of the property and the corporation. Held that, even although the facts warranted an injunction to prohibit plaintiff from interfering with the control and management of the property, defendants were not entitled to the appointment of a receiver.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. § 68.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Action by Charles E. Miller against Harriett A. Oliver (née Madigan) and others. From an order appointing a receiver pendente lite on application of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Order reversed.

See, also, 163 Pac. 357.

Webster, Webster & Blewett, of Stockton, for appellant. Clary & Louttit and A. H. Ashley, all of Stockton, for respondents. A H. Carpenter, of Stockton, amicus curiæ.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order appointing a receiver pendente lite on the application of defendants. The order was one appointing W. J. Herson receiver "of the real and personal property mentioned" in the pleadings for the purpose of protecting and caring for the same, and to manage the same as directed by the court. It was provided in the order that the plaintiff and his wife should not be removed from the premises unless so required by a subsequent order, and that plaintiff might be employed, if the receiver so elects, to assist him in such care and protection. The order summarized the purpose as follows:

> "In other words, the receiver is to protect and substantially preserve in statu quo the property of the parties to this action, but, unless necessary or unless ordered by this court, not to interfere with the residence of the plaintiff and his wife on said premises."

The action was instituted by plaintiff for the purpose of having it adjudged that he was the owner of the real property described in the complaint; that a conveyance thereof made by him to defendant Miller Farm Company on June 21, 1907, was made without consideration, and upon its promise and that of defendants Oliver that the premises would be reconveyed to him upon demand, and by reason of undue influence on the part of said Olivers. He asked for a decree declaring him the owner of such property and canceling the deed to the Miller Farm Company. The allegations of the complaint were denied in the answer filed by the three defendants, and in that portion of the answer styled a "further and separate defense herein," embracing 55 pages of the printed transcript, defendants set up many matters upon which they asked, in addition to a judgment that defendant corporation is the absolute and unqualified owner in fee of such real property, for affirmative relief of various kinds including relief as to certain personal property used in connection with the realty, which was farm property, and also in the matter of determining the relative rights of defendant J. E. Oliver and plaintiff in the shares of stock of the Miller Farm Company. To prevent interference pending the litigation by plaintiff and his wife with the real and personal property alleged to belong to the corporation both a receiver and an injunction were asked. It was upon these allegations and certain affidavits which add nothing that is material to the question before us that the order appointing the receiver was made.

We are unable to find in the record legal support for the order appealed from.

The matter of the relative rights of J. E. Oliver and the plaintiff in the shares of stock of defendant corporation and the proper disposition of said shares is, of course, not material in this connection. Nothing in regard thereto assists in determining the question whether a receiver should have been appointed to take charge and management of the real property claimed by the plaintiff and defendant corporation and the personal property of the latter located thereon. The "property or fund" which Oliver was seeking to subject to his alleged claim against plaintiff was the shares of stock in defendant corporation, and not the real and personal property of the corporation. Nothing in subdivision 1 of section 564, Code of Civil Procedure, authorized the appointment of the receiver on the application of the defendants, and the order must be sustained, if at all, as one authorized by subdivision 6 of said section, by which it is provided that a receiver may be appointed "in all other cases where receivers have heretofore been appointed by the usages of courts of equity."

[1, 2] So far as we can see from the record, the situation as to the real and personal property, so far as material, is as follows: The plaintiff claims to be the owner of all the property, and seeks the cancellation of the deed under which defendants claim that the corporation is the owner and entitled to the immediate possession. Defendants' showing is substantially that the defendant corporation was in actual possession and management of all the property except in so far as complete actual possession was impaired by the occupancy by plaintiff of the dwelling house on the realty as a dwelling place, and the use of the barns, all under permission of defendant corporation and as an occupant merely by sufferance. Being so on the property, he was claiming to be the owner and entitled to control it. In great detail it was alleged that he was interfering in various ways with the management of the property by the corporation, even to its practical exclusion therefrom, to the great injury of the property and the corporation owning it. We may assume for the purposes of this decision that the showing in this behalf was of such a nature that it would have sufficiently warranted the granting of an injunction to prohibit this alleged occupant by sufferance from thus interfering with the control and management of the property, on the same theory that any mere trespasser whose unlawful acts were of such a nature and so continuous as to warrant equitable relief might be enjoined. But it does not follow that a receiver might properly be appointed. Of course, if the plaintiff were in actual possession of the property, claiming ownership and the right of possession and full control, no receiver could lawfully be appointed in view of our well-settled law. The sole remedy of the corporation claiming ownership and the right to possession would be at law to recover possession, and it is settled that in such a case, under our statute, a receiver may not be appointed; for it is not a case where a receiver has "heretofore been appointed by the usages of courts of equity," or one in which such an appointment is specially authorized by any statute. See Bateman v. Superior Court, 54 Cal. 285; San Jose, etc., Bank v. Bank of Madera, 121 Cal. 545, 54 Pac. 85. The appointment of a receiver cannot be justified upon any theory that plaintiff is in actual possession of the property. So far as we can understand the theory of defendants as to the facts, the corporation is seeking to protect its property, of which it is actually in possession, from interference to its great injury and loss at the hands of another who is merely living on the land with its permission. So far as the right to a receiver is concerned, its relation to him is simply the relation of any owner in possession to an unlawful trespasser. By reason of his living upon the land, he may have greater opportunity to impede and interfere with the owner in the enjoyment of its rights of ownership and possession, but this does not affect the question. We are at a complete loss to find any good basis for a conclusion that in such a situation a receiver may be appointed on the application of the owner to take over the custody and management of the property, and protect it against such trespasses and interference.

It is thoroughly settled that, except in cases where receivers have heretofore been appointed by the usages of courts of equity, a situation expressly covered by subdivision 6 of section 564, Code of Civil Procedure, a receiver may be appointed only in such cases as the statute expressly specifies. We find no warrant for a conclusion that the usages of courts of equity support an appointment in such a situation as we have here, and it seems very clear to us that no statute authorized the appointment. Something is said about the transaction between J. E. Oliver and plaintiff constituting a trust, but the trust, if any, was one solely in relation to the shares of stock in Oliver's name claimed by plaintiff.

The order appointing a receiver is reversed.

MILLER v. OLIVER et al. (Sac. 2325.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 13, 1917. Rehearing Denied March 15, 1917.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑766—Briefs—Statute.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, which provides that the parties must print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court, where appellants did not print in their opening brief any portion of the record, and respondents in their brief call attention to this omission and object to consideration of any part of the record except the judgment roll printed in such brief, and in their reply brief appellants ignore this objection and again fail to print any part of the record, the court would be justified in affirming the judgment without further consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3101, 3126.]

2. Costs 🔑260(4) — Vexatious Appeal — Damages.

In an action to cancel a deed on the ground that plaintiff was inexperienced and induced to execute it without consideration by his mother, a defendant, who controlled him, when the findings were for defendants in all issues, and it is not claimed that the findings were not supported by substantial evidence, it is evident that there was no merit in the appeal, and that it was taken to vex, hinder, and delay, so that it was a proper case for the imposition of damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 986–991, 996.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Action by Charles E. Miller against Harriet A. Oliver and others, in which plaintiff's wife was made a party by defendants' cross-complaint. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 163 Pac. 355.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellants. A. H. Ashley and Clary & Louttit, all of Stockton, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff and his wife, who was made a party to the action by the defendants' cross-complaint, appeal from the judgment.

[1] The transcript of the record presented in support of the appeal was prepared in typewriting as provided in sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 953c provides that:

> "In filing briefs on said appeal the parties must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court."

The appellants did not print in their opening brief any portion of the record. The respondents in their brief call attention to this omission and object to our consideration of any part of the record except the judgment roll printed in said brief. In their reply brief the appellants ignore this objection and again fail to print any part of the record.

In the face of this contumacy, the court would be justified in affirming the judgment without further consideration. We have, however, examined the judgment roll and we find therein no good cause for the appeal. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff owns a farm of 629.19 acres; that he is the son of the defendant Harriet A. Oliver, and has always reposed special confidence and trust in her, and has always been guided, influenced, and controlled by her; that he was "a young man of inexperience"; that on June 21, 1907, he, his mother, then Harriet A. Madigan, and the defendant J. E. Oliver formed a corporation with the corporate name of "Miller Farm Company," and filed its articles of incorporation in the county clerk's office; that on June 22, 1907, said articles were filed in the office of the secretary of state; that on June 21, 1907, his mother persuaded him to execute a deed purporting to convey said farm to Miller Farm Company; that it was made without consideration and upon the promise of the other defendants that the farm would be reconveyed to plaintiff upon his demand; that said corporation at that time did not exist. He asks that he be adjudged to be the owner of the farm and that said deed be canceled and the farm reconveyed to him.

[2] The findings are that plaintiff is not, and has not been since said deed was executed, the owner of the farm; that he was not at that time "a young man of inexperience"; that he did not then repose special trust and confidence in his mother; that she did not then guide, influence, or control him, or persuade him to execute said deed; that it was not made without consideration, nor upon any promise to reconvey to him the farm; that although it was dated on June 21, 1907, it was not delivered, and consequently not executed, until July 10, 1907; that the consideration thereof was the issuance of all except 3 of the 250 shares of stock of said corporation to J. E. Oliver, as trustee, to hold in trust for said plaintiff, to be returned to plaintiff as soon as certain moneys paid and to be paid by J. E. Oliver for the payment of plaintiff's debts and expenses were repaid to said Oliver. It is not claimed that there was not substantial evidence sufficient to support these findings.

The judgment is that plaintiff has no interest in the farm; that the deed conveyed it absolutely to said corporation; and that plaintiff take nothing. As to the stock, it declares that J. E. Oliver still holds the 247 shares of stock in trust for plaintiff and has a claim thereon for advances to and for plaintiff and for expenses regarding the trust, amounting to $15,610.61, and that, if said sum is not repaid to him within 180 days, said stock shall be sold to pay the same. These and other matters concerning the trust in the stock were put in issue by a cross-complaint and are fully supported by findings. We do not think it necessary to state these findings. Plaintiff gives no data to show that they are not supported by the evidence.

It is evident that there was no merit in the plaintiff's case, nor in this appeal. No object for taking it is apparent, except to vex, hinder, and delay the defendants. It is a proper case for the imposition of damages.

It is ordered that the judgment be affirmed, and that the defendants recover of plaintiff the sum of $100 as damages, together with costs of appeal.

We concur: SLOSS, J., LAWLOR, J.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Petition by Henry R. Woltman to probate the will of Ida Matilda Manchester, deceased. From order admitting will to probate, Walter Manchester, heir of decedent, appeals. Order reversed.

L. P. Forestell, of San Francisco, for appellant. William A. Powell, of Oakland, and Earll H. Webb, of San Francisco (George W. Chamberlain, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. The court below, upon the petition of Woltman, duly made an order admitting a certain document to probate as the last will of the decedent. From this order Walter Manchester, a brother and heir of the decedent, appeals.

The document referred to was wholly in the handwriting of the decedent. The only objection presented upon this appeal is that it was not signed by the decedent.

The document began as follows:

"January 14th, 1914.

"I, Matilda Manchester, leave and bequeath all my estate & effects, after payment of legal, funeral & certain foreign shipment expenses (as directed) to the following legatees, viz."

Then followed a statement of devises and bequests to divers persons. It ended as follows:

"Whereunto I hereby set my hand this fourteenth day of January, 1914."

The name of the decedent does not appear in or on the paper anywhere, except in the opening clause as above shown. This document was folded by the decedent and placed in an envelope, which was then sealed and indorsed by the decedent, in her own handwriting, with the words, "My will, Ida Matilda Manchester." In that condition it was, by her direction, placed in her safe deposit box, where it was found after her death. These are all the facts bearing upon the question of its execution as a will.

"An olographic will is one that is entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator himself. It is subject to no other form, and may be made in or out of this state, and need not be witnessed." Civ. Code, § 1277.

[1, 2] The will in question fits this description in all respects except the signing thereof. It was not "signed" according to the meaning of that word in ordinary usage. To "sign," as applied to a document, is defined as follows: "To affix a signature thereto; to ratify by hand or seal; to subscribe in one's own handwriting." Webster's Dic. Unquestionably, as used in the above-quoted section, it means the signature of the testator in his own handwriting written somewhere in or upon the document, with the intention by so writing it to authenticate the document. The name written at another place than the end of the document, and not for the purpose of authenticating it and indicating its completion, but merely to identify the person who is making the will, cannot be deemed to be a name "signed" to the document, unless that word is given a meaning entirely different from that which it is generally understood to have. 7 Words and Phrases, p. 6508. The Civil Code itself provides that words "are construed according to the context and the approved usage of the language." Civ. Code, § 13. If this be done, a document in which the name of the person making it appears only in the beginning thereof, and by way of recital to designate that person as the maker, in the manner above shown, cannot be said to have been signed by the maker. Estate of Walker, 110 Cal. 393, 42 Pac. 815, 30 L. R. A. 460, 52 Am. St. Rep. 104. We have here the additional indication of lack of that completion essential to a will in the closing words, "whereunto I hereby set my hand this," etc. These are apt words to precede a signature in attestation of a will or deed, and they tend to show that the decedent intended to sign immediately below, but failed to carry out that intention.

[3, 4] The defect is not cured by the words "My will" indorsed on the envelope and signed by the decedent. The manifest purpose of that indorsement was to state that the paper within the sealed envelope was the will of Ida Matilda Manchester. It shows that the decedent believed that the inclosed document was her will, and indicates that she believed that it was lawfully executed and valid. But her belief that it was a valid will, properly executed, does not make it so. The power to dispose of one's property by will and the mode by which it may be exercised are matters under legislative control, and the mode prescribed by the statute must be followed, or there is no will.

"For the purpose of determining whether a will has been properly executed, the intention of the testator in executing it is entitled to no consideration. For that purpose the court can consider only the intention of the Legislature as expressed in the language of the statute, and whether the will as presented shows a compliance with the statute." Estate of Seaman, 146 Cal. 460, 80 Pac. 701, 106 Am. St. Rep. 53, 2 Ann. Cas. 726; Estate of Walker, 110 Cal. 391, 42 Pac. 815, 30 L. R. A. 460, 52 Am. St. Rep. 104.

If the decedent had used a printed form of will, filled the blank spaces as she desired, and had duly signed it, without attesting witnesses, the document would show her testamentary intentions as satisfactorily as the document she here prepared; but it would not have been a valid will. Estate of Billings, 64 Cal. 427, 1 Pac. 701. The act of signing is essential. An intention proven by other means will not serve the purpose.

There is no force in the argument that the indorsement on the envelope can be treated as a part of the document inclosed, as if it were an additional page attached thereto to give room for the signature. The circumstances are utterly inconsistent with the idea that the indorsement was made for any such purpose. They show that it constituted no part of the paper designated as "my will" within the sealed envelope. Warwick v. Warwick, 86 Va. 596, 10 S. E. 843, 6 L. R. A. 775.

It is claimed that the decisions in Estate of Stratton, 112 Cal. 513, 44 Pac. 1028, and Estate of Camp, 134 Cal. 233, 66 Pac. 227, are opposed to the foregoing conclusions. In Estate of Stratton the olographic will was duly signed at the end, but below the signature were the words "my husband Thomas Stratton." Discussing the effect of these words as part of the document, the court held that they were intended to name the husband as a legatee; that they were merely displaced by the testator, and should be read as though written at the beginning or end of the last clause, in which the legatee was designated only by the pronoun "he." In this discussion the court said:

"The statute does not require that an olographic will shall be 'subscribed by the testator at the end thereof.' It is sufficient that it be 'signed' by him, and this signing may be at the beginning or in any part of the document"—citing Estate of Walker, supra.

In Estate of Camp, proof that the final clause of an olographic will, including the signature of the testator at the end thereof, had been torn off and destroyed after the testator's death, was duly made by two credible witnesses, as required by section 1339, Code of Civil Procedure, and this was held to be sufficient proof of the authenticity of the will. The initial clause also contained the name of the testator. The court said that this also established the fact that the document was intended by him to be his last will, and that "the writing by him of his name in that clause was itself a sufficient signature."

[5, 6] The declarations in these cases are entirely consistent with the rule stated in Estate of Walker, supra, that:

"To sign an instrument or document is to make any mark upon it in token of knowledge, approval, acceptance, or obligation. The signature is the sign thus made."

In neither of them was there any discussion, or need of discussion, as to the kind of proof permissible to establish the fact that the signature appearing in an olographic will, though not at the usual place at the end of the document was nevertheless intended as a signature in execution thereof. They do not in the least control our decision of this question. The true rule, as we conceive it to be, is that, wherever placed, the fact that it was intended as an executing signature must satisfactorily appear on the face of the document itself. If it is at the end of the document, the universal custom of mankind forces the conclusion that it was appended as an execution, if nothing to the contrary appears. If placed elsewhere, it is for the court to say, from an inspection of the whole document, its language as well as its form, and the relative position of its parts, whether or not there is a positive and satisfactory inference from the document itself that the signature was so placed with the intent that it should there serve as a token of execution. If such inference thus appears, the execution may be considered as proven by such signature.

This rule has the support of the better reasoned decisions of other jurisdictions. Thus, in Waller v. Waller, 1 Grat. (Va.) 474, 42 Am. Dec. 564, where the subject is elaborately discussed, the court says that the signing of the will is required as proof "that the act is a complete, concluded act," and that "the signing must be such as, upon the face, and from the frame of the instrument, appears to have been intended to give it authenticity. It must appear that the name, so written, was regarded as a signature; that the instrument was regarded as complete without further signature and the paper itself must show this." In Warwick v. Warwick, supra, the will began as follows: "I, Abraham Warwick, declare this to be my last will and testament," But the testator's name did not occur elsewhere in the will, and there was no declaration in the document that the signature at the beginning was written for the purpose of authentication or execution. The court held that the signature was not "affixed in such a manner as to make it manifest that the name was intended as a signature." To the same effect are Catlett v. Catlett, 55 Mo. 339; Crutcher v. Crutcher, 30 Tenn. (11 Humph.) 384; Armant's Succession, 43 La. Ann. 310, 9 South. 50, 26 Am. St. Rep. 183; In re Tyrrell's Estate, 17 Ariz. 418, 153 Pac. 767; French v. French, 14 W. Va. 479. And in the recent decision in Estate of Dombrowski, 163 Cal. 295, 125 Pac. 235, we said:

> "No doubt a subscription or signing of any kind will not constitute a valid execution of a will unless made with the intention, on the part of the testator, of finally and completely authenticating the will."

This was said of an attested will, but that it was not supposed to state a rule confined to attested wills is shown by the fact that Waller v. Waller, supra, is cited as an application of it.

The few decisions to the effect that, where the name of the testator appears only in the initial clause of an olographic will, the will may be considered as "signed" within the meaning of statutes similar to ours, are all based on the supposed authority of the English case of Lemayne v. Stanley, 3 Lev. 1, 83 Eng. Reprint, 545, decided in 1681. The will there considered was an attested will. The subsequent cases following it take it as absolute authority, and do not properly distinguish or limit the scope of its language. The case has been criticized in England and limited strictly to cases where witnesses saw the will written or where it was subsequently acknowledged before them. Morrison v. Turner, 18 Ves. Jr. 175; Coles v. Trecothick, 9 Ves. Jr. 234, 32 Eng. Reprint, 598. To overcome its effect in England the statutes of 1 Vict., 15 Vict., and 16 Vict. were enacted, changing the law so as to require that "all wills be signed at the end thereof." In view of this consequence of that decision, it is obvious that its authority should not be considered as controlling. The rule we have stated is, in our judgment, supported by sounder reasons and is less likely to produce evil results.

Our conclusion is that the document in question was not signed by the testator, as required by section 1277, and that it is not entitled to probate.

The order is reversed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Action by Ernest C. Webster against C. M. Orr and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Charles A. Beardsley and Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, all of Oakland, for appellants. Gehring & Wyman, of Oakland, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought his action against defendants to recover damages for injuries sustained through the negligence of the driver of a truck owned by defendants. He received a verdict at the hands of the jury. From the judgment which followed and from the court's order denying defendants' motion for a new trial they have appealed.

The evidence, as is usual in such cases, is in sharp conflict. That offered by plaintiff was to the effect that he was carrying a friend upon his two-passenger motorcycle and was proceeding eastward upon a street in the city of Oakland. Suddenly and unexpectedly the driver of defendants' truck, with his horses trotting or galloping and apparently not under perfect control, cut across his path, the pole struck the motorcycle, and he and his companion were thrown to the ground and trampled upon by the horses. The conflicting evidence of defendants was that the heavy truck was proceeding at a walk, the motorcycle was going at a rapid rate of speed, and was passing vehicles moving in the same direction without due care, that while so being driven it collided with the tongue of the truck wagon, which was crossing this street in an orderly manner, and that by reason of this collision thus occurring, plaintiff, without negligence upon the part of defendants, sustained his injuries.

The driver of defendants' truck was called as a witness on behalf of defendants, and gave his version of the accident. Upon cross-examination he was asked the following questions. To them defendants' counsel objected. The objections were overruled, and the answers given as follows:

"Q. How long ago was the accident? A. It was on the 20th of July, 1911. Q. When you were employed by Orr & Breedlove? A. Yes, over a year ago. Q. Did you leave their employ after the accident? A. Yes, sir. Q. Were you discharged because of the accident? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was that the reason given? A. I expect so. Q. Was any reason given? A. Yes. Q. Did he (Mr. Doyle) give as the reason for your discharge the fact that you had been drinking? A. That was the reason he gave. Q. What was the reason of the discharge? A. It was for drinking. That was why they discharged me. Q. Nothing said about the collision; is that right? A. I cannot remember anything being said about it."

[1] The value to the plaintiff of this evidence, if properly admitted, the injury to the defendants of this evidence, if improperly admitted, are made the more conspicuous by the fact that defendants were contending that the physical condition of their truck and the harness of the horses demonstrated that the pole of the truck did not strike the motorcycle as plaintiff contended, but to the contrary that the motorcycle was driven at headlong speed into the pole of the truck. In support of this they offered evidence to show that the strong pole of this two-ton truck was gouged out and the forward end broken and shattered, an injury which, so they argue, could not have resulted if the pole had struck the motorcycle, but which could, and would, naturally have resulted if a speeding motorcycle had been driven against the pole. Still further in this connection it was shown that the hames straps of the harness were broken, an accident which it is argued could not have occurred if plaintiff's version of the occurrence was the true one. This is said in emphasis of the fact that this evidence so admitted was of a very real and vital consequence in this controversy, amounting as it did to an admission by the defendants of the negligence of the driver who was dismissed from his employment because of that negligence arising from his condition of intoxication. As evidence designed to fix an admission of negligence on the part of defendants after knowledge of the accident it was indisputably incompetent and manifestly injurious. Sappenfield v. Main Street R. R. Co., 91 Cal. 48, 61, 62, 27 Pac. 590; Hager v. Southern Pacific Co., 98 Cal. 309, 311, 33 Pac. 119; Turner v. Hearst, 115 Cal. 394, 401, 47 Pac. 129; Limberg v. Glenwood, 127 Cal. 598, 604, 60 Pac. 176, 49 L. R. A. 33; Helling v. Schindler, 145 Cal. 303, 311–315, 78 Pac. 710; 29 Cyc. 616; Armour & Co. v. Skene, 153 Fed. 241, 82 C. C. A. 385; Hewitt v. Taunton St. Ry. Co., 167 Mass. 483, 46 N. E. 106.

[2, 3] It is sought, therefore, to justify, the admission upon other grounds, and, should the justification fail, then to excuse it as an immaterial error under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. The argument in justification comes to this: That the witness was an important witness for the defense and was a hostile witness to plaintiff, and that plaintiff therefore had the right affirmatively to establish the hostility of this witness against himself by showing that he had been discharged by the defendants. We do not clearly apprehend the force of this, since rationally it would seem that if he had been unjustly discharged, his animosity would have been against the defendants, instead of against the plaintiff, but, putting this aside, we have never been advised of any rule of evidence, nor cited to any authority holding that evidence that an employé was discharged after an accident could be used (in an action such as this where the witness is called by the defendant employer) to establish that witness' hostility either to the plaintiff or to the employer. Still further, under the argument of justification, the proposition is advanced that, the witness' version of the accident being such as to exonerate himself from culpability and his former employers from liability, evidence of his discharge was legitimate for impeachment, but the legitimate methods of impeaching or discrediting a witness are pointed out in section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and it would certainly be an innovation in the law of evidence to add, in effect, to that section a provision that a witness may be impeached or discredited by a showing that he was discharged by his employer for reasons growing out of the transaction in question, and this where liability is sought to be cast upon the employer because of the employé's part in the transaction.

The conflicting character of the evidence has been indicated. Also it has been pointed out that the effect of the objectionable evidence, if believed, was to establish before the jury an admission by defendants that their driver was culpably negligent, and had been discharged for that reason. It left the jury little more to do than to fix the amount of their award. For this reason respondent cannot successfully invoke the application of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. The error was both serious and prejudicial.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore reversed.

1. Waters and Water Courses 🔑142 — Prescriptive Rights — Diversion of Stream.

Where defendants took water from a river, diminishing its flow below their dam down to plaintiffs' lands, plaintiffs being entitled to the full flow of the stream by their lands, the taking was an invasion of their rights, whether they used the water or any part of their lands or not, regardless whether the water remaining in the stream was sufficient for plaintiffs' needs and uses, and so was adverse to plaintiffs' rights, and a continuance of such taking for five years established in defendants a right to continue the diversion of the quantity taken, a right held by a perfect title in fee, good against all lower riparian proprietors.

2. Waters and Water Courses 🔑145 — Prescriptive Rights—Extent — Mode of Diversion.

That defendants, by means of new and more perfect dams, and by repairing their canals, were enabled to divert more water than before, did not affect their right to continue to divert the quantity which they had previously acquired the right to divert.

3. Waters and Water Courses 🔑143 — Prescriptive Rights—Quantity.

The fact that a small quantity of the water diverted from a river into canals and dams always escaped from the canals through leaks in the flumes and thus returned to the stream did not deprive the parties taking the water of the right to the quantity actually kept out of the stream.

4. Waters and Water Courses 🔑152(5) — Prescriptive Rights — Establishment — Pleading Limitations.

In an action by a riparian owner to establish his water rights, an answer by defendant that the action is barred by the statute of limitations, by reference to the appropriate section of the Code of Civil Procedure, is a sufficient pleading of the prescriptive right to the quantity of water claimed by defendant, and justifies the taking of evidence and the making of findings with respect to such prescriptive right.

5. Waters and Water Courses 🔑152(11)— Prescriptive Rights—Quantity.

The proper form of judgment would have been to declare the right of the respective defendants to make diversions from the river up to the quantity as to which their prescriptive right was found to be established, and to permit them to continue the diversion of such quantity, but to enjoin them from making any greater diversion by means of improved dams, canals, or otherwise, and a judgment was improper which allowed defendants to continue their diversion so long as the quantity flowing by plaintiffs' land was not reduced thereby below specified quantities, since the right of the owner of a prescriptive right to water is absolute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 156.]

6. Waters and Water Courses 🔑152(10)— Prescriptive Rights — Action to Establish—Duty of Court to Find the Facts.

In an action by riparian owners to establish water rights, the fact that witnesses differed in their evidence as to the capacity of diverting canals of defendants did not relieve the court of the duty of finding the facts; it being the duty of the court to compare and weigh the evidence and reach a conclusion thereon according to its best judgment.

7. Waters and Water Courses 🔑152(8) — Prescriptive Rights—Proof.

In an action by riparian owners to establish water rights, wherein defendants set up prescriptive rights by diversion, defendants' proof did not need to extend over the whole period from the beginning of the diversion to the beginning of the action, and a failure of proofs as to some intervening period would not defeat defendants' claim.

8. Waters and Water Courses 🔑143 — Right of Action for Diversion.

Where the owners of land adjacent to a river for 40 years diverted and used thereon practically all the water of the stream that reached a point opposite the upper boundary of their land, doing so continuously and under claim of right, they were entitled to maintain an action against any wrongful diversion above of the water of the stream that would diminish it at their place of diversion, so that it would not afford them their usual quantity.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by the E. Clemens Horst Company and others against the Tarr Mining Company, the South Yuba Water Company, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants, except the Tarr Mining Company, appeal. Judgment reversed.

Wallace Dinsmore, of Marysville, and Wm. B. Bosley, of San Francisco, for appellants. W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, George & Hinsdale, of Sacramento, Samuel C. Wiel, of San Francisco, and White, Miller & McLaughlin and C. E. McLaughlin, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This appeal is taken by the defendants South Yuba Water Company, United Water & Power Company, James D. Stewart, and Pacific Gas & Electric Company from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. Judgment was given against the Tarr Mining Company, but it has not appealed therefrom.

The plaintiffs, respectively, own farms aggregating about 3,500 acres alleged to be bordering upon Bear river. They claim the right to the use of the water of the river as riparian owners. They also claim that, during each irrigating season for more than five years before the beginning of the action they continuously, adversely to all persons and under a claim of right, have diverted from the river and used upon their lands for the irrigation thereof quantities of water amounting in the aggregate to 3,400 miner's inches of water, whereby they have gained the right to continue to take and use on said lands said quantity of the water of the stream. They charge that in the year 1910 the defendants entered upon Bear river and its tributaries, above their said lands, obstructed the flow thereof, and diverted therefrom the waters thereof to such an extent that the plaintiffs have been thereby deprived of at least one-third of the water which they had formerly taken and used and were entitled to take and use from said river as aforesaid. The action was begun on March 17, 1911. The prayer is that the defendants be enjoined from obstructing the flow of the river, or diverting water therefrom, in such a manner as to prevent the water thereof from flowing down the channel to plaintiffs' land for plaintiffs' use, and that the defendants' dams be abated and removed.

The Pacific Gas & Electric Company and the South Yuba Water Company, in a joint answer, aver that neither of them has ever taken water from the river or its tributaries except such water as it has owned and has had the right to take, under appropriations completed prior to those of any of the plaintiffs, and that the right of each of them to take therefrom and use such water as it has taken therefrom and used is "prior in time and superior in law" to the alleged rights of the plaintiffs. This answer also alleges that the respective causes of action of the plaintiffs set forth in the complaint are each barred by the provisions of sections 318, 319, 312, 335, 339, subd. 1, and section 343, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendants United Water & Power Company and James D. Stewart join in a separate answer. This answer "admits" that the United Power & Water Company and its predecessors in interest for more than 40 years have maintained a dam in Bear river and have by means of said dam and a ditch called the Miners' ditch taken from said river 2,200 miner's inches of the waters thereof, and have put the same to beneficial uses. (The complaint contains no allegation to that effect.) The answer further alleges that said water company is now the owner, and that its predecessors in interest have been, for more than 40 years before the action was begun, the owners and in possession of the right to divert from said river by means of said dam and said Miners' ditch all the water that said ditch will carry. It also pleads the statute of limitations, as in the other answer.

This form of pleading gives little information as to the defense relied on. We must look to the evidence to understand the real nature and character of the water rights asserted by the defendants at the trial. The South Yuba Water Company has no present right in the water of Bear river. Such rights as it had were conveyed by it to the Pacific Gas & Electric Company on December 31, 1910. We assume that it was made a party defendant because said conveyance was not recorded until after the action was begun. Stewart was and is the president and manager of the United Water & Power Company, and he is not otherwise interested in the controversy.

The Pacific Gas & Electric Company claims three distinct and separate rights to divert water from Bear river. These are as follows: (1) The right to maintain a dam, known as "Bear River dam," at a point in the river about 36 miles above the lands of the plaintiffs, and thereby to divert from the river into a flume or canal, known as the "Bear River canal," a sufficient quantity of the water of the river to fill said canal, claimed to be 1,800 miner's inches, and devote the same to public use for irrigation or other purposes; (2) the right to maintain a dam, known as the "Gold Hill dam," at a point in said river about 17 miles above the lands of the plaintiffs, and thereby to divert into a flume or canal, known as the "Gold Hill canal," sufficient of the waters of the river to fill said canal, claimed to be 840 miner's inches, and to devote it to the same public uses; (3) the right to maintain a dam, known as "Bear Valley dam," at a point in the river about 50 miles above the lands of the plaintiffs, and thereby to divert into a flume or canal, known as the "Boardman canal," from a storage reservoir there maintained by said company, which collects and stores the flood and storm waters of said river, a constant flow of 2,800 miner's inches of water, and to devote it to the same public uses.

The United Water & Power Company claims the right to maintain a dam in Bear river at a point 2 miles below the above-mentioned Bear Valley dam and 48 miles above plaintiffs' lands, known as the "Head dam," and a ditch leading therefrom known as "Miners' ditch," and thereby, to divert from said river all the waters thereof that said ditch will carry, claimed to be 2,100 miner's inches, and to devote the same in part to public use and in part to the private use of the owner of the said dam and ditch.

It would have served to clarify the issues and would have led to more definite findings than those that were made regarding the defenses pleaded if, instead of the general statements of the answer, the defendants had set forth the facts relating to each of their several asserted prescriptive water rights, stating definitely the quantity of water they claimed for each right. The general form of the answer may have led to the erroneous theory which we find in the decision and judgment.
